was under a contractual obligation to settle and pay for demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge. The second assumption has been that the principle laid down by your Lordships' House in the La Pintada case [1985] A.C. 104 in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment applied equally in relation to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for late payment. For reasons which I shall give later, I am of the opinion that both these assumptions were fallacious. I also think that, because the assumptions were fallacious, the courts below were led into two errors. The first error was to apply themselves to deciding a question which, on what I consider to be a true view of the law, did not need to be decided. The second error, which was linked with the first, was to approach the construction of clause 30 of the charter on a wrong basis. Your Lordships are faced with the difficulty that the charterer does not appear to have disputed the correctness of either of the assumptions to which I have referred in the courts below. It seems to me, however, that this circumstance, while it may in certain events be relevant to questions of costs, should not inhibit your Lordships from deciding this appeal on a correct legal basis. The real issue in the appeal is the true construction of the provisions relating to demurrage contained in the charter, which your Lordships were given to understand were in a form commonly used by the charterer in his chartering transactions. That being so, it would, in my view, be wrong to allow fallacious assumptions of law, which were allowed to go unchallenged in the courts below, to affect the way in which your Lordships decide the matters of construction which are really in issue.

I consider first the assumption that the umpire was right in law in deciding that the charterer was under a contractual obligation to settle and pay for demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge. This part of the umpire's decision appears to have been treated below as if it were a finding of fact, whereas it was plainly a holding in law. The question whether it was right or wrong must be dealt with on that basis.

It is essential to the decision of that question to have in mind the legal nature of demurrage: both what it is and what it is not. I deal first with what demurrage is not. It is not money payable by a charterer as the consideration for the exercise by him of a right to detain a chartered ship beyond the stipulated lay days. If demurrage were that, it would be a liability sounding in debt. I deal next with what demurrage is. It is a liability in damages to which a charterer becomes subject because, by detaining the chartered ship beyond the stipulated lay days, he is in breach of his contract. Most, if not all, voyage charters contain a demurrage clause, which prescribes a daily rate at which the damages for such detention are to be quantified. The effect of such a clause is to liquidate the damages payable: it does not alter the nature of the charterer's liability, which is and remains a liability for damages, albeit liquidated damages. In the absence of any provision to the contrary in the charter the charterer's liability for demurrage accrues de die in diem from the moment when, after the lay days have expired, the detention of the ship by him begins. These propositions of law are so well established that the citation of authority for them is perhaps unnecessary. However, if authority is required, it is to be found in such cases as Aktieselskabet Reidar v. Arcos Ltd. [1927] 1 K.B. 352, a decision of the Court of Appeal, and Dias Compania Naviera S.A. v. Louis Dreyfus

Lord Brandon

A Corporation [1978] 1 W.L.R. 261, a decision of your Lordships' House. In the latter case Lord Diplock said, at pp. 263-264:

"If laytime ends before the charterer has completed the discharging operation he breaks his contract. The breach is a continuing one; it goes on until discharge is completed and the ship is once more available to the shipowner to use for other voyages. But unless the delay in what is often, though incorrectly, called re-delivery of the ship to the shipowner, is so prolonged as to amount to a frustration of the adventure, the breach by the charterer sounds in damages only. The charterer remains entitled to continue to complete the discharge of the cargo, while remaining liable in damages for the loss sustained by the shipowner during the period for which he is being wrongfully deprived of the opportunity of making profitable use of his ship. It is the almost invariable practice nowadays for these damages to be fixed by the charterparty at a liquidated sum per day and pro rata for part of a day (demurrage) which accrues throughout the period of time for which the breach continues."

D The charter with which this appeal is concerned contained no express provision that demurrage, instead of being payable de die in diem from the moment detention of the ship beyond the lay days began, should only be payable within two months after the completion of discharge. Nor can I see any basis for implying any such provision. It is no doubt true that, because there has to be a general settlement of accounts between the charterer and the shipowner after the completion of the charter voyage, and because time is needed to agree the calculation of the amount of demurrage where a liability for it has been incurred, demurrage will not in practice be settled and paid for until a reasonable time, which may well be of the order of two months, has elapsed after the completion of discharge. This circumstance, however, does not afford a basis for implying a term that the charterer's liability to pay demurrage does not accrue until such a reasonable time has elapsed. I would, therefore, hold that the umpire's decision that the charter here concerned was subject to such a term, adopted without dispute by the courts below, though not without some expression of surprise by Staughton J. [1985] 2 Lloyd's. Rep. 180, 183, was wrong in law.

I turn to the second assumption that the principle laid down by your Lordships' House in President of India v. La Pintada Compania Navigacion S.A. case [1985] A.C. 104 in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment of a debt applied equally in relation to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for such late payment. In the La Pintada case the House was invited to depart from its earlier decision in London, Chatham and Dover Railway Co. v. South Eastern Railway Co. [1893] A.C. 429. In that case it was held that, under English common law, interest could not be given as damages for late payment of a debt. Two matters were decided by the House in the La Pintada case. The first matter was that the application of the principle established in the London, Chatham and Dover Railway Co. case was limited to claims to recover interest as general damage under the first part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, and did not extend to claims to recover interest as special damage under the second part of that rule. The second matter was that it would be inappropriate for the House, pursuant to the Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1234, of 26 July 1966 to depart from the principle established in the London, Chatham and Dover Railway Co. case as so limited. The reason for not so departing, and the only reason, was that the legislature had, since the London, Chatham and Dover Railway Co. case had been decided, intervened on more than one occasion to confer on courts a discretionary power to award interest on unpaid debts and that a departure would produce an undesirable conflict between the right to recover interest at common law and the statutory entitlement to recover interest on a discretionary basis so conferred.

The London, Chatham and Dover Railway Co. case was concerned, and concerned only, with the recovery of interest as damages for late payment of a debt. It was in no way concerned with the recovery of currency exchange losses as damages for such late payment. It follows necessarily that the scope of the La Pintada case, in so far as it differentiated between claims for the recovery of interest as general damage on the one hand and as special damage on the other, was similarly limited. The House had no reason in the La Pintada case to consider claims to recover currency exchange losses and did not do so. Such claims differ significantly from claims to recover interest in two ways. First, there is no previously established law, comparable to that laid down in the London, Chatham and Dover Railway Co. case, precluding the recovery of currency exchange losses as damages for late payment of a debt. Secondly, there are no statutory provisions relating to the recovery of such losses which could conflict with any right of recovery at common law. In these circumstances it appears to me that claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for breach of contract, whether the breach relied on is late payment of a debt or any other breach, are subject to the same rules as apply to claims for damages for breach of contract generally. This view is supported by Isaac Naylor & Sons Ltd. v. New Zealand Co-operative Wool Marketing Association Ltd. [1981] 1 N.Z.L.R. 361. For these reasons I would hold that the assumption that the principle laid down by your Lordships' House in the La Pintada case in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment of a debt applied equally to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for late payment, an assumption which was again made without dispute in the courts below, was also wrong in law.

My Lords, I shall now consider the charterer's case that the umpire was wrong, in dealing with the owners' claim in respect of demurrage, to add the damages element to the demurrage element. I shall, moreover, do this untrammelled by the two assumptions made in the courts below which I have held to have been wrong in law.

Once it is recognised that a claim for demurrage sounds in damages rather than in debt, it becomes apparent that the two concepts, first, of a contractual date for the payment of such damages, and, secondly, of a claim for damages for breach of contract in not paying them by such date, have no basis in law. As I said earlier an owner's cause of action for demurrage, being one for damages, albeit liquidated damages, accrues de die in diem from the moment when the ship is detained beyond the stipulated lay days. There is no such thing as a cause of action in damages for late payment of damages. The only remedy which the law affords for delay in paying damages is the discretionary award of interest pursuant to statute. It follows that the umpire's decision in the present case, in dealing with the owners' claim in respect of demurrage, to add the damages element to the demurrage element, was wrong in

A law, and was so irrespectively of the provisions of clause 30 of the charter. The umpire was, however, right in principle to award interest (though not compound interest: see the La Pintada case) on the amount of the demurrage payable by the charterer. Further, on the basis that demurrage is usually settled and paid for within two months of the completion of discharge, as I infer that the umpire found, he was also right to make interest payable only from the day following the expiry of that period, i.e. from 12 December 1980, as he did.

B The owners, in support of their case that the umpire was right to add the damages element to the demurrage element, relied strongly on Aruna Mills Ltd. v. Dhanrajmal Gobindram [1968] 1 Q.B. 655. In that case sellers contracted with buyers to ship goods under a c.i.f. contract on or before a stipulated date. The price of the goods was to be a sum in Indian rupees, and there was an express provision in the contract that any difference in the rates of exchange between the Indian rupee and the pound sterling prevailing on the date of the contract and on the date when the price was paid should be borne and paid for by the buyers. The sellers shipped the goods later than the contractual date and during the period of delay in shipment the Indian rupee was devalued in relation to the pound sterling. As a result the buyers had to pay an increased price for the goods. A dispute between the parties was referred to arbitration and subsequently a special case was stated for the opinion of the court on the question whether the buyer was entitled to recover the increase in the price of the goods resulting from the devaluation as damages for the sellers' breach of contract in shipping the goods late. It was held by Donaldson J., applying the principles laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale and later authorities on the recovery of damages for breach of contract, that the loss claimed was not too remote and was therefore recoverable by the buyers, so as to entitle them to set it off against the increased price.

E The Aruna Mills case is, in my opinion, clearly distinguishable from the present case. In the Aruna Mills case the sellers committed a breach of contract in shipping goods later than the contractual date of shipment, and the only question was whether the loss suffered by the buyer in having to pay an increased price for the goods was within the contemplation of the parties at the time of contracting so as to make such loss recoverable as damages for the breach. Donaldson J. decided that it was and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of his decision. In the present case, however, for reasons which I gave earlier, there was no breach of the charter by the charterer in respect of the payment of demurrage. All that happened was that the charterer did not pay liquidated damages for the detention of the ship at the time when the cause of action in respect of such damages accrued, or indeed at any time up to and including the date of the umpire's award. For that non-payment the only remedy which the law affords to the owners is interest on the sum remaining unpaid. In my view, therefore, the Aruna Mills case does not assist the owners.

H My Lords, there remains for consideration the effect of clause 30 of the charter. According to the findings contained in the umpire's further award, the currency in which the owners carried on their business was U.S. dollars. Clause 9 of the charter further provided that demurrage should be calculated at the rate of $6,000 per day and pro rata. In these circumstances, were it not for the inclusion of clause 30 in the charter, the owners would have been entitled to an award in respect of their claim for demurrage expressed in dollars: see The Despina R [1979] A.C. 685. In that situation the owner would not have suffered the currency exchange loss which led the umpire to add the damages element to the demurrage element. Clause 30, however, expressly changed what would otherwise have been the situation. It did so in two ways. First, it provided that demurrage calculated in dollars under clause 9 should, for the purposes of payment, be converted into pounds sterling. Secondly, it provided that such conversion should take place at the rate of exchange prevailing on the bills of lading date. These provisions, by the express terms of the clause, apply whenever demurrage is settled or paid for. Further it is clear that the expression "settlement," as used in clause 30, includes settlement by an award in arbitration proceedings as well as settlement by agreement between the parties. I reach that conclusion after considering the use of the expression "settled" in relation to general average in clause 15 of the charter and in relation to disputes referred to arbitration in clause 17. In any case, I did not understand the owners to be disputing that this was the meaning of the expression "settlement" in clause 30. Their acceptance of the division of the arbitrators' award in respect of demurrage into two elements, the demurrage element and the damages element, is inconsistent with their doing so.

My Lords, for the reasons which I have given I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Court of Appeal [1987] 2 W.L.R. 906 and restore the order of Staughton J. [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 180 except in so far as it relates to costs. As will be apparent, however, the grounds on which I think that the substantive part of the order of Staughton J. was right differ fundamentally from those on which he relied in making it.

LORD GRIFFITHS. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speeches of my noble and learned friends, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook and Lord Mackay of Clashfern. I should for myself have preferred to reach a result which did not enable the charterer by delaying payment to take advantage of the decline of the pound against the dollar. For the reasons given by Lord Mackay of Clashfern this result would be achieved only if the charterparty is subject to the implied term as to payment found by the arbitrator. Despite the fact that this term as to payment was not challenged until the hearing in your Lordships' House I have been reluctantly persuaded by the reasoning of Lord Brandon of Oakbrook that no sufficient grounds exist to support such a term and that for the reasons he gives this appeal must be allowed.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook. I gratefully adopt his account of the facts and the history of these proceedings.

As my noble and learned friend has pointed out the umpire decided that the charterer was under an obligation to pay the demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge. The breach of contract alleged by the owners was failure on the part of the charterer to comply with this obligation and the damages element is the quantum of damages said to arise from that breach. If there was no such contractual obligation payment more than two months after the completion of discharge was not a breach of contract and accordingly no damages for breach of

Lord Mackay

A contract could be successfully claimed. Sfaughton J. said of the umpire's holding on this point [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 180, 183:

"Quite why the charterer is allowed two months grace is not clear to me, and was not explained by counsel. But there has been no challenge to that conclusion."

B This remained the position in the Court of Appeal [1987] 2 W.L.R. 906. The petition by the charterer for leave to appeal to your Lordships' House included a submission "that it is not a breach of contract to fail to pay damages/demurrage promptly such as to entitle the payee to damages rather than interest." In argument before your Lordships counsel for the charterer made it plain that he was not submitting that there had been no breach of contract by late payment in the present case although his submission was that the contractual term breached was that the demurrage should have been paid from day to day as it arose.

C If there was a contractual provision requiring the charterer to pay the demurrage by 11 December 1980, in my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

Briefly, my reasons are that failure to perform this contractual term would involve a breach of contract entitling the owner to damages for that breach, measured by the amount of loss caused to them by the breach. Clause 30, in my opinion, applies whenever payment is made and accordingly applies to a late payment just as much as to a timeous payment. The business of the owner was carried on in U.S. dollars and on receipt of timeous payment in accordance with clause 30 in British external sterling the owner would be expected to convert it as at that date into U.S. dollars at the prevailing exchange rate. If instead of paying on the due date the charterer deferred payment to a later date and if on that later date the same amount in British sterling converted into U.S. dollars would yield a smaller amount than if converted at the due date the difference in U.S. dollars would be a loss to the owners for which they were entitled, in my opinion, to compensation. I see nothing in the words of clause 30 to preclude such a claim. In my opinion, the reasoning of Donaldson J. in Aruna Mills Ltd. v. Dhanrajmal Gobindram [1968] 1 Q.B. 655 would apply in this situation. Counsel for the charterer sought to distinguish the Aruna Mills case on the basis that the reason the payment in the Aruna Mills case was later than it would have been if the contract was performed was not because there was a breach of contract by late payment but because a breach of contract in failing to ship at the proper time resulted in payment being due later than otherwise it would have been. I cannot see why this makes any difference in principle. In both the Aruna Mills case and the present case on the basis which I am now discussing the payment was later than it should have been with resulting loss to the payee in consequence of breach of contract on the part of the payer.

H It was submitted for the charterer that the word "settlement" in clause 30 somehow showed that clause 30 precluded the owner's claim. Clause 30 is dealing with an account between the charterer and the owners which may include items such as demurrage payable by the charterer to the owners and items such as despatch payable by the owners to the charterer. Where one is thinking of an account in which it is desired to bring out the balance payable by the charterer to the owners it is natural to regard amounts payable by the charterer to the owners as payments whereas amounts due in the opposite direction will not require to be paid but to be accounted for by deduction. Clause 30 provides not only that payments are to be subject to the exchange rate regime of the clause but that amounts to be allowed by way of deduction are also to be calculated under the same regime and, in my opinion, the word "settlement" is a convenient expression to use for this process of allowing an item as a deduction in an account. The express distinction taken between demurrage on the one hand and despatch on the other is, in my view, in the structure of the clause mirrored by the distinction between payment on the one hand and settlement on the other. In Monrovia Tramp Shipping Co. v. President of India [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 193, 196, Donaldson J. records a submission by Mr. Hobhouse in a somewhat similar context to the present "that settlement in this context means calculation and not payment, and he says that dispatch would be settled by deduction from the freight," which Donaldson J. adds "may well be right."

It is true that elsewhere in the charterparty the word "settlement" occurs in the context of settlement of disputes but I cannot regard it as related to dispute in the context of clause 30. Clause 30 is a clause which has to be applied in reaching a determination of the amount to be paid by the charterer to the owners. If the directions in clause 30 are followed and the amount brought out by the charterer following that direction is the same as the amount brought out by the owners no dispute would arise. The clause as a whole would be put into effect. If, however, a dispute arose about the payment those responsible for determining the dispute would require to apply the rules for determination of the amount to be paid set out in clause 30. It would be strange indeed if the rules to be followed differed according to whether parties were agreed on how they should be applied or differed on how they should be applied. In both cases the true construction of the rules set out in clause 30 would be applicable. In this context I think it is worth noting that clause 30(d) provides "demurrage/despatch and any other payments under this charterparty shall also be made in British external sterling." The word "settlement" is not present in that part of the clause and even after a dispute is determined what is ultimately made is an order for payment of the amount found due. It would not, I think, be correct to describe it as an order for "settlement" of an amount found due. What is settled by the arbitration procedure is the amount of the payment to be made.

If I am right so far, the owner had a claim for damages for breach of contract by reason of late payment of an amount equal to the exchange losses sustained by him in consequence of that breach. I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook that the decision of this House in London, Chatham and Dover Railway Co. v. South Eastern Railway Co. [1893] A.C. 429 was limited to claims to recover interest as general damage under the first part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341 and therefore has no application to the present claim. The reasoning of this House in President of India v. La Pintada Compania Navigacion S.A. [1985] A.C. 104 makes it clear that damages other than interest may be recovered for breach of contract by late payment. Accordingly, on this basis the owners' claim in the present case was a valid claim.

However, there is no express term in this charterparty obliging the charterer to pay the demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge and the umpire's finding must depend upon implication.

3 W.L.R.

A As a practical matter I can see some attraction in having a term providing for a date on which payment is due which allows sufficient time for making up the necessary account but there is nothing in this charterparty or in the circumstances so far as disclosed in this appeal which would render necessary an implication of such a clause in the present case but would not produce a similar necessity in many other cases which have been reported.

B In general, contracts do not contain provisions regulating the amount or the manner or due date of payment of damages for their breach. A contract may contain a clause quantifying damages and this charterparty is an example in that it provides for demurrage as liquidated damages for breach of the obligation to complete loading and discharge within the lay days provided. But that does not deal with the time of payment. No doubt, it is possible to make a provision which has the effect that in respect of failure to perform a particular contractual term, a party becomes liable to pay a specified amount on a particular day to the other party. An example in which that was held to be the result is afforded by the decision of the Privy Council in Loh Wai Lian v. Sea Housing Corporation Sdn. Bhd. (unreported), 3 March 1987, although in that case the date on which payment of the sum was due was not expressly provided although the Board held that it was implied.

D I have felt considerable difficulty in departing completely from this aspect of the umpire's holding which was unchallenged in the two courts below and in respect of which it was expressly accepted by counsel for the charterer before your Lordships that a breach of contract had occurred by reason of late payment, although the breach
E counsel accepted was of a term different from that upon which the umpire's decision rested, without giving an opportunity to the umpire to state the justification for his holding. Having regard to the amount at stake and to the issues of general importance which the parties sought to litigate I consider it would be most unfortunate to remit the case to the umpire now. I also agree that it would not be proper for F this House to act on the assumption that the necessary contractual term was to be implied in this charterparty where no basis has been suggested on which that could happen. I am further persuaded that difficult questions are posed by this assumption. For example, the lien provided to the owner in respect of demurrage is a formidable though perhaps not completely insurmountable obstacle to the implication of G any term in this contract on the lines suggested in the umpire's holding. Such questions have not been examined. In that situation I have reached the conclusion that the course proposed by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook is the proper one to follow, and I agree with his conclusion that this appeal should be allowed.

C

The plaintiff, who was about 40 years old, had not worked since 1980 but had been receiving an invalidity benefit as a result of personal injuries which he sustained in a road accident, for which the defendant admitted liability. The judge held that, in computing the damages, one half of the invalidity benefit for the five years following the accrual of the cause of action was to be deducted from the amount of the plaintiff's loss, under section 2(1) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act 1948,¹ as amended, but no further account was to be taken of the invalidity benefit.

D

On the defendant's appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that on its true construction section 2(1) of the Act of 1948, as amended, was a comprehensive provision exhaustively defining the amount of the deductions to be made on account of the specified benefits and that, accordingly, nothing more than one half of the invalidity benefit received by the plaintiff in the specified five years was to be deducted from the damages (post, pp. 588G, 589A, 590H—591A, B, E–F, H—592B).

APPEAL from Swinton Thomas J.

By a writ dated 5 May 1981 and a statement of claim, the plaintiff, Barry James Jackman, claimed damages against the defendant, Sebastian Anthony Corbett, for personal injuries sustained in a road accident. Judgment was given for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed on the grounds that the judge was wrong in law in holding that the plaintiff's invalidity benefit should not be deducted for the purpose of assessing his loss of future earnings and loss of earnings to trial after the period of five years from the date of the accident; and that the multiplier chosen by the judge for the purpose of assessing the plaintiff's future loss of earnings, namely, $8\frac{1}{2}$ years, was too great.

Fox L.J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Swinton Thomas J. The case arises from a road accident in September 1980, when the plaintiff was riding a motor cycle and was struck by a car driven by the defendant and badly hurt. The liability of the defendant is not in dispute. The issue relates to two aspects of the computation of damages. The plaintiff was born in 1945. He has not worked since the accident. The judge awarded him the following damages:

G

General damage.....	£30,000
Loss of earnings to date of judgment	15,699.94
Special damages.....	838
Loss of future earnings.....	37,017.50
Total.....	£83,555.44

H

The first question is one of statutory interpretation. It arises in this way. If the plaintiff had continued in his employment, his loss was at the rate of £83.75 per week, which is £4,355 per year. It is contended by the defendant, however, that the continuing loss and part of the loss of earnings to the date of judgment should be reduced by reason of the receipt of invalidity benefit by the plaintiff at the rate of £46.35 per week. The plaintiff was in receipt of that sum prior to the trial, and will continue to receive it, or other invalidity benefit for the time being. The plaintiff's contention, however, is that no deduction should be made after the end of the five-year period referred to in section 2(1) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act 1948, as amended, which provides:

"In an action for damages for personal injuries . . . there shall in assessing those damages be taken into account, against any loss of earnings or profits which has accrued or probably will accrue to the injured person from the injuries, one half of the value of any rights which have accrued or probably will accrue to him therefrom in respect of any of the following benefits under the Social Security Act 1975 . . . namely—sickness benefit, invalidity benefit, non-contributory invalidity pension, injury benefit, disablement benefit for the five years beginning with the time when the cause of action accrued."

By section 12 of the Social Security Act 1975, invalidity benefit is listed as a contributory benefit, but by section 13 entitlement to invalidity benefit is not dependent upon contributory conditions being satisfied. The defendant's case is that it is proper that invalidity benefit should be deducted in order (a) to reflect the plaintiff's true loss, and (b) to avoid overcompensating the plaintiff. It is said, further, that deductibility would not offend against (i) the common law rules against the deduction of the proceeds of private insurance policies: Bradburn v. Great Western Railway Co. (1874) L.R. 10 Ex. 1; (ii) the common law rules against the deduction of payments from a charitable fund as, for example, often happens in the case of a mine or rail or ship disaster: Redpath v. Belfast and County Down Railway [1947] N.I. 167; and (iii) the decision in Parry v. Cleaver [1970] A.C. 1 that pensions must be disregarded. And, in general, it is said that the modern approach to assessment of damages is in favour of deductibility rather than against it. We are concerned here with the construction of the Act of 1948. We must give effect to its meaning determined upon ordinary principles of construction. It has, of course, been amended since 1948, but the amendments cannot have changed its original meaning on the present point.

The enactment (section 2(1)) is specifying a mode of computation. The computation is made up of two elements. The first is "any loss of earnings or profits which has accrued or probably will accrue to the injured person from the injuries." That is unlimited in the sense that it states the entirety of the loss of earnings or profits present and future, without restriction of time. From that figure there has to be deducted the second element in the computation, namely:

"one half of the value of any rights which have accrued or probably will accrue to him therefrom in respect of [the specified benefits] for the five years beginning with the time when the cause of action accrued."

I read the provision as being comprehensive in relation to the deductions to be made in respect of receipts on account of the specified benefits. I think that the draftsman having, in the first element, stated without limit of time the entirety of the amount from loss of earnings from which deductions are to be made is, in the second element, stating the entirety of the deductions to be made therefrom, on account of the specified benefits whenever arising. The subsection contains no indication of any kind at all that the draftsman was either creating or preserving any right to a further deduction on account of the specified benefits.

It seems to me that, as a matter of drafting, if the draftsman had contemplated that the restriction to one half was to operate in respect of the five-year period only, and that thereafter there should be an

A unrestricted deduction operating under the common law, he would have introduced some words to ensure the wider deductibility. The language actually employed is, as a matter of ordinary English usage, inapt to achieve that. In my opinion, therefore, as a matter of construction section 2(1) defines exhaustively the amount which is to be deducted on receipt of the specified benefits. The precise policy basis for that we do not know. Presumably it was just a compromise. In Parry v. Cleaver [1970] A.C. 1, 34, Lord Pearce said:

B “Strict causation seems to provide no satisfactory line of demarcation. It would only lead one to a compromise like that contained in the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act 1948, whereby both a plaintiff and a defendant were given some advantage from national insurance benefits. This was quite a sensible compromise, but it is difficult to find any legal principle to justify it.”

C Lord Wilberforce also referred, at p. 39, to section 2 of the Act of 1948 as a “compromise” solution. Benefit to either side from such a compromise would depend upon what, at law, would have been brought into account.

D It is common ground that the construction which I have indicated is that which has been applied in practice since 1948: see Palfrey v. Greater London Council [1985] I.C.R. 437, 441. The authorities are to the same effect. In Eley v. Bedford [1972] 1 Q.B. 155, 158, MacKenna J. said:

E “I regard section 2 as an exhaustive statement of the circumstances in which a plaintiff’s damages may be reduced by reason of national insurance benefits.”

F In Haste v. Sandell Perkins Ltd. [1984] Q.B. 735, Hirst J. held that no deduction could be made in respect of benefits received or likely to be received after the end of the five-year period. He said, at p. 741:

G “I hold that section 2(1) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act 1948 on its proper construction covers the whole period past and future from the date the cause of action arose, and not merely the first five years. I support that conclusion by noting that it contains the mandatory word ‘shall’ and that ‘loss of earnings or profits’ comprises money which has accrued or probably will accrue to the injured person—i.e., with no limitation of time. In other words, the five-year limitation only applies to the benefit, but does not apply to the expectation of earnings or profits. If the defendants’ approach was correct, I think Parliament would have expressly applied the five years’ restriction not only to the benefits but also to the profits and earnings.”

H I respectfully agree that the absence of restriction in time upon the earnings and profits is of significance in the construction of the subsection. I do not myself derive much assistance from the word “shall,” since it seems to me that the provisions are mandatory, whatever their ambit. Hirst J. also relied upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hultquist v. Universal Pattern and Precision Engineering Co. Ltd. [1960] 2 Q.B. 467, to which I will return later. In Denman v. Essex Area Health Authority [1984] Q.B. 735, which was decided four weeks or so after the Haste case [1984] Q.B. 735 but without reference to it, Peter Pain J. reached the same conclusion as to the effect of section 2(1) as Hirst J. He was principally influenced by the Hultquist case, to which I now turn.

A

The plaintiff in that case had been injured in consequence of a breach by his employers of their duties under the Factories Act 1937. The degree of his injury was assessed under section 12 of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946, as 14 per cent. for life. Accordingly, he received a lump sum gratuity of £210. At the date of the injury he was aged 30 and his expectation of life was 35 years. In proceedings brought by the plaintiff against his employers he was awarded £550 general damages, but the judge deducted from the agreed special damages one half of the disablement gratuity of £210. He made that deduction upon his view of the construction of section 1 of the Act of 1948. Section 2(6) of the Act provided that, for the purposes of section 2:

It was held by the Court of Appeal that the amount of a disablement gratuity “for life” which the court had to take into account under section 2(1) of the Act of 1948 was one half of such proportion of the gratuity as the five-year period (or the unexpired portion thereof) bore to the injured person’s expectation of life (or to any lesser period specified for the duration of the gratuity). The result was that, on the agreed expectation of life of 35 years, the proper deduction from the £210 would be one half of £30 (since five years was one-seventh of 35 years and £30 was one-seventh of £210).

The decision is consistent with the construction of section 2(1) which I have adopted since, if the defendant’s construction is right, the deduction should not have been restricted to £15. That is because the gratuity was to be treated as benefit for the whole period of disablement, i.e. the expectation of life of 35 years. It is right to say that the present point is not referred to in the judgments or in the report of the arguments, but the judgments proceed upon the basis that nothing can be deducted except the one half referred to in section 2(1). The fact that the gratuity was to be treated as benefit for the whole of the relevant period of 35 years was fully before the court, and indeed central to the arguments and the decision. There is no suggestion in the judgments that anything beyond the £15 was deductible.

F

G

Mr. Denyer emphasises that the case turned largely upon the provisions of section 2(6) of the Act of 1948. That is right. But that only underlines the fact that the court allowed no deduction beyond the £15, even though section 2(6)(c) provides:

“an industrial disablement gratuity shall be treated as benefit for the period taken into account by the assessment of the extent of the disablement in respect of which it is payable” (i.e., in this case 35 years).

In the circumstances, I find nothing in the authorities which leads me to any different conclusion from that which I have reached, as set forth above, as a matter of construction of the language of section 2(1). Swinton Thomas J. in the present case followed the decisions in the

A Haste and Denman cases [1984] Q.B. 735 and held that, after the expiration of the five-year period, no further deduction fell to be made. In my view he was right in so deciding, and I would reject the defendant's submissions on this point.

B The second question relates to the multiplier of $8\frac{1}{2}$. [His Lordship considered the defendant's ground of appeal that the multiplier was too high, held that there was no basis upon which the court could interfere with the judge's decision, and continued:] I would therefore reject the defendant's contention on this point also and would dismiss the appeal.

C STOCKER L.J. I agree. This case is concerned solely with invalidity benefit, one of the classes of benefit specified in section 2(1) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act 1948, as amended. Despite the interesting argument of Mr. Denyer with regard to the question whether or not this type of benefit would be deductible from an award for loss of earnings were it not for the effect of the section, I have no doubt that this appeal raises solely questions of construction of that section and is not concerned with the wider issues which would arise outside the ambit of the section.

D The fact that, on the plaintiff's submissions, and upon the finding of the judge, the deductions to be set against the lost earnings are very seriously limited, and that, thus, the plaintiff, in effect, receives a windfall in the form of double recovery, is not particularly startling, to my mind, in view of the fact that double recovery occurs in many other instances, such as pensions: see Parry v. Cleaver [1970] A.C. 1.

E In my view the reasoning which impelled the judge to the conclusion that he reached, that this case is indistinguishable from that of this court in Hultquist v. Universal Pattern and Precision Engineering Co. Ltd. [1960] 2 Q.B. 467, is correct. In that case the court held that where an injured plaintiff was awarded an industrial disablement gratuity "for life," only that part of the lump sum so awarded as related to the remainder of the five-year period should be taken into account, the balance which could not be so apportioned being not deductible. This seems to me to support precisely the proposition which the judge accepted, that only that part of the invalidity benefit as related to the five-year period was deductible. For my part, I am unable to accept either of the distinctions which Mr. Denyer sought to draw between this case and the decision in the Hultquist case, namely, that the lump sum in the Hultquist case was to be regarded as a "one off" payment, and thus not deductible, or that such a payment was of a nature of a solatium for the pain and suffering and general disability which the injured person would sustain over the remainder of his life, or the period over which the payments might continue. Such a lump sum was not, and cannot be, regarded as such a solatium against general damages.

G It was a payment which fell within the ambit of section 2(1), and is of the nature specifically referred to in section 2(6) of the Act.

H

I share Peter Pain J.'s difficulty, expressed by him as part of his judgment in Denman v. Essex Area Health Authority [1984] Q.B. 735, as to how meaning can be given to this subsection if the construction of section 2(1) is that for which the defendant contends. Accordingly, I agree with the construction of section 2(1) expressed by Fox L.J. and Lloyd L.J., reinforced as that construction is, it seems to me, by the authorities cited, and, in particular, by the decision of this court in the Hultquist case. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LLOYD L.J. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Fox and Stocker L.JJ.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Bankruptcy—Property passing to trustee—Chose in action—Claim in negligence by bankrupt—Trustee assigning cause of action back to bankrupt—Failure to obtain requisite permission for assignment—Writ issued before notice of assignment given to defendants—Whether writ nullity—Whether bankrupt having locus standi to prosecute action—Whether limitation period interrupted by writ—Whether action to be set aside—Bankruptcy Act 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59) ss. 55(1), 56(4)¹

In May 1980, the plaintiffs instructed a firm of solicitors, the first defendant, to advise whether a contract of sale was enforceable against them. Advice was obtained from counsel, the second defendant, who gave his opinion on 20 May 1980. The first defendant continued to act for the plaintiffs until 24 September 1981. In 1984, both plaintiffs were declared bankrupt. On 7 February 1986 the trustee in bankruptcy assigned to the plaintiffs all claims and legal rights of action which the trustee might have had against the defendants, the plaintiffs covenanting

S.56: "The trustee may, with the permission of the [Department of Trade and Industry] do all or any of the following things:— . . . (4) Accept as the consideration for the sale of any property of the bankrupt a sum of money payable at a future time . . ."

to account to the trustee for so much of the proceeds of the intended action as might be necessary to discharge outstanding debts and costs in the bankruptcies. On 11 April 1986 the defendants each received a letter from the plaintiffs alleging (for the first time) professional negligence, and a writ was issued on 2 May 1986 when the defendants had no notice of the assignment which they were given by a letter dated 4 June 1986. On 21 and 22 August 1986 summonses were issued by the defendants under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 seeking to set aside the writ on the ground that the plaintiffs lacked the necessary locus standi to bring the action. The registrar accepted the defendants' contentions that the action when commenced was a nullity, since the plaintiffs' causes of action were then in law vested in the trustee in bankruptcy; that that defect was not cured when the plaintiffs became legal assignees of the causes of action on notice being given to the defendants on 4 June 1986; and that, further, since the trustee had not obtained permission for the assignment from the Department of Trade and Industry, as required by section 56(4) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914, the assignment was void, and he set the writ aside. On the plaintiffs' appeal, the judge directed that the locus standi of the plaintiffs to prosecute the action should be before the court as a preliminary issue.

On the appeal and the preliminary issue:—

Held, (1) allowing the appeal against the registrar's order striking out the action, that the issues involved were wholly unsuitable to be dealt with on a striking out application under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19; and that the plaintiffs' action was neither scandalous, frivolous or vexatious, nor, unless and until the difficult issues relating to their locus standi were decided against them, an abuse of process (post, p. 597B–C).

(2) Giving judgment for the plaintiffs on the preliminary issue, that on the plaintiffs' bankruptcies their causes of action in negligence became vested in law in their trustee in bankruptcy, without any need for written notice of the bankruptcies to be given to the persons subject to the choses in action; that the assignment of the causes of action by the trustee in bankruptcy back to the plaintiffs was a transaction of sale falling within both section 55(1) and section 56(4) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914; that those provisions had to be read together, where the consideration for a transaction, if payable, was to be payable at a future time, and that, so read, the permission of the Department of Trade and Industry to the assignment was required; but that the failure of the trustee in bankruptcy to obtain the necessary permission did not prevent the deed of assignment of the causes of action from taking effect on execution as an equitable assignment, and on 4 June 1986 as a legal assignment to the plaintiffs; that an equitable assignee of a chose in action had locus standi to sue on the chose in action; that the assignor in whom the legal title was vested ought to be a party to such an action, but an action commenced without him was not a nullity, though it was liable to be stayed and that the equitable assignee could not recover damages or a perpetual injunction until the assignor had been joined; that, accordingly, the writ was not a nullity, and as from 4 June 1986, when the plaintiffs became legal assignees of the causes of action, the defect that would previously have prevented the plaintiffs from obtaining judgment against the defendants was removed; and that, accordingly, the plaintiffs had locus standi to prosecute the action (post, pp. 597D–F, 599G, 600G–601C, 602B–C, 603F–G, 606C–D, 610E–G).

Lee v. Sangster (1857) 2 C.B.N.S. 1 and Clark v. Smith [1940] 1 K.B. 126, C.A. considered.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL and PRELIMINARY ISSUE

By a writ dated 2 May 1986 the plaintiffs, David Brading Weddell and Florence Ruby Weddell, claimed against the defendants, J.A. Pearce & Major, a firm of solicitors, and Robin Miller, damages for professional negligence in respect of the defendants' failure, following their retainer on or after 6 May 1980 as solicitors and counsel, to exercise all reasonable care, skill, diligence and competence in advising and acting for the plaintiffs in respect of, inter alia, the purchase of a property at Tintagel, Cornwall, and in particular as to whether they could legally withdraw from a contract for the purchase of the property. On summonses dated 21 and 22 August 1986, issued by the second and first defendants, respectively, the registrar set aside the writ. The

- A plaintiffs appealed and Scott J. directed the trial, with the hearing of the appeal, of a preliminary issue as to the plaintiffs' locus standi to bring the action, namely: Whether the writ ought to be set aside on the grounds that (1) at the date of issue thereof no notice had been given to the defendants of the assignment of the causes of action dated 7 February 1986 and made between the trustee in bankruptcy of the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs; and (2) the permission of the Department of Trade and Industry was not given for the assignment pursuant to sections 56(4) and 20(10) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914.

The case was heard in chambers, and judgment was given in open court.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

- C John Matthew Bowyer for the plaintiffs.
Andrew Simmonds for the first defendant.
Edward Davidson for the second defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

- D 9 March. SCOTT J. read the following judgment. The matter before me began as an appeal by the plaintiffs against an order made by Mr. Registrar Trayhurn in the Plymouth District Registry setting aside the writ as being frivolous or vexatious or an abuse of the process of the court. The plaintiffs are Mr. and Mrs. Weddell. There are two defendants. The first defendant is a firm of solicitors, J. A. Pearce & Major. The second defendant is Mr. Robin Miller.

- E In May 1980 the plaintiffs gave the first defendant instructions to advise whether a contract of sale was enforceable against them. The advice of counsel, the second defendant, was taken. The second defendant was instructed on one occasion only. His opinion was dated 20 May 1980. The first defendant continued to act for the plaintiffs until 24 September 1981. Nothing thereafter was heard by either defendant about the matter until each received a letter dated 11 April 1986 from solicitors acting for the plaintiffs. Each letter made an allegation of negligence. As against the first defendant it was alleged that they had been negligent in advising the plaintiffs in May 1980 and subsequently in connection with the contract of sale. As against the second defendant it was alleged that the advice given by his opinion of 20 May 1980 was negligent. Although not yet time barred, these were stale claims.
- F

- G On 2 May 1986 a writ was issued. It was served on the defendants on 6 May 1986 and was followed on 1 July 1986 by a statement of claim. The writ and statement of claim raised the allegations of negligence to which I have referred. On 21 August 1986 the second defendant issued a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 seeking an order setting aside the writ. On 22 August 1986 the first defendant issued a like summons. The ground on which this relief was sought related to the locus standi of the plaintiffs to bring the action.
- H

The relevant facts are these. On 18 September 1984 Mr. Weddell was adjudicated bankrupt. On 30 November 1984 Mrs. Weddell was adjudicated bankrupt. Each of them had the same trustee in bankruptcy. By deed of assignment dated 7 February 1986 the trustee in bankruptcy assigned to the plaintiffs

"all claims and legal rights of action which the trustee may have against Messrs. Pearce & Major, Mr. Robin Miller and all debts due therefrom for the benefit of the property and estate of each of the bankrupts and the bankrupts jointly . . .”

A

The deed contained covenants by the plaintiffs to account to the trustee for all or so much of the net proceeds of the intended action as might be necessary to discharge the outstanding debts and costs of the bankruptcies. Notice of the assignment had not been given to the defendants when the writ was issued on 2 May 1986. Notice thereof was eventually given to the defendants by a letter dated 4 June 1986 from the plaintiffs’ solicitors. It is not in dispute that, at the date of that notice, the cause of action against the second defendant and some, at least, of the causes of action against the first defendant were time barred.

B

The defendants submit, first, that the effect of the adjudications was to vest the plaintiffs’ causes of action in their trustee in bankruptcy; secondly, that the assignment of the causes in action by the trustee to the plaintiffs took effect as a legal assignment only when written notice thereof was, on 4 June 1986, given to the defendants: see section 136(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925; thirdly, that when the writ was issued the causes of action remained vested in the trustee; and, consequently, that the plaintiffs lacked locus standi to commence the action. It is contended that the action when commenced was a nullity and was not cured when, on 4 June 1986, the plaintiffs became legal assignees of the causes of action.

The defendants have a further point. It is the fact that the trustee in bankruptcy entered into the transaction effected by the deed of assignment without having obtained permission, pursuant to section 56 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914, to do so. Since in neither bankruptcy is there a committee of inspection, the requisite permission, if permission was needed, was that of the Department of Trade and Industry: see section 20(10) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914. The defendants contend that in the absence of the requisite permission the trustee had no power to assign the causes of action to the plaintiffs, that the assignment was void and that, for that reason also, the plaintiffs lacked locus standi to commence the action.

E

F

The registrar accepted the defendants’ submissions and set aside the writ. The plaintiffs appealed. The appeal raised the preliminary question whether notice of appeal had been given before time for appeal expired and, if not, whether an extension of time should be granted. I dealt with this preliminary question in a judgment which I gave on 16 February 1987. I held that the notice of appeal was not out of time and that an extension of time was not necessary. I must now deal with the substance of the matter.

G

Argument on the issues raised by the appeal began on Monday, 16 February 1987, and continued until Friday, 20 February 1987. A number of difficult points of law were debated. On some there was no clear authority. On others there was conflicting authority. At the conclusion of argument I reserved my judgment. In the course of the hearing I formed the strong view, first, that the nature of the issues being debated made the matter inappropriate for a striking out application under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19; but, secondly, that it was highly desirable that the locus standi of the plaintiffs to prosecute the action should be settled as a preliminary to the further progress of the action. I was, therefore, receptive to an application made by Mr. Davidson, for the second defendant, for leave to bring the issue of locus standi before the court as

A a preliminary issue in case I should be of opinion that the appeal should be allowed on procedural rather than substantive grounds. He drafted a preliminary issue and, on his undertaking to issue a pro-forma summons, I directed the trial of that issue as a preliminary issue and treated that issue as before me. Mr. Simmonds, for the first defendant, and Mr. Bowyer, who appeared for the plaintiffs, agreed with this procedure.

B At the conclusion of argument I indicated that the appeal against the order of the registrar would be allowed. I allow the appeal on the ground that the issues are wholly unsuitable to be dealt with on a striking out application under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19. Without prejudice to my conclusions on the issues of law that have been argued before me, I regard the plaintiffs' action as neither scandalous, frivolous nor vexatious. Nor, unless and until the difficult issues relating to their locus standi are decided against the plaintiffs, is their action an abuse of process.

C The preliminary issue is in these terms:

D "Whether the writ in this action ought to be set aside on the grounds that:— (1) At the date of issue thereof no notice had been given to the defendants of the assignment dated 7 February 1986 and made between the trustee in bankruptcy of the plaintiffs of the one part and the plaintiffs of the other part. (2) The permission of the Department of Trade and Industry was not given for the said assignment pursuant to sections 56(4) and 20(10) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914."

E Mr. Bowyer's first submission on behalf of the plaintiffs was that a legal chose in action vested in a bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy did not vest in law in the trustee in bankruptcy until written notice of the bankruptcy had been given to the person or persons subject to the chose. Until that notice had been given, the trustee's title to the chose in action was, Mr. Bowyer submitted, an equitable title only. The legal title remained in the bankrupt who had, therefore, locus standi to maintain an action. This submission contradicts a number of provisions contained in the Bankruptcy Act 1914 and is, in my view, wholly misconceived. Section 18(1) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 provides:

G "Where a receiving order is made against a debtor, then, if the creditors at the first meeting or any adjournment thereof by ordinary resolution resolve that the debtor be adjudged bankrupt, or pass no resolution, or if the creditors do not meet, or if a composition or scheme is not approved in pursuance of this Act within 14 days after the conclusion of the examination of the debtor or such further time as the court may allow, the court shall adjudge the debtor bankrupt; and thereupon the property of the bankrupt shall become divisible among his creditors and shall vest in a trustee."

Section 48(5) provides:

H "Where any part of the property of the bankrupt consists of things in action, such things shall be deemed to have been duly assigned to the trustee."

Section 53(3) provides:

"The property of the bankrupt shall pass from trustee to trustee, including under that term the official receiver when he fills the office of trustee, and shall vest in the trustee for the time being during his continuance in office, without any conveyance, assignment, or transfer whatever.”

Mr. Bowyer's submission is, in effect, that the plaintiffs' causes of action against the defendants were not duly assigned to the trustee and did not vest in him. Very clear and binding authority would be necessary in order to support a submission so at variance with the statutory provisions. There is none.

B

Mr. Bowyer referred me to a number of cases dealing with assignments of equitable choses in action. Those cases establish that an equitable interest belonging to a bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy vests in the bankrupt's trustee subject to the equitable rules as to priorities established by Dearle v. Hall (1828) 3 Russ. 1: see In re Atkinson (1852) 2 De G.M. & G. 140; In re Barr's Trusts (1858) 4 K. & J. 219; Palmer v. Locke (1881) 18 Ch.D. 381 and In re Stone's Will (1893) 37 S.J. 354. But in none of those cases was there any suggestion that anything less than the bankrupt's full and complete interest in the chose in action became vested in the trustee. The notice that the trustee had to give to perfect his title was necessary in order to prevent other equitable interests obtaining priority; it was not necessary in order to perfect his title vis-à-vis the bankrupt. This is expressly made clear by Chitty J. in In re Stone's Will. The report of his judgment in the Solicitors' Journal commences thus:

“Chitty, J., said the question was one of general importance under the Bankruptcy Act 1883. It was plain that the property vested in the trustee, but he had failed, without any fault of his own, to give notice to the trustees of the fund. Now where a person entitled to an equitable chose in action such as a share in a trust fund assigned it, the property passed, and on the assignment the equitable interest vested in the assignee, and the assignor had no interest left. But a rule had long prevailed in equity, not in favour of the assignor, but in favour of subsequent assignees, that the assignee must give notice to the holders of the fund, in order to perfect his title, not as against the assignor, but as against subsequent assignees.”

E

F

Those cases, in my judgment, are of no assistance to Mr. Bowyer. Mr. Bowyer referred me also to cases which establish that a trustee in bankruptcy can obtain no better title to a chose in action than was held by the bankrupt: see, e.g., Stuart v. Cockerell (1869) L.R. 8 Eq. 607. These cases, too, do not assist him.

G

Finally, Mr. Bowyer referred me to two decisions of Wright J., Mercer v. Vans Colina (1897) 67 L.J. Q.B. 424 and In re Beall, Ex parte Official Receiver [1899] 1 Q.B. 688. In each case, the bankrupt, after the commencement of the bankruptcy, had acquired a legal chose in action and had purported to assign the chose for value to a third party. Wright J. had to decide who had priority—the trustee in bankruptcy or the third party. He held that priority depended on whether the third party had perfected his title by notice to the debtor before the trustee had intervened to claim the fund. These decisions, submitted Mr. Bowyer, show that a trustee in bankruptcy has to give notice before a legal title to a chose in action can vest in him. The cases show nothing of the sort. The cases were concerned with after-acquired property and Wright J. was applying the rule in Cohen v. Mitchell (1890) 25 Q.B.D. 262, in which Lord Esher M.R. said, at p. 266:

H

A "Of course all the property which belongs to the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy becomes at once the property of the trustee. But does all the property acquired by the bankrupt after his bankruptcy belong to the trustee absolutely, so that the bankrupt is divested of all interest and property in it, or does it remain the property of the bankrupt, so that at any rate he can deal with it until the trustee interferes?"

He then stated this principle, at p. 267:

"until the trustee intervenes, all transactions by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing with him bona fide and for value, in respect of his after-acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee."

Fry L.J. said, at p. 268:

"The clause in the Bankruptcy Act which vests the property in the trustee for distribution amongst the creditors includes all such property as shall belong to or may be vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, and also which may be acquired by or devolve upon him before his discharge. If one merely confined one's attention to the words of the section, the reader might suppose that both those kinds of property vested absolutely in the trustee—vested in him in precisely the same manner. But the inconvenience of such a conclusion has been apparent not only from the present statute, but from many statutes which have preceded it, which contain substantially the same language. It is obvious that there is no difficulty in divesting out of the bankrupt and vesting in the trustee the whole of the property which was in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy; but, unless (to use the language of Lord Mansfield) the bankrupt is to be made the slave of the trustee, it is obvious that he may have dealings with his fellow-men, and, in the exercise of his industry, he may acquire rights and he may acquire property, and therefore there is the greatest difficulty in supposing that every right acquired and every piece of property devolving upon the bankrupt after his bankruptcy and before his discharge vests in the trustee, in the same manner in which the property at the commencement of the bankruptcy has vested in the trustee."

E

G Those passages make Mr. Bowyer's use of Wright J.'s two decisions in Mercer v. Vans Colina, 67 L.J.Q.B. 424 and In re Beall, Ex parte Official Receiver [1899] 1 Q.B. 688 wholly impermissible.

In my judgment, the plaintiffs' causes of action in negligence became vested in their trustee in bankruptcy and, in law, remained so vested until written notice of the assignment thereof back to the plaintiffs was given to the defendants on 4 June 1986.

H

Mr. Bowyer's second submission was that under the deed of assignment of 7 February 1986 the plaintiffs became equitable assignees of the causes of action and thereby acquired a sufficient locus standi to issue the writ. This submission raises two points. First, it requires a view as to the effect on the assignment of the failure of the trustee in bankruptcy to obtain the permission of the Department of Trade and Industry. Mr. Bowyer submitted that permission was not needed and, alternatively, that the absence of permission had no effect on the efficacy of the assignment. Secondly, there is the question as to the competency of an equitable assignee of a cause of action in damages to sue on the cause of action. As to the first point, I should start with the relevant provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1914. Section 55 of the Act contains five subsections. Each specifies some transaction or act that the trustee may enter into or do. Subsection (1) permits the trustee to:

“Sell all or any part of the property of the bankrupt (including the goodwill of the business, if any, and the book debts due or growing due to the bankrupt), by public auction or private contract, with power to transfer the whole thereof to any person or company, or to sell the same in parcels: . . .”

I need not read the other four subsections. Section 56 specifies transactions and acts that the trustee may enter into or do with the permission of the committee of inspection or, as the case may be, the Department of Trade and Industry. The section provides:

“The trustee may, with the permission of the committee of inspection, do all or any of the following things:—(1) Carry on the business of the bankrupt, so far as may be necessary for the beneficial winding up of the same; (2) Bring, institute, or defend any action or other legal proceeding relating to the property of the bankrupt; . . . (4) Accept as the consideration for the sale of any property of the bankrupt a sum of money payable at a future time subject to such stipulations as to security and otherwise as the committee think fit; (5) Mortgage or pledge any part of the property of the bankrupt for the purpose of raising money for the payment of his debts; . . . (8) Make such compromise or other arrangement as may be thought expedient with respect to any claim arising out of or incidental to the property of the bankrupt, made or capable of being made on the trustee by any person or by the trustee on any person; . . .”

It has been submitted by Mr. Simmonds for the first defendant and Mr. Davidson for the second defendant that the powers of a trustee in bankruptcy to dispose of assets of the estate are, save for the power to disclaim onerous property conferred by section 54, to be found in one or other of these two sections. A disposition by a trustee of assets of the estate which could not be justified under one or other of the provisions of these sections would, they submitted, be ultra vires and void. They submitted that the transaction effected by the deed of assignment fell within section 56(4) and so required the permission of the Department of Trade and Industry. The permission of the department was not obtained and consequently, they submitted, the transaction was ultra vires the trustee, and the deed of assignment was void. If that is right, then plainly the plaintiffs had no locus standi to issue the writ.

All counsel agreed that the transaction between the plaintiffs and the trustee represented a sale of the causes of action to the plaintiffs and fell within section 55(1). An assignment of a cause of action in consideration of a covenant by the assignee to pay all or part of the net proceeds to the assignor would not generally be regarded as a transaction of sale, and, in the absence of authority, I would not myself so regard it. There is, however, Court of Appeal authority that a transaction of this character does represent a sale within section 55(1): see Ramsey v. Hartley [1977] 1 W.L.R. 686. That decision is binding on me and

A requires me to treat the transaction in the present case as a sale falling within section 55(1). I would otherwise, I confess, have regarded the transaction not as a sale within section 55(1) but as an "arrangement" falling within section 56(8).

B A sale under section 55(1) does not require anyone's permission. But Mr. Simmonds and Mr. Davidson point out that the consideration payable to the trustee under the deed of assignment will, if it becomes payable at all, be payable at a future time and that, accordingly, the transaction comes within section 56(4) and requires the permission of the Department of Trade and Industry. I agree. In a transaction of sale where the consideration is to be payable at a future time, section 55(1) and section 56(4) must, in my view, be read together, and, so read, require the requisite permission to be given to the transaction. I reject
C Mr. Bowyer's submission that permission was not needed in the present case.

In Ramsey v. Hartley it was assumed that the trustee in bankruptcy had obtained the requisite permission to enter into the transaction: see per Megaw L.J., at p. 695. In the present case it is common ground that the trustee did not do so. So what was the effect of the absence of the requisite permission? Mr. Bowyer submitted that the purpose of permission being required for the section 56 transactions was to protect the bankrupt's estate and that a failure to obtain the requisite permission did not provide a ground of defence to third parties dealing with the trustee. I readily accept his submission as to the purpose of section 56. It is supported by the cases he cited: Lee v. Sangster (1857) 2 C.B.N.S. 1; In re Branson, Ex parte the Trustee [1914] 2 K.B. 701; Clark v. Smith [1940] 1 K.B. 126 and In re A Debtor (No. 26A of 1975) [1985] 1
E W.L.R. 6. But none of these cases, save perhaps Clark v. Smith [1940] 1 K.B. 126 in an incidental respect, involved dispositions by the trustee of assets of the estate. In the first two cases the trustee in bankruptcy had commenced legal proceedings without the requisite permission. The omission did not, it was held, constitute a point which the defendant could take as a defence. In Lee v. Sangster, 2 C.B.N.S. 1, Williams J., F delivering the judgment of the court, said, at p. 6:

"On consideration, however, we are satisfied that the statute intended to make the obtaining of the requisite leave a matter only between the assignees and the court of bankruptcy, and not at all between the assignees and the other party to the suit."

G In In re Branson, Ex parte The Trustee [1914] 2 K.B. 701 Horridge J. said, at p. 704:

"My ruling is that the obtaining of the consent of the committee of inspection to the taking of proceedings is merely a provision for the protection of the estate and is not one which the respondent or the defendant in any proceedings by the trustee is entitled to avail himself of in answer to those proceedings."

H In Clark v. Smith [1940] 1 K.B. 126 a trustee had, with the permission of the committee of inspection, carried on the business of the bankrupt and had been given by the defendant a guarantee indemnifying the estate against any loss thereby incurred. It was held that the case did not come within section 56(1) in that the business was being carried on as a speculative trading venture and not for the purpose of winding up the estate. But the contract of guarantee was nonetheless enforceable. The impropriety being committed by the trustee did not constitute a ground of defence available to the defendant. In In re A Debtor (No. 26A of 1975) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 6 a trustee, without the requisite permission, engaged solicitors to conduct legal proceedings. He was liable to the solicitors under the contract of retainer he had entered into.

Those cases were not dealing with the question as to the effect of the disposition of assets made by a trustee in bankruptcy without permission, in circumstances that required permission. The cases do, however, establish that the lack of the requisite permission does not have the consequence that the action taken by the trustee is a nullity. In Lee v. Sangster, 2 C.B.N.S. 1 and in In re Branson, Ex parte The Trustee [1914] 2 K.B. 701 the trustee had commenced proceedings without the requisite permission. The action was nevertheless held to be properly constituted.

Mr. Davidson and Mr. Simmonds have submitted that where the disposition of assets is concerned, a trustee in bankruptcy has only the powers given to him by the Act. If the trustee enters into some transaction purporting to dispose of assets and cannot find authority for the transaction in some enabling provision of the Act, the transaction is, they submitted, ultra vires and the disposition a nullity.

In my judgment, these arguments confuse vires with propriety. If an asset of the estate is vested in the trustee then the trustee has, in my judgment, power, in the strict sense, to divest himself of it. Whether it is proper for him to divest himself of the asset is another matter. It may be that if a trustee in bankruptcy entered into a transaction that was outside his powers under the Act and in the course of so doing disposed of assets of the estate, the disposition could, in suitable circumstances, be set aside. But unless and until set aside it would, in my judgment, stand. Whether or not it would be voidable, it would not be void.

Mr. Simmonds sought to draw an analogy between section 56 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 and section 29(1) of the Charities Act 1960. Under the latter section the consent of the Charity Commissioners to sales of certain charity land is necessary. It is well settled that a sale made without the requisite consent is void: see, e.g., Manchester Diocesan Council for Education v. Commercial & General Investments Ltd. [1970] 1 W.L.R. 241 and Michael Richards Properties Ltd. v. St. Saviour's Parish, Southwark, Corporation of Wardens [1975] 3 All E.R. 416. So, Mr. Simmonds argued, a section 56 transaction entered into without the requisite permission should be held to be void. I do not think, however, that the analogy is apt. Section 29(1) of the Charities Act 1960 provides that "no property . . . shall, without an order of the court, or of the commissioners . . . be sold . . ." This is the language of prohibition. It is very different from the language of sections 55 and 56 of the Act of 1914, "The trustee may . . . do all or any of the following things:— . . ." This is enabling language, allowing the trustee to do with safety the things described in the sections.

Section 56(1) authorises the trustee, with permission, to carry on the bankrupt's business with a view to winding it up. Clark v. Smith [1940] 1 K.B. 126 was a case where the trustee was carrying on the business for a different purpose. The case did not fall within section 56(1). The trustee's actions were not authorised under any section of the Act. But it could not, in my view, sensibly have been argued that dispositions of assets made by the trustee in the course of carrying on the business were void. Indeed, Slessor L.J. said, at p. 136:

A “as against the world, the carrying on of the business by the trustee can create legal relations between him and third parties, either as debtor or creditor, incurred in the carrying on of the business, notwithstanding that it is carried on otherwise than solely for the beneficial winding up of the estate. . . . it cannot be said that this contract or the carrying on of the business thereunder is illegal in the sense in which the learned judge has used the word. I do not think it can be said that it is void as being ultra vires, because the trustee is in my opinion competent to carry on the business and to create legal liabilities as between himself and third persons with whom he deals in carrying on the business, whether he does or does not do so for the purpose of the beneficial winding up of the estate.”

C Test the point also by reference to section 56(5). Suppose a trustee, with the requisite permission, mortgages part of the property of the bankrupt. What is the position of the mortgagee if the purpose of the trustee is to raise money for a purpose other than the payment of the bankrupt's debts? The arguments of Mr. Simmonds and Mr. Davidson would have the mortgage be a nullity. In my judgment that cannot be so. What concern would it be of the mortgagee what use the trustee proposed for the mortgage money?

E In my judgment, a disposition of assets by a trustee in bankruptcy passes title to the donee whether or not the transaction is authorised under some provision of the Act and whether or not a permission made requisite by section 56 is absent. If the transaction were tainted by breach of trust on the part of the trustee, the transaction might, under the general law, be liable to be set aside except against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The position would be no different, in my view, from that in which any trustee had committed a breach of trust. But if the only impropriety were the absence of permission made requisite by section 56, the transaction would not, in my opinion, be liable on that account alone to be set aside. Strangers to the bankruptcy cannot raise as a defence the absence of permission; it must follow that they can deal safely with the trustee without concern as to whether permission has or has not been obtained.

G Accordingly, in my judgment, failure of the plaintiffs' trustee in bankruptcy to obtain the permission of the Department of Trade and Industry to his transaction with the plaintiffs did not prevent the deed of assignment taking effect on execution as an equitable assignment and on 4 June 1986 as a legal assignment. On this point the defendants, in my judgment, fail.

H I now come to the second point. The deed of arrangement was executed on 7 February 1986. Written notice thereof was not given to the defendants until 4 June 1986. In the intervening period, the causes of action remained at law vested in the trustee in bankruptcy. The causes of action were vested in the plaintiffs in equity but not in law. The writ was issued on 2 May 1986. So these questions arise. Does an equitable owner of a cause of action in damages have locus standi to sue on the cause of action as plaintiff, if he joins the legal owner of the cause of action as a defendant? If the answer is “Yes,” what is the status of such an action if the legal owner is not joined as a defendant? Is it a nullity? Is it effective to stop time running for the purposes of the statutes of limitation?

There are three cases to which I have been referred which bear on these questions. First, there is the very well known case William Brandt's Sons & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co. Ltd. [1905] A.C. 454. This case is usually cited as authority on the nature of a valid equitable assignment. It bears also, however, on the question with which I am concerned. The facts are important. Brandt's were bankers and had advanced money to a client to enable the client to purchase goods. The client sold the goods to Dunlop and delivered them to Dunlop with an invoice requesting Dunlop to remit the purchase price to Brandt's. On delivery of the goods to Dunlop, the client sent Brandt's a written document authorising payment of the purchase price to Brandt's. Brandt's sent this document to Dunlop with a covering letter. On these facts it was held by the House of Lords, differing from the Court of Appeal, that there had been an equitable assignment to Brandt's of the purchase price due from Dunlop. It was also held by the House of Lords that the covering letter and the enclosed document gave notice to Dunlop of the equitable assignment. In the event, however, Dunlop paid the purchase price to the client, not to Brandt's. Shortly thereafter the client became insolvent, so Brandt's sued Dunlop for the price. Brandt's were equitable assignees. But the client, in whom legal title to the chose in action remained, was not joined as a party to the action. Nonetheless Brandt's action succeeded. Lord Macnaghten, with whose judgment the Earl of Halsbury L.C. and Lord Lindley concurred, said, at p. 462:

"Strictly speaking, Kramrisch & Co., or their trustee in bankruptcy, should have been brought before the court. But no action is now dismissed for want of parties, and the trustee in bankruptcy had really no interest in the matter. At your Lordships' bar, the Dunlops disclaimed any wish to have him present, and in both courts below they claimed to retain for their own use any balance that might remain after satisfying Brandt's."

Lord James said, at p. 464, "The defect in the parties to the suit can be remedied." This case seems to me clear authority for the view that an equitable assignee of a chose in action has locus standi to sue on the chose in action; that, strictly, the person in whom the chose in action is in law vested ought to be a party; but that the absence of that person does not render the action a nullity. The same conclusion can be derived from Performing Right Society Ltd. v. London Theatre of Varieties Ltd. [1922] 2 K.B. 433, C.A.; [1924] A.C. 1, H.L.(E.). In that case the plaintiff was equitable assignee of the copyright in a certain song. The defendant, a music hall proprietor, permitted the song to be sung in its music hall. There was a clear infringement of copyright. The plaintiff sued for an injunction and damages. The owner at law of the copyright was not a party to the action. Branson J., at first instance, gave judgment for the plaintiff for an injunction and damages [1922] 1 K.B. 539. The Court of Appeal, however, held that the plaintiff, the equitable owner of the copyright, could not obtain either damages or a perpetual injunction without adding the legal owner of the copyright as a party to the action. So the appeal was allowed and the judgment of Branson J. set aside. But the action was not dismissed. Instead, the Court of Appeal gave the plaintiff leave to amend the writ and subsequent pleadings by adding the legal owner as co-plaintiff. It is clear, therefore, that the action was not a nullity. The House of Lords upheld the view

3 W.L.R.

Weddell v. Pearce & Major (Ch.D.)

Scott J.

A taken of the matter by the Court of Appeal. Viscount Cave L.C. said, at p. 14:

B “That an equitable owner may commence proceedings alone, and may obtain interim protection in the form of an interlocutory injunction, is not in doubt; but it was always the rule of the Court of Chancery, and is, I think, the rule of the Supreme Court, that, in general, when a plaintiff has only an equitable right in the thing
C demanded, the person having the legal right to demand it must in due course be made a party to the action: . . . If this were not so, a defendant after defeating the claim of an equitable claimant might have to resist like proceedings by the legal owner, or by persons claiming under him as assignees for value without notice of any prior equity, and proceedings might be indefinitely and oppressively multiplied.”

Viscount Finlay expressed the same view. He referred to Brandt's case [1905] A.C. 454 and said, at p. 19:

D “Except under very special circumstances the ordinary rule should be observed,* that the legal owner should be a party to the proceedings. There may possibly be cases in which a person who has made an equitable assignment might by a subsequent assignment have transferred the legal interest in the same work to a purchaser for value without notice, whose title would prevail over the merely equitable right, and such a possibility is one reason for the rule of making the legal owner a party. But whatever may be the balance of convenience, the established rules of practice should be adhered E to, even in cases, of which I think the present is one, when their observance in all probability will serve no useful purpose.”

And he said, at p. 20:

F “Some observations made by Lord Macnaghten in William Brandt's Sons & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co. Ltd. [1905] A.C. 454, 462, were, it was argued, inconsistent with the claim of the defendant in the present case to have the suit dismissed owing to the non-joinder of the owner of the legal estate. I do not think that these observations should be read as overruling the general rule of practice as to the necessity of joining the owner of the legal estate and the right of the defendant to have the suit dismissed if the plaintiff refuses or neglects to join him in any case not falling within the recognised G exceptions to the rule.”

On the same point, Lord Sumner said, at p. 30:

H “It was indeed suggested by the appellants that the passage at the end of the opinion of Lord Macnaghten in Brandt's Sons & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber supported and indeed decided the point in issue in their favour, on the ground that the same objection was taken then as is taken by the respondents here, and that your Lordships' House refused to give effect to it. The question is whether it was really the same objection, for certainly the House did not give effect to it. The subject of the dispute was the right to be paid a debt which was due to the assignor till it was by him equitably assigned to the appellants. There was accordingly a possibility of the debtors being exposed to duplicate claims. Lord Macnaghten accepts the rule, for which the respondents now contend, that the assignor ought to be made a party in order that he might be bound, but points out that Brandt's case was an exception to it. Plainly the House did not consider itself to be departing from established rules of practice, nor has the case ever been so regarded. It has, therefore, now to be shown that the present case is within the principle of the exception to which effect was then given. If the assignor, Kramrisch, was not made a party, he would not be bound; was it not possible that the debtors, the Dunlop Company, might be exposed to claims by him or his trustee in bankruptcy? Kramrisch, however, had already been settled with and the Dunlop Company held his receipt. It appears on reference to the arguments in the courts below that this fact was relied on. Kramrisch was therefore bound already. The respondents admitted that what they wanted was not the presence but the absence of the assignor, and that they did not propose to pay the assignor but desired to pay nobody, and this mere non-joinder of parties was not allowed to relieve them. Brandt's case is thus distinguishable, for the present case is otherwise."

It seems, therefore, that an equitable assignee can sue in his own name. He cannot, however, recover damages or a perpetual injunction without joining as a party the assignor in whom legal title to the chose in action is vested. The same would apply to recovery of a debt. The reason for this is, however, a pragmatic one. The debtor must not be at risk of suit by the legal owner of the chose. To put the point another way, the debtor must, if he is adjudged liable, be in a position to obtain a complete discharge from his liability by paying the plaintiff, the equitable assignee. In the special circumstances of Brandt's case [1905] A.C. 454, where, wrongly, the legal owner of the chose had already been paid, the problem did not arise. Dunlop had already obtained, by payment, a discharge from any liability to Kramrisch. In most cases, however, if the legal owner of the chose were not a party to the action, the defendant might, notwithstanding he had paid the successful plaintiff, the equitable assignee, nevertheless remain liable to the legal owner. The legal owner, after all, might dispute the validity of the equitable assignment, or might disclose a prior equitable interest in some third party. Reasons on these lines for requiring the legal owner of the chose to be a party were expressed in Performing Right Society Ltd. v. London Theatre of Varieties Ltd. [1924] A.C. 1 by Viscount Cave L.C. at p. 14, by Viscount Finlay at p. 19, and by Lord Sumner at p. 31.

In neither of the authorities to which I have referred was the action, begun by an equitable assignee without the assignor being joined as a party, treated as a nullity. In Brandt's case [1905] A.C. 454, final judgment on the chose in action was obtained. In the Performing Right Society case [1924] A.C. 1, an opportunity was given to the plaintiff to join the assignor. It is, I think, a common practice for an action commenced by an equitable assignee to be stayed pending joinder, either as co-plaintiff or as co-defendant, of the assignor. E. M. Bowden's Patents Syndicate Ltd. v. Herbert Smith & Co. [1904] 2 Ch. 86 is an example of a case where that was done. The practice is endorsed by the terms of R.S.C., Ord. 15, r. 6(2)(b)(i) which authorises the joinder of "any person . . . whose presence before the court is necessary to ensure that all matters in dispute in the cause or matter may be effectually and completely determined and adjudicated upon . . ."

Weddell v. Pearce & Major (Ch.D.)

Scott J.

A In The Supreme Court Practice 1985, vol. 1, p. 177, at 15/6/2 there is a note:

“The addition of a co-plaintiff may be made where the original plaintiff’s cause of action is defective, e.g. where the legal owner is required to be added (The Charlotte [1908] P. 206). Thus the legal owner of a patent will be added in an action for infringement brought by the equitable owner [Bowden’s Patents Syndicate v. Smith [1904] 2 Ch. 86, 122] so in the case of copyright (see Performing Right Society v. London Theatre of Varieties [1924] A.C. 1).”

In my judgment, therefore, it is clearly established that an action commenced by an equitable assignee without joining the assignor is not a nullity. It may be liable to be stayed until the proper parties have been joined, but it is not a nullity.

E

F

G

Mr. Simmonds and Mr. Davidson argued the contrary. The action commenced by the plaintiffs on 2 May 1986 was, they submitted, a nullity. They relied on the decision of Roskill J. in Compania Colombiana de Seguros v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co. [1965] 1 Q.B. 101. The facts of that case were highly complex but the relevant question for present purposes was whether an action for damages, commenced by an insurance company in England on 7 January 1960, was time barred. The cause of action had accrued on 12 December 1954. The insurance company was assignee of the cause of action. By reason of rule 6 of article III of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, the cause of action was time barred unless brought within one year after it had accrued. So the action brought in England in 1960 was, apparently, time barred. An action had, however, been commenced in New York on 2 November 1955 by, in effect, although not in name, the insurance company. On 2 November 1955 the insurance company was equitable assignee only. Notice of the assignment was, for the purposes of section 136 of the Law of Property Act 1925, given on 5 November 1955. The New York action was dismissed on 16 May 1956, but it was argued that the effect of the New York action having been instituted within a year from 12 December 1954 was to stop time running. Roskill J. rejected that argument and held the action in England to be time barred. He so held on the ground that an action commenced in some other court could not prevent the English action from being time barred. But Roskill J. also made some remarks about the status of the New York action, and it is on these remarks that Mr. Simmonds and Mr. Davidson rely. Roskill J. said, at p. 127:

H

“There remains the further question on this branch of the case, namely, whether, even if the insurance company could have otherwise relied upon the New York suit to defeat the provisions of article III, rule 6, they could, on the facts of this case, have relied upon it, inasmuch as the notice of the assignment was only given after the New York suit had been begun. That the chronology of events is that notice was given after the suit had been begun, is undoubted. What is the effect? Had the New York suit been brought in England, it seems clear that it must have failed, all else apart, for want of notice satisfying the requirements of section 136 of the Law of Property Act 1925. Mr. Kerr says that this is a further fatal bar to reliance upon the New York suit as satisfying article III, rule 6. Mr. Littman says that suit was brought by the right party, the insurance company, and the fact that there was a valid defence is irrelevant.”

Roskill J. noted, at p. 128, that the proper law of the chose in action was English law and said, at p. 129:

“Antecedent notice to the debtor before action brought is clearly required by the proper law of the debt, namely, English law. . . . only the assignor could sue at the time when the New York suit was brought and, therefore, that suit was brought by the wrong party, if one applies English law either as the proper law of the chose in action or (by presumption) as the proper law of the assignment or of the lex fori. ‘Suit brought’ must mean suit brought by the person properly entitled to bring it. On the facts as to notice, which I have related, the insurance company had no right to bring that suit in New York at the time when it was brought. Only the telephone company could have brought it, and they did not do so.”

Those remarks were not necessary to the decision of the case but represent the considered opinion of Roskill J., expressed in a reserved judgment, on assumed facts which seem, for relevant purposes, very like the facts of the present case. Roskill J. held, in effect, that the action commenced by the equitable assignee was a nullity. He so held notwithstanding that three days after the action had been commenced the assignment became, by reason of written notice thereof given to the debtor, a legal assignment. I find myself unable to accept that that can be right. Brandt's case [1905] A.C. 454 and the Performing Right Society case [1924] A.C. 1, establish beyond any argument that an action commenced by an equitable assignee and to which the assignor is not a party is not a nullity. It will not be struck out until the plaintiff has had an opportunity to join as a party the assignor. It may be stayed until that has been done. Even this is not an invariable practice. In a case where the protection of the defendant debtor from claims by the legal owner of the chose in action can be seen to be unnecessary, the equitable assignee can prosecute the action to final judgment without joining the assignor as a party: see Brandt's case [1905] A.C. 454. All this I take to be established by the two House of Lords cases in question. Those authorities were not cited to Roskill J. and I do not think he could have decided the equitable assignee point as he did if they had been.

E

F

There is a final point made by Mr. Simmonds and Mr. Davidson on this part of the case that I must deal with. Whatever may be the locus standi of an equitable owner of a chose in action in general to bring an action, the position of an equitable assignee of a cause of action in damages is, it was said, different. Indeed, Mr. Davidson submitted that there was really no such thing as an equitable assignee of a cause of action in damages. A bare right to sue cannot be assigned, he submitted. A debt may be assigned, copyright may be assigned, but not a bare right to sue. I do not accept the contrast which this submission seeks to draw between a debt on the one hand and a cause of action in damages on the other hand. There is no such thing as a cause of action in vacuo. In the present case the plaintiffs allege that immediately before the bankruptcy the defendants were liable to them in damages. The right to unliquidated damages is an asset just as a debt is an asset. Subject to the law regarding maintenance and champerty, a right to unliquidated

Scott J.

A damages can, in law, be sold or assigned as readily as a debt. The bringing of an action is the means of enforcing the right to unliquidated damages. But the asset that vested in the trustee in bankruptcy and was assigned on 7 February 1986 to the plaintiffs was the right to damages. The plaintiffs' entitlement as equitable assignees to bring an action to enforce that right was, in my judgment, no different from the right of an equitable assignee of a debt to bring an action to recover the debt.

B The writ in this action was issued by the plaintiffs, as equitable assignees, on 2 May 1986. The trustee in bankruptcy, the assignor, was not a party. This writ was not, in my judgment, a nullity. The state of affairs immediately after its issue was that if the defendants had applied for the action to be stayed pending the joinder of the trustee in bankruptcy, the assignor, the application would have succeeded. Also, if
C immediately after the issue of the writ the plaintiffs had sought the joinder of the trustee in bankruptcy, that application, too, would, in my view, have succeeded. The joinder would have been authorised by R.S.C., Ord. 15, r. 6(2)(b)(i). That remained the position at least until 20 May 1986.

The significance of 20 May 1986 is that it was the date on which, apparently, the cause of action against the second defendant became time barred. It may also have been the date on which causes of action against the first defendant began to become time barred. But the state of the action remained, in my judgment, the same after 20 May 1986 as it had been before. The joinder of the trustee in bankruptcy would have required sub-rules (5)(a) and (6)(a) to be complied with; but neither would, in my view, have presented any difficulty. It would have been
E "necessary for the determination of the action that the new party should be added," sub-rule (5)(a), and the case would have fallen squarely within sub-rule (6)(a).

The position did, however, change on 4 June 1986. That was the date on which the plaintiffs' equitable assignment became, by reason of the written notice to the defendants, a legal assignment. As from that date, the defendants did not need to be protected against claims by the F trustee in bankruptcy or anyone claiming through the trustee in bankruptcy. The trustee could have made no claims against them. A stay of the action pending the joinder of the legal owner of the chose in action was not thereafter necessary. The plaintiffs were the legal owners. The trustee in bankruptcy could not be joined as a party. Apart from the objection that his joinder would be pointless, the case could no longer be brought within sub-rule (6)(a). In my judgment, on 4 June G 1986 the defect which would previously have prevented the plaintiffs obtaining judgment against the defendants was removed.

There are two other questions which arise from what I have decided. First, since the permission of the Department of Trade and Industry to the assignment of the causes of action ought to have been but was not obtained (see section 56(4) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914) there remains a H theoretical possibility that someone with locus standi to do so might apply to have the assignment set aside. Does that possibility render the plaintiffs' action in any way defective or require the joinder of the trustee in bankruptcy? For the reasons which I have already given, the absence of a requisite permission is not, in my judgment, ground by itself for a transaction to be set aside. Strangers to a bankruptcy are not concerned with whether or not permission has been given. But, of course, the plaintiffs are not strangers to the bankruptcy: they are the bankrupts. It may be thought to be arguable that, as against them, some creditor or other person with sufficient locus standi might be able, on the ground of lack of requisite permission, to have the assignment set aside. But even if that were a correct view, nonetheless, in my judgment, it would not assist the defendants. The right to have the assignment set aside for want of the requisite permission would be no more than a mere equity. It would not, in my judgment, prevent the plaintiffs from giving the defendants, on payment of any damages found to be due or agreed to be due, a complete discharge. If the action proceeds to judgment, whether in the plaintiffs' favour or the defendants' favour, the causes of action will be extinguished. As Lord Upjohn commented in National Provincial Bank Ltd. v. Hastings Car Mart Ltd. [1965] A.C. 1175, 1238, "a mere 'equity' naked and alone is, in my opinion, incapable of binding successors in title even with notice; it is personal to the parties." This conclusion is entirely consistent with the authorities to which I have already referred, which establish that want of the requisite permission pursuant to section 56 does not constitute a point of which a stranger to the bankruptcy can take advantage. The defendants are plainly strangers to the bankruptcy.

Finally there is the question whether, for the purposes of the Limitation Act 1972, time was interrupted by the issue of the writ on 2 May 1986 or continued running until the plaintiffs' assignment became a legal assignment on 4 June 1986. If the latter answer were correct, it might be necessary to dismiss the second defendant from the action on the footing that, as against him, the action would be bound to fail. This is a point on which there is apparently no authority save for the judgment of Roskill J. in Compania Colombia de Seguros v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co. [1965] 1 Q.B. 101 to which I have referred and which, for the reasons I have given, I do not feel able to accept. As a matter of principle, however, I conclude that time was interrupted by the issue of the writ. The plaintiffs are suing on the cause of action in negligence. They had locus standi as equitable assignees to do so. They were not suing on some different cause of action from that which in law remained vested in their assignor. There was and is only one cause of action, namely a cause of action to the benefit of which the plaintiffs were, on 2 May 1986, in equity entitled and are now in law entitled, and in respect of which they were entitled to issue a writ and obtain, if the circumstances warranted it, an immediate interlocutory injunction. In my judgment, therefore, time stopped running on 2 May 1986.

Accordingly, on the preliminary issue I propose to answer "No" to both questions.

Crime—Self-defence—Homicide—Defendant police officer killing man believing him to be dangerous gunman firing at police—Jury directed that test for self-defence based on defendant's belief in necessity to resist attack being reasonable—Whether misdirection—Whether honest belief correct test

E

F

The defendant, a police officer, was charged with murder. The prosecution case was that the defendant and another armed officer had chased the deceased, who was unarmed, shooting at him and eventually killing him when he had his hands raised and was begging them not to shoot him. The defendant made a statement from the dock stating that he and other armed officers had been sent to a house to investigate a report that the deceased was a dangerous gunman terrorising someone there, and that on arrival at the house he saw the deceased running away with what appeared to be a gun. He said that while he and other officers were chasing the deceased he saw the deceased firing at them and they returned fire killing the deceased. In his summing up in relation to self-defence the judge directed the jury that a man who was attacked in circumstances where he reasonably believed his life to be in danger, or that he was in danger of serious bodily injury, might use such force as on reasonable grounds he thought necessary to resist the attack, and if in using such force he killed his assailant he was not guilty of any crime. The defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. The Court of Appeal of Jamaica dismissed his appeal against conviction holding that the jury had been properly directed with regard to self-defence.

G

H

On the defendant's appeal to the Judicial Committee:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the common law of England was applicable in Jamaica to determine whether the defendant had acted in self-defence; that the prosecution had to prove that the violence used by the defendant was unlawful; that, therefore, if the defendant honestly believed the circumstances to be such as would, if true, justify his use of force to defend himself or another from attack and the force used was no more than was reasonable to resist the attack, he was entitled to be acquitted of murder, since the intent to act unlawfully would be negated by his belief, however mistaken or unreasonable, although the reasonableness of the alleged belief was material in deciding whether the defendant had a genuine belief; that, accordingly, the trial judge misdirected the jury as to self-defence; and that, as it could not be concluded with the utter certainty required in a case of capital murder that the jury properly directed would necessarily have returned the same verdict, the proviso to section 14(1) of the Judicature (Appellate Jurisdiction) Act could not be applied and the conviction would be quashed (post, pp. 616A–B, 619B–E, 620F–G, 621H).

Reg. v. Morgan [1976] A.C. 182, H.L.(E.) and Reg. v. Williams (Gladstone) (1983) 78 Cr.App.R. 276, C.A. applied.

Per curiam. There is an obvious danger that a jury may be unwilling to accept that an accused held an "honest" belief if he is not prepared to assert it in the witness box and subject it to the test of cross-examination (post, p. 622B).

Decision of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica reversed.

APPEAL (No. 9 of 1986) by the defendant, Solomon Beckford, with leave of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica, from the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica (Rowe P., Carey and Campbell J.J.A.) given on 10 October 1985 dismissing his appeal against his conviction of murder on 28 March 1985 before Woolf J. and a jury in the Manchester Circuit Court. He was sentenced to death.

At the close of the hearing before the Judicial Committee Lord Keith of Kinkel announced that their Lordships allowed the appeal for reasons to be delivered later.

The facts are stated in their Lordships' judgment giving the reasons for their decision.

A Michael Burton Q.C., Daniel Serota and John Perry (of the English and Jamaican Bars) for the defendant.

Ian X. Forte Q.C., Director of Public Prosecutions, Jamaica, and Kent Pantry, Deputy Director of Public Prosecutions, Jamaica, for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

B 15 June. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD GRIFFITHS.

On 28 March 1985 the defendant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. On 10 October 1985 the Court of Appeal of Jamaica dismissed his appeal against conviction, and gave leave to appeal certifying the following question as of exceptional public importance:

C "1. (a) Must the test to be applied for self-defence be based on what a person reasonably believed on reasonable grounds to be necessary to resist an attack or should it be what the accused honestly believed? (b) Where, in the instant case, on a trial of an indictment for murder the issue of self-defence is raised is it a proper direction in law for the jury to be told by the trial judge: a man who is attacked in circumstances where he reasonably believes his life to be in danger or that he is in danger of serious bodily injury may use such force as on reasonable grounds he thinks necessary in order to resist the attack and if in using such force he kills his assailant he is not guilty of any crime even if the killing is intentional."

E At the conclusion of the hearing their Lordships indicated that they would humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, and the conviction quashed, and that they would give their reasons later. This they now do.

F The facts out of which the conviction arose present a confused pattern with many loose ends which might with advantage have been dealt with by further evidence. The defendant was a police officer who on 8 March 1983 was issued with a shotgun and ammunition and sent with a number of other armed police officers to a house at Greenvale Park in Manchester. The prosecution called no evidence to explain the circumstances in which this armed posse was sent out that morning but according to the defendant, in a statement he made from the dock, he and other police officers, including a Police Constable Reckord, were told by Deputy Superintendent Wilson that a report had been received from Heather Barnes that her brother Chester Barnes was terrorising her mother with a gun and that the police must come immediately to save her life. The defendant said that they were warned that the man appeared to be a dangerous gunman and that they must take special care. Heather Barnes, however, who was the first witness called by the prosecution, denied in cross-examination that she had made a telephone call to the police or that her brother Chester Barnes was armed. It is to be regretted that the prosecution called no evidence to explain why these armed police were sent to the Barnes' house. If in fact Heather Barnes had telephoned for assistance it might have thrown grave doubt upon her testimony that her brother was unarmed; if she had not telephoned, the jury were surely entitled to know why so many armed police officers were sent to the house. The inference is obviously that the police must have believed that they were dealing with a dangerous armed man, but in a capital murder charge such matters should be dealt with by evidence not inference.

The prosecution case, based primarily on the evidence of Heather Barnes and a witness named Peart, was that the defendant armed with a shotgun and Police Constable Reckord armed with a revolver had aggressively entered the house whereupon the unarmed Chester Barnes had fled from the house, run across the yard, jumped over a wall and tried to hide by a pigsty on the adjoining common. Heather Barnes said the defendant had fired at her brother in the yard and then he and Police Constable Reckord had pursued him over the wall on to the common from whence she heard more shots. Peart said he saw Chester Barnes jump the wall pursued by the police. Later he saw Barnes hiding by a pigsty, he put his hands in the air and both police officers fired at him. He heard Barnes say "do officer, don't shoot me, because me a cook." He said Barnes had nothing in his hands, and when he fell after the first shots the defendant shot the deceased in the belly.

The evidence of the pathologist showed that the deceased had been shot three times, once in the head by the handgun and twice by the shotgun, once in the chest and lower neck and once on the inner side of the left forearm. There were no burn marks and this indicated that the shots were fired at more than 18 inches from the deceased's body.

The police evidence established that prior to the incident the defendant had been issued with a shotgun and nine cartridges and after the incident he returned the shotgun, seven cartridges and one spent cartridge. Police Constable Reckord handed in the revolver, nine cartridges and three spent shells.

On the prosecution evidence therefore this was a case of two police officers shooting at and pursuing an unarmed man and finally killing him when he was pleading with them with his hands up. On this version of events both police officers were equally guilty of murder and the only reason why Police Constable Reckord did not also stand trial was that he had died since the incident.

After an inevitably unsuccessful submission of no case to answer the defendant presented his defence in a statement from the dock which was summarised thus in the judgment of the Court of Appeal:

"The [defendant] made a statement from the dock, the gist of which was, that he and other men from Mandeville Police Station were ordered to a house in Greenvale Park where, he was told, a gunman was menacing the occupant. He was informed, he said, that Heather Barnes had reported that her brother Chester Barnes who had arrived from Kingston that morning armed with a firearm, was terrorising her. He said further that the deputy superintendent who had despatched them, cautioned that Barnes was a dangerous gunman. On arrival at the house, they took up positions as instructed. The [defendant] said he saw a man run from the back door with an object which appeared to be a firearm. This man first hid behind a wall and took aim as if to fire. The [defendant] fired in his direction, whereupon the man ran off, jumped a wall and went into a common where the [defendant] lost sight of him. The police party went in the direction the man had taken. He heard gunshots and as he neared the location from which the shots were being fired, he saw the same man firing at the police. He returned the fire

A as did other police officers. The man ran off and was pursued. He continued by saying: 'We went in trace of him and still hear shots coming from a tree root in the common. Other policemen went in that direction, and I saw when Constable Reckord discharged three rounds at the man that morning, and he fell. We were looking around for the gun that we saw the man with in the bushes—
B searching and looking for the gun but we didn't find it. I went and searched the man and took from his pockets a kerchief and two live rounds of .38 cartridges was wrapped into a kerchief.' Finally the [defendant] said that later that day when other policemen and himself returned to the scene, they were informed that relatives of the slain man recovered the gun but had thrown it away.

C "On the Crown's case, this amounted to a callous killing, an execution of Barnes by the [defendant] and another police officer, for the slain man had his hands raised in surrender but was nevertheless cut down. On the defence side, this was a plain case of self-defence. Policemen who were instructed to investigate a report of a dangerous gunman in their neighbourhood allegedly committing a breach of the peace, were fired upon and had returned the fire resulting in his death."

D At the conclusion of the defence case the only live issue for the jury was whether the prosecution had proved that the defendant had not killed in self-defence. The first ground of appeal before the Court of Appeal in Jamaica, and the only ground with which their Lordships are concerned, was that the trial judge had misdirected the jury on the issue of self-defence. No criticism can be made of the trial judge; his direction
E to the jury was in accordance with a recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Jamaica. The Court of Appeal likewise considered themselves bound by their previous decision and dealt succinctly with the defendant's submission:

F "A ground of appeal, which may be dealt with shortly, challenged the trial judge's directions to the jury with respect to self-defence. Mr. Phipps submitted that the trial judge's direction that—'A man who is attacked in circumstances where he reasonably believes his life to be in danger or that [he] is in danger of serious bodily injury may use such force as on reasonable grounds he thinks necessary in order to resist the attack and if in using such force he kills his assailant he is not guilty of any crime even if the killing is intentional'—was wrong in law as being against the weight of G current authorities in the United Kingdom. The test suggested in the extract was the reasonable man's assessment of circumstances that would make defensive action necessary. He submitted that the true principle of law is that the test is the [defendant's] assessment of all the circumstances and the question of what is reasonable is merely to be used in determining whether the [defendant's] assertion as to the belief he holds is honest or not.

H "We accept that there appears to be two schools, the 'reasonable belief' on the one hand and the 'honest belief' on the other. Be that as it may, in our judgment this point is concluded by a recent decision of the court, Reg. v. Barrett (Arthur) (unreported) (Supreme Court Criminal Appeal No. 133/84), delivered on 31 May 1985, in which the same point was canvassed by the same counsel. We can see no warrant whatever to depart from that decision or to amplify or alter the reasons on which it is based. We are content to say that the directions of the trial judge on this aspect of the case are in keeping with the law as we conceive it to be in this jurisdiction. This ground of appeal therefore fails.”

It is accepted by the prosecution that there is no difference on the law of self-defence between the law of Jamaica and the English common law and it therefore falls to be decided whether it was correctly decided by the Court of Appeal in Reg. v. Williams (Gladstone) (1983) 78 Cr.App.R. 276 that the defence of self-defence depends upon what the accused “honestly” believed the circumstances to be and not upon the reasonableness of that belief—what the Court of Appeal in Jamaica referred to as the “honest belief” and “reasonable belief” schools of thought.

There can be no doubt that prior to the decision of the House of Lords in Reg. v. Morgan [1976] A.C. 182 the whole weight of authority supported the view that it was an essential element of self-defence not only that the accused believed that he was being attacked or in imminent danger of being attacked but also that such belief was based on reasonable grounds. No elaborate citation of authority is necessary but counsel for the Crown rightly drew attention to such 19th century authorities as Foster's Case (1825) 1 Lew. 187; Reg. v. Weston (1879) 14 Cox C.C. 346 and Reg. v. Rose (1884) 15 Cox C.C. 540 in which the judges charged the jury that self-defence provided a defence to a charge of murder if the accused honestly and on reasonable grounds believed that his or another's life was in peril. It is however to be remembered that it was not until 1898 that an accused was able to give evidence in his own defence and it is natural that the judges in the absence of any direct statement of his belief from the accused should have focused attention upon the inference that could be drawn from the surrounding circumstances. Nevertheless, even after 1898 the law of self-defence continued to be stated as propounded by the judges in the 19th century: see Reg. v. Chisam (1963) 47 Cr.App.R. 130 in which Lord Parker C.J., at p. 133, approved the following statement of the law in Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd ed., vol. 10 (1955) (Criminal Law), p. 723, para. 1382:

“Where a forcible and violent felony is attempted upon the person of another, the party assaulted, or his servant, or any other person present, is entitled to repel force by force, and, if necessary, to kill the aggressor. There must be a reasonable necessity for the killing, or at least an honest belief based upon reasonable grounds that there is such a necessity.”

In Reg. v. Fennell [1971] 1 Q.B. 428, 431, Widgery L.J., who was soon to succeed Lord Parker C.J. as Lord Chief Justice, said:

“Where a person honestly and reasonably believes that he or his child is in imminent danger of injury it would be unjust if he were deprived of the right to use reasonable force by way of defence merely because he had made some genuine mistake of fact.”

The question then is whether the present Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lane, in Reg. v. Williams (Gladstone), 78 Cr.App.R. 276 was right to depart from the law as declared by his predecessors in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in Reg. v. Morgan [1976] A.C. 182. Reg.

- A v. Morgan was a case of rape and counsel for the Crown had submitted that the decision of the majority turned solely upon their view of the specific intention required for the commission of that crime and accordingly had no relevance to the law of self-defence. It was further submitted that the question now before their Lordships was settled by an earlier decision of the Privy Council in Palmer v. The Queen [1971] A.C. 814. This submission is founded upon the fact that Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest in giving the judgment of the Board set out a very lengthy passage from the summing up of the judge and commented, at p. 824:
- B

- C “Their Lordships conclude that there is no room for criticism of the summing up or of the conduct of the trial unless there is a rule that in every case where the issue of self-defence is left to the jury they must be directed that if they consider that excessive force was used in defence then they should return a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. For the reasons which they will set out their Lordships consider there is no such rule.”

- The only question raised for the determination of the Board was that stated by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest. It is true that, in the passage quoted from the summing up the judge had stated the ingredients of self-defence in the then conventional form of reasonable belief; but it was not this part of his summing up that was under attack nor did it receive any particular consideration by the Board. Their Lordships are unable to attach greater weight to the approval of the summing up than as indicating that it was in conformity with the practice of directing juries that the accused must have reasonable grounds for believing that self-defence was necessary.

- E In Reg. v. Morgan [1976] A.C. 182 each member of the House of Lords held that the mens rea required to commit rape is the knowledge that the woman is not consenting or recklessness as to whether she is consenting or not. From this premise the majority held that unless the prosecution proved that the man did not believe the woman was consenting or was at least reckless as to her consent they had failed to prove the necessary mens rea which is an essential ingredient of the crime. Lord Edmund-Davies in his dissent, at pp. 221–235, referred to the large body of distinguished academic support for the view that it is morally indefensible to convict a person of a crime when owing to a genuine mistake as to the facts he believes that he is acting lawfully and has no intention to commit the crime and therefore has no guilty mind. He expressed his preference for this moral approach but felt constrained by the weight of authority, including the cases on self-defence, to hold that the law required the accused’s belief should not only be genuine but also based upon reasonable grounds.

- H In Reg. v. Kimber [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1118 the Court of Appeal applied the decision in Reg. v. Morgan to a case of indecent assault and held that a failure to direct the jury that the prosecution had to make them sure that the accused had never believed that the woman was consenting was a misdirection. Lawton L.J. in the course of his judgment rejected the submission that the decision in Reg. v. Morgan was confined to rape and clearly regarded it as of far wider significance. Commenting upon an obiter dictum in Reg. v. Pheko [1981] 1 W.L.R. 1117, 1127, he said, at p. 1123:

“the court went on, after referring to Reg. v. Morgan, to say, clearly obiter, per Hollings J. at p. 1127H: ‘It seems to us clear that this decision was confined and intended to be confined to the offence of rape.' We do not accept that this was the intention of their Lordships in Morgan's case. Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone started his speech by saying that the issue as to belief was a question of great academic importance in the theory of English criminal law."

In Reg. v. Williams (Gladstone), 78 Cr.App.R. 276 the decision in Reg. v. Morgan [1976] A.C. 182 was carried a step further and in their Lordships' view to its logical conclusion. The facts and the grounds of the decision are adequately summarised in the headnote, at p. 276:

"One M. saw a black youth rob a woman in a street. He caught the youth and held him, but the latter broke from M.'s grasp. M. caught the youth again and knocked him to the ground. The appellant, who had only seen the later stages of the incident, was told by M. that he, M., was arresting the youth for mugging a woman. M. said that he was a police officer, which was untrue, so when asked by the appellant for his warrant card, he could not produce one. A struggle followed and the appellant assaulted M. by punching him in the face and was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. His defence was that he honestly believed that the youth was being unlawfully assaulted by M. The jury were directed that, on the assumption that M. was acting lawfully, the appellant's state of mind on the issue of defence of another was to be determined by whether the appellant had an honest belief based on reasonable grounds that reasonable force was necessary to prevent a crime. The appellant was convicted and appealed on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury.

"Held, that the jury should have been directed that, first, the prosecution had the burden of proving the unlawfulness of the appellant's actions; secondly, if the appellant might have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts, he was to be judged according to his mistaken view of the facts, whether or not that mistake was, on an objective view, reasonable or not. The reasonableness or unreasonableness of the appellant's belief was material to the question whether the belief was held by him at all. If the belief was held, its unreasonableness, so far as guilt or innocence was concerned, was irrelevant. Accordingly, the appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed."

In the course of his judgment Lord Lane C.J. discussing the offence of assault said, at p. 280:

"The mental element necessary to constitute guilt is the intent to apply unlawful force to the victim. We do not believe that the mental element can be substantiated by simply showing an intent to apply force and no more."

And later in the judgment, at p. 280, he expressly disapproved the decision of the Divisional Court in Albert v. Lavin [1982] A.C. 546 in which it was said that the word "unlawful" was tautologous and not part of the definitional element of assaulting a police officer in the course of his duty. In so doing Lord Lane C.J. was expressing the same view of Albert v. Lavin that had been previously expressed by Lawton L.J. in Reg. v. Kimber [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1118, 1122-1123.

A The common law recognises that there are many circumstances in which one person may inflict violence upon another without committing a crime, as for instance, in sporting contests, surgical operations or in the most extreme example judicial execution. The common law has always recognised as one of these circumstances the right of a person to protect himself from attack and to act in the defence of others and if necessary to inflict violence on another in so doing. If no more force is used than is reasonable to repel the attack such force is not unlawful and no crime is committed. Furthermore a man about to be attacked does not have to wait for his assailant to strike the first blow or fire the first shot; circumstances may justify a pre-emptive strike.

B It is because it is an essential element of all crimes of violence that the violence or the threat of violence should be unlawful that self-defence, if raised as an issue in a criminal trial, must be disproved by the prosecution. If the prosecution fail to do so the accused is entitled to be acquitted because the prosecution will have failed to prove an essential element of the crime namely that the violence used by the accused was unlawful.

C If then a genuine belief, albeit without reasonable grounds, is a defence to rape because it negatives the necessary intention, so also must a genuine belief in facts which if true would justify self-defence be a defence to a crime of personal violence because the belief negatives the intent to act unlawfully. Their Lordships therefore approve the following passage from the judgment of Lord Lane C.J. in Reg. v. Williams (Gladstone), 78 Cr.App.R. 276, 281, as correctly stating the law of self-defence:

E “The reasonableness or unreasonableness of the defendant’s belief is material to the question of whether the belief was held by the defendant at all. If the belief was in fact held, its unreasonableness, so far as guilt or innocence is concerned, is neither here nor there. It is irrelevant. Were it otherwise, the defendant would be convicted because he was negligent in failing to recognise that the victim was not consenting or that a crime was not being committed and so on. F In other words the jury should be directed first of all that the prosecution have the burden or duty of proving the unlawfulness of the defendant’s actions; secondly, if the defendant may have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts, he must be judged according to his mistaken view of the facts; thirdly, that is so G whether the mistake was, on an objective view, a reasonable mistake or not.

H “In a case of self-defence, where self-defence or the prevention of crime is concerned, if the jury came to the conclusion that the defendant believed, or may have believed, that he was being attacked or that a crime was being committed, and that force was necessary to protect himself or to prevent the crime, then the prosecution have not proved their case. If however the defendant’s alleged belief was mistaken and if the mistake was an unreasonable one, that may be a powerful reason for coming to the conclusion that the belief was not honestly held and should be rejected. Even if the jury come to the conclusion that the mistake was an unreasonable one, if the defendant may genuinely have been labouring under it, he is entitled to rely upon it.”

Looking back, Reg. v. Morgan [1976] A.C. 182 can now be seen as a landmark decision in the development of the common law returning the law to the path upon which it might have developed but for the inability of an accused to give evidence on his own behalf. Their Lordships note that not only has this development the approval of such distinguished criminal lawyers as Professor Glanville Williams and Professor Smith: see Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd ed. (1983), pp. 137–138, and Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law, 5th ed. (1983), pp. 329–330; but it also has the support of the Criminal Law Revision Committee: see Fourteenth Report on Offences against the Person (1980) (Cmnd. 7844) and of the Law Commission: see A Report to the Law Commission on Codification of the Criminal Law (1985) (Law Com. No. 143).

There may be a fear that the abandonment of the objective standard demanded by the existence of reasonable grounds for belief will result in the success of too many spurious claims of self-defence. The English experience has not shown this to be the case. The Judicial Studies Board with the approval of the Lord Chief Justice has produced a model direction on self-defence which is now widely used by judges when summing up to juries. The direction contains the following guidance:

“Whether the plea is self-defence or defence of another, if the defendant may have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts, he must be judged according to his mistaken belief of the facts: that is so whether the mistake was, on an objective view, a reasonable mistake or not.”

Their Lordships have heard no suggestion that this form of summing up has resulted in a disquieting number of acquittals. This is hardly surprising for no jury is going to accept a man's assertion that he believed that he was about to be attacked without testing it against all the surrounding circumstances. In assisting the jury to determine whether or not the accused had a genuine belief the judge will of course direct their attention to those features of the evidence that make such a belief more or less probable. Where there are no reasonable grounds to hold a belief it will surely only be in exceptional circumstances that a jury will conclude that such a belief was or might have been held.

Their Lordships therefore conclude that the summing up in this case contained a material misdirection and answer question 1(a) by saying that the test to be applied for self-defence is that a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances as he honestly believes them to be in the defence of himself or another. It follows from this that their Lordships answer the second part of the question 1(b) in the negative.

Their Lordships received a powerful submission from the prosecution that notwithstanding the misdirection they should nevertheless apply the proviso to section 14(1) of the Judicature (Appellate Jurisdiction) Act and dismiss the appeal on the ground that no substantial miscarriage of justice had actually occurred. It was submitted that the jury must have accepted the evidence of Peart that the deceased had been shot down in the act of surrender and rejected the defendant's account that he was killed in a gun battle, which the judge had clearly directed them would amount to self-defence. Their Lordships have given anxious consideration to this submission for there is much force in it. If on the facts as they appear from the summing up the judge had left the matter to the jury on the basis of a choice between the two accounts then any misdirection

A as to the reasonableness or otherwise of the defendant's belief would have been of only academic interest.

B However the judge did not leave it to the jury as a choice between the two accounts, for he clearly thought that there was a further possibility, namely that the defendant mistakenly believed that the deceased was armed and would shoot him if he did not shoot first. It is not readily apparent why the judge regarded this as a possible view of the facts, but their Lordships have no transcript of the evidence and must accept the view of the judge that the facts were open to such an interpretation. Directing the jury on this alternative the judge said:

C "The other situation is this, if you say you don't find that he had a gun, but we are satisfied that the accused reasonably believed that the man had a gun and that he reasonably apprehended danger to himself because of the belief which he held, and if in those circumstances he used reasonable force to prevent that danger which he reasonably apprehended, in those circumstances he would also be entitled to acquittal. And if you are in doubt about that as well, he must also be acquitted. If you are in doubt about whether or not he reasonably believed that the man had a gun, you must acquit him as well. I don't think I can put it any plainer.

D "So then, what are the verdicts which are open to you on this case? There are only two, namely, guilty of murder as charged, or not guilty of murder. Those are the only two verdicts that I leave to you on these facts.

E "One other thing before I ask you to retire, when you come to consider—remember I told you that you must consider all circumstances of the case, all the circumstances of the case includes all the circumstances that exist in the Jamaica of today, you cannot divorce that from your mind, because when you come to consider the question of reasonableness, that is a factor to be considered; the Jamaica today that we live in. But when I tell you that, you must consider that, it doesn't mean that a man is entitled to say that because the Jamaica in which we live today many people are armed with guns and many people are out there with guns, a man can just come and say I believe because we live in Jamaica today and so many guns are around and firing willy-nilly, he must reasonably, that is the test, reasonably believe and he must believe that he had reasonable cause to act as he did. So it is not just a matter of saying to yourselves, plenty man have gun in Jamaica today, so when I see a man running I believe him have a gun and shoot him down. That is not the test, the test is reasonableness, but of course, you consider it, the situation in the country today when you come to consider the reasonableness of his belief."

H In this passage the judge is emphasising time and again that the defendant's belief had to be held on reasonable grounds, and it was the final passage of his summing up before the jury retired. As counsel for the defendant said, the jury retired with the test of reasonable belief ringing in their ears. In these circumstances their Lordships cannot feel with that utter certainty that is required in a case of capital murder that the jury would necessarily have returned the same verdict if they had been directed in terms of "honest" as opposed to "reasonable" belief.

Before parting with this appeal there is one further matter upon which their Lordships wish to comment. The defendant chose not to give evidence but to make a statement from the dock which, because it cannot be tested by cross-examination, is acknowledged not to carry the weight of sworn or affirmed testimony. Their Lordships were informed, to their surprise, by counsel for the Crown, that it is now the practice, rather than the exception, in Jamaica for an accused to decline to give evidence in his own defence and to rely upon a statement from the dock, a privilege abolished in this country by section 72 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982. Now that it has been established that self-defence depends upon a subjective test their Lordships trust that those who are responsible for conducting the defence will bear in mind that there is an obvious danger that a jury may be unwilling to accept that an accused held an "honest" belief if he is not prepared to assert it in the witness box and subject it to the test of cross-examination.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

TURTON v. TURTON

1987 Jan. 13;
March 12

Kerr and Nourse L.JJ.

Trust for Sale—Family home—Valuation date for shares—House bought in joint names of unmarried couple—No financial contribution by woman—Express trust in conveyance—Parties entitled to one half share of sale proceeds—Parties ceasing to live together—Whether shares to be valued at date of separation or disposal of house

The defendant and the plaintiff, who had been living together as husband and wife for some time, bought a house in 1972. The conveyance contained an express trust to sell the house with provision for the proceeds of sale to be held in trust for them as joint tenants beneficially. The joint tenancy was later severed and they held the house as tenants in common. The defendant contributed £3,000 of the purchase price of £8,500. The rest was raised by a mortgage to a building society. Although the plaintiff contributed nothing it was accepted that the express declaration of trust in the conveyance defined her beneficial interest in the house at the date of its acquisition. The plaintiff left the house in August 1975. She brought an action in the county court in August 1983 seeking a declaration that the house was held on trust for sale for the parties as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares and for an order for sale. The judge made the declaration, ordered sale and further ordered that the plaintiff's half share was to be valued as at August 1975 when the parties separated.

On appeal by the plaintiff:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that where the parties' respective interests in the property could be defined at the date of its

B as the separation of an unmarried couple, and that, accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to the value of her half share at the date of the sale of the house (post, pp. 629A-B, 630E-F, H—631A, G-H, 632B-C, 633B-D, G—634A).

Hall v. Hall (1981) 3 F.L.R. 379, C.A. disapproved in part.

Per Nourse L.J. It is undesirable that in a case of this kind an order of the court should be drawn up in such a way that it embodies the whole of the judgment (post, pp. 626H—627A).

F 1196, C.A.

The plaintiff, Carol Ann Turton, issued an originating application in county court against the defendant, Edward Sydney Turton, seeking, inter alia, (1) a declaration that on its true construction the conveyance dated 20 January 1972 of the house known as 64, Ludlow Road, Itchen, Southampton, conveyed the house on trust for sale for the plaintiff and defendant as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares and (2) an order for sale of the house and further ancillary relief. The house was bought by the parties in their joint names when they were living together but had not married. The plaintiff left the house in August 1975.

G dated 20 January 1972 of the house known as 64, Ludlow Road, Itchen, Southampton, conveyed the house on trust for sale for the plaintiff and the defendant as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares and (2) an order for sale of the house and further ancillary relief. The house was bought by the parties in their joint names when they were living together but had not married. The plaintiff left the house in August 1975.

H On 13 May 1986 Judge McKinney made the declaration sought and ordered the sale of the house. She further declared that the relevant date to value the plaintiff's one half share in the house and the net proceeds of sale thereof was August 1975, when the parties separated.

By a notice of appeal dated 5 June 1986 the plaintiff appealed on the grounds that (1) the proper date to value her one half share in the house and the net proceeds of sale thereof and the net rents and profits thereof until sale, to which she was entitled was the date of sale or, if earlier, the date of any purchase by the defendant of the plaintiff's share; (2) the judge was wrong in law in holding that the relevant date to value the plaintiff's share was, or ought to be, August 1975, when the parties separated; and (3) the judgment of the judge so far as it concerned the date on which the plaintiff's one half share in the house and in the net proceeds of sale thereof and the net rents and profits thereof until sale ought to be valued was wrong and ought to be set aside.

The facts are set out in the judgment of Nourse L.J.

Geoffrey Jaques for the plaintiff.

Keith Cutler for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

12 March. The following judgments were handed down.

NOURSE L.J. This is an appeal from a decision of Judge McKinney given on 13 May 1986 in the Southampton County Court in a dispute between an unmarried couple as to the beneficial ownership of a house in which they formerly lived together.

The conveyance of the house made express provision for the proceeds of its sale to be held in trust for the parties as beneficial joint tenants. That tenancy was afterwards severed. The man contended that the woman's beneficial interest had been obtained by fraud, alternatively that there had been a total failure of consideration, but those contentions were rejected on the facts. The judge declared that the parties held the property on trust for themselves as tenants in common in equal shares. She also made an order for its sale. However, in seeming reliance on the decision of this court in Hall v. Hall (1981) 3 F.L.R. 379, she directed that the woman's share of the proceeds of sale should be quantified by reference to the value of the property when the parties ceased to live together in 1975. That would mean that her share of the net proceeds would be far less than one half. The woman has now appealed to this court, contending that the judge's direction was not one which could properly be made.

The absence of any cross-appeal against the judge's findings enables the material facts to be stated with some brevity. The appellant, Carol Ann Turton ("the plaintiff"), and the defendant, Edward Sydney Turton, met in the late 1960's and a relationship developed between them. From about December 1969 or January 1970 until August 1975 they lived together as man and wife at various addresses in and around Southampton. The judge found that marriage between them was never contemplated. When they started to live together the plaintiff was aged about 28 and the defendant about 37. The plaintiff was then married to another. That marriage, of which there were no children, was dissolved in 1972 or 1973. At about the time of the divorce the plaintiff took the defendant's surname by deed poll. The defendant was a bachelor.

By a conveyance dated 20 January 1972 the property in dispute, No. 64, Ludlow Road, Itchen, Southampton, was conveyed to the plaintiff and the defendant for an estate in fee simple. So far as material, clause 2 of the conveyance was in the following terms:

"The purchasers hereby declare as follows: (a) the purchasers shall stand possessed of the premises hereby conveyed upon trust to sell

A the same . . . and shall stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale . . . and of the net rents and profits until sale . . . in trust for the purchasers as joint tenants beneficially."

The property consisted of a shop with living accommodation above. The purchase included the goodwill of the business of a grocery and general stores which was then carried on from the shop, and also certain shop equipment, fixtures and fittings. The purchase price was £8,500, apportioned as to £7,500 to the property and £1,000 to the goodwill and assets of the business. The defendant found £3,000 (and, it is to be assumed, the additional amount required to discharge the expenses of the purchase) out of his own resources. The balance of £5,500 was raised on a mortgage of the property with the Portsmouth Building Society which was executed by the plaintiff and the defendant on the same day. Although the plaintiff contributed nothing to the purchase, the defendant now accepts that the express declaration of trust contained in the conveyance conclusively defined the parties' respective beneficial interests in the property at the date of its acquisition. Any lingering doubts which there may have been on that score have finally been dispelled by the recent decision of this court in Goodman v. Gallant [1986] Fam. 106.

In or about August 1975 the plaintiff left the property and the parties ceased to live together. All the instalments payable under the mortgage, both before and after 1975, were paid by the defendant. The mortgage was redeemed on 30 December 1981. By a notice in writing dated 18 September 1982 and given by the plaintiff to the defendant pursuant to the proviso to section 36(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925, the beneficial joint tenancy in the property was duly severed.

By her originating application issued in the county court on 15 August 1983 the plaintiff claimed the following relief: (1) a declaration that the plaintiff and the defendant hold no. 64, Ludlow Road upon trust for sale and in trust for themselves as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares; (2), (3) and (4) an order for sale and orders ancillary thereto; (5) (i) an account of the mortgage instalments paid by the defendant between August 1975 and 30 December 1981 and (ii) an inquiry whether the defendant ought to pay a rent, and if so what rent, in respect of his occupation of the property between August 1975 and his vacation thereof; and (6) an order that the net proceeds of sale be paid to the plaintiff and the defendant in equal shares, subject to such deduction as may become appropriate on the taking and making of the account and inquiry respectively.

The trial took place before Judge McKinney on 27 and 28 January 1986. We were told by Mr. Jaques, who has appeared for the plaintiff both here and below, that it was agreed between counsel that the judge should be asked to deal first with the plaintiff's claims for a declaration and an order for sale. Thus, no evidence was led in relation to the account and inquiry and there was no argument either as to those matters or as to any consequential adjustments to the shares of the net proceeds of sale. Most important of all for present purposes, there was no argument as to whether the plaintiff's share of the proceeds, assuming that she was found to have one, should be quantified by reference to the value of the property at some date other than that on which it was realised.

The judge's reserved judgment was delivered on 13 May 1986. It had been typed up beforehand and copies of it were handed to the parties after it had been read. Having carefully considered the evidence and having rejected the defendant's contentions on the facts, the judge said:

"I find that the plaintiff is entitled to the declaration that she seeks that she and the defendant hold the property upon trust for themselves as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares. The relevant date for valuing those shares in my view is August 1975 when the parties ceased cohabitation because in the circumstances of the case this in my view is when the purpose of the trust expired. This is not a case where, for example, the property continued to be a family home after the parties had separated or where the plaintiff had contributed financially to the purchase of the property after separation when post-separation circumstances might have become relevant for consideration. The defendant through his counsel has complained of the delay by the plaintiff in seeking orders. The defendant himself took no steps to clarify the rights of the parties; doubtless the value of the property has increased considerably since the date of separation. In my view by taking the value of the equity as it was in 1975 and the plaintiff receiving an equal share of that value, the justice of the case will be met. I have in this regard taken into account Bernard v. Josephs [1982] Ch. 391."

The judge then said that the plaintiff was entitled to an order for sale so that her interest could be realised. However, she postponed the effect of the order for three months so that the defendant could consider whether it was open to him to buy the plaintiff out when the 1975 valuation had been ascertained. Then she said that in the light of her judgment paragraphs (5) and (6) of the application did not fall to be considered. Having delivered judgment, the judge ordered the defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs to be taxed on Scale 3 and not to be enforced without the leave of the court. She also ordered a legal aid taxation of the costs of each side.

We were told by Mr. Jaques that it was not until he had had an opportunity of fully considering the judgment that it came home to him that the victory which he thought had been his client's had largely been taken from her by the judge's direction that her share should be quantified by reference to the value of the property in August 1975. However, when his instructing solicitors communicated with the court office on the same or the following day with a view to seeking an opportunity to argue that question further, they were told that the order had already been drawn up. This raises an incidental, but unsatisfactory, feature of the case which should not be allowed to pass without comment. The order appears to have been drawn up on the day on which judgment was delivered. The front page of the order is in the usual form, but the only substantive orders there made are the orders for costs. Those orders are preceded by the formula: "And upon the written judgment being given." The order then embodies the judgment, as appears from the fact that the court stamp has been placed on the first page of a copy of the judgment, as it has been on the front page of the order. In other words, it appears that the second and subsequent pages of the order are the first and subsequent pages of the judgment. Unless there is some established practice in the county court of which I am unaware, it seems to me to be undesirable that an order of the court

Turton v. Turton (C.A.)

Nourse L.J.

A in a case of this kind should be made in that form. Not only does it result in the order being unnecessarily long and difficult to abstract, there must also be a risk that there will be some question as to its true effect which could have been avoided if it had been drawn in the usual way.

B Once the order had been entered the plaintiff's only remedy was to come to this court. Her reasons for wishing to get rid of the judge's direction can be understood from a glance at the following figures. The value of the property in August 1975 was about £10,000. Its 1987 value is about £35,000. The capital element in the mortgage instalments which were paid between August 1975 and 30 December 1981 was about £5,000. Assuming for this purpose only that the defendant is entitled to be credited with the £5,000 without at the same time being debited in respect of his occupation of the property after August 1975, I think it is clear that the potential loss to the plaintiff is considerable. If the property is valued at £10,500, her share, after deducting £5,000, will be worth only £2,750. If, on the other hand, the net proceeds of sale amount to £35,000 then, after deducting £5,000, her share will be worth £15,000. The point is therefore one of great importance to the plaintiff. It is of equal importance to the defendant because, although he might well be able to raise £2,750 to buy out the plaintiff, he could not raise £15,000 or anything like it.

D As appears from the passage already quoted from her judgment, Judge McKinney held that the relevant date for valuing the parties' shares in the property was when they ceased to live together in August 1975. The reason she gave was that that was when the purpose of the trust expired. That shows, I think, that she was relying on the decision of this court in the comparable case of Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 379. The question is whether that was something which she could properly do.

E The principal distinction between Hall v. Hall and the present case is that there the house had been conveyed into the sole name of the man. That meant that the woman could only achieve a beneficial interest in it if she was able to bring herself within the principles stated in Gissing v. Gissing [1971] A.C. 886. It had been conceded in the court below that the woman did have some beneficial interest in the house, although both the concession and some observations of Lord Denning M.R. on that part of the case have since been criticised: see Burns v. Burns [1984] Ch. 317. The judge held that the woman was entitled to a one fifth share and that holding was affirmed in this court. I respectfully doubt whether that part of the decision is now of any authoritative value, but that is not a question which has to be further considered in the present case.

G The second and material part of the decision in Hall v. Hall can best be understood from the judgment of Lord Denning M.R., 3 F.L.R. 379, 381-382:

H "The next question is new. At what time should her share be taken to be realised? Should it be taken at the time when she left in 1978? Or should it be taken at the time of the hearing before the court? In the meantime this house has increased in value. At the time she left in 1978 the equity was £15,000-odd. Now it is £24,000-odd. The woman says that her share should be taken as at the date of the hearing. But the judge said it should be one fifth at the time when she left—when the parties separated. Even so, he said that interest should be allowed at 10 per cent. over the intervening period. That is a nice point. If it were husband and wife, their relationship was intended to be permanent. The trust should continue during the continuance of that relationship. The trust should not be deemed to be extinguished until the relationship is extinguished. But, in a case of this kind, the relationship comes to an end when the parties separate—whoever orders the other out. This is supported by some observations of this court in Munday v. Robertson (unreported), 18 April 1973, Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 169 of 1973. It was pointed out that, in a situation like this, although the house has increased in value, the man has been living in it, keeping up the mortgage payments, keeping it in repair, and the like. Any increase in value is therefore largely due to his efforts in keeping the house going, rather than selling it. In view of the guidance in Munday v. Robertson, and viewing it in the same way as the judge did, it seems to me that he was quite entitled to treat the trust as extinguished at the time of the separation. He said that he thought it was illogical that the woman should be able to enjoy the benefit of the present value which had been brought about by inflation after she had left what was never a permanent relationship. He went on to make this important observation: ‘She gets the benefit of her new set-up and I see no reason why she should continue to benefit.’ So there it is. She gets the benefit of her new relationship. For all I know, she may be getting the benefit of any inflation in the house in which she now lives. It seems to me that the judge was quite entitled—it would be a matter for his discretion—to treat the trust as being extinguished and the shares to be ascertained as at the date of the separation.”

Dunn L.J. said, at p. 385:

“So far as the date for the assessment or valuation of the share is concerned, as Lord Denning M.R. said in Cooke v. Head [1972] 1 W.L.R. 518, 521, in the case of a mistress that fell to be assessed at the date of separation. I respectfully agree that, although there may be different considerations when dealing with a resulting trust as between husband and wife, in the case of a mistress the trust comes to an end at the termination of the relationship which gave rise to the trust in the first place. Accordingly, I would hold that the judge was quite right in taking the date of separation as the relevant date in this case. He in fact gave interest for the period between the date of separation and the date of the hearing. I think that he was right to do so and, speaking for myself, I cannot fault his reasoning as to the date when the assessment of the proportion is made.”

O'Connor L.J. agreed with both judgments.

This part of the decision in Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 379 has also caused difficulties in subsequent cases. We were referred to three decisions of this court in which it was relied on in argument but not applied by the court. The fullest and most recent consideration of it is to be found in the judgment of Dillon L.J. in Walker v. Hall [1984] F.L.R. 126, 131–133, where reference is made to the subsequent decisions in Bernard v. Josephs [1982] Ch. 391 and Gordon v. Douce [1983] 1 W.L.R. 563 and also to the earlier decision of this court in Munday v. Robertson (unreported), 18 April 1973; Court of Appeal (Civil Division)

Nourse L.J.

- A Transcript No. 169 of 1973. In agreement with the view which had been expressed by Fox L.J. in Gordon v. Douce, Dillon L.J. concluded that Hall v. Hall did not establish a rigid rule, but only that the court had a discretion as to valuation in cases concerned with unmarried couples. However, both he and Lawton L.J. (with whose judgments Kerr L.J. agreed) went on to express views from which it seems necessarily to follow that there is in truth no discretion in the matter at all and that the shares can only be valued at the date of realisation.

B Since the views of Dillon and Lawton L.J. are of great importance in a class of case which is now very common and since the consequences of them may not yet have been fully appreciated, the material passages in their judgments must be set out at length.

In Walker v. Hall [1984] F.L.R. 126, 132–133, Dillon L.J. said:

- C “As it seems to me, the true position is that when Mrs. Walker left 33 Foxberry Road and her cohabitation with Mr. Hall ceased the purpose of the trust, in the sense of the purpose for which 33 Foxberry Road was bought, came to an end in that 33 Foxberry Road would no longer be used as a family home for Mr. Hall and Mrs. Walker and the children. But the trust for sale, imposed by statute as a result of the transfer of the property into joint names, did not come to an end but would inevitably continue until either the property was sold in execution of the trust for sale in order to satisfy the beneficial interests of the parties, or one party, by buying the other out, became solely and absolutely entitled to the property in equity. A fortiori, the beneficial interests of both parties, established by their contributions to the original purchase of the property, would not automatically cease or be quantified as fixed sums on the cesser of cohabitation. Unfettered by Hall v. Hall, I see no reason, in the circumstances of this case, why Mrs. Walker’s interest in 33 Foxberry Road should be valued or quantified at the date when she left. It should be valued at the present time, if Mr. Hall is to buy her out, or she should take the appropriate fractional share of the actual proceeds of sale if the property is sold. I see no hardship to Mr. Hall in this since he, too, will benefit proportionately from the rise in the value of the property from 1973 until now.”

Lawton L.J. said, at pp. 135–136:

- G “During the past two decades the courts have had to consider on a number of occasions the division of property between men and women living together without being married. Ever since the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, which has been replaced by the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, the courts have been able to make an equitable division of property between spouses when a marriage breaks down and a decree of divorce is pronounced. No such jurisdiction exists when the cohabitantes are unmarried. H When such a relationship comes to an end, just as with many divorced couples, there are likely to be disputes about the distribution of shared property. How are such disputes to be decided? They cannot be decided in the same way as similar disputes are decided when there has been a divorce. The courts have no jurisdiction to do so. They have to be decided in accordance with the law relating to property: see Pettitt v. Pettitt [1970] A.C. 777 and Gissing v. Gissing [1971] A.C. 886.

"There is no special law relating to property shared by cohabitees any more than there is any special law relating to property used in common by partners or members of a club. The principles of law to be applied are clear, though sometimes their application to particular facts are difficult. In circumstances such as arose in this case the appropriate law is that of resulting trusts. If there is a resulting trust (and there was one in this case) the beneficiaries acquire by operation of law interests in the trust property. An interest in property which is the consequence of a legal process must be identifiable. It must be more than expectations which at some later date require to be valued by a court. A property interest cannot be brought to an end by the happening of an event unrelated to the property interest itself, for example, by the separation of the cohabitees. The interest can be turned into another form of property such as money. This can happen when the trust property is sold or by one of the joint owners buying the interest of the other. Valuing a property interest at a particular time does not turn it into money, although it may be a preliminary to doing so.

"When these general principles are applied to the facts of this case the results are as follows: first, the only way of ascertaining what were the property interests of Mrs. Walker and Mr. Hall is to ascertain what each contributed to creating the trust property. Any other way would require the court to give an opinion as to what the property interest should be in all the circumstances rather than to make a finding on the evidence as to what they were. Secondly, Mrs. Walker's beneficial interests in the house continue until it is sold. It will then be turned into money. For these reasons I agree with Dillon L.J.'s judgment, both as to principles and detail."

It is thus made clear that Dillon and Lawton L.JJ. were of the opinion that a beneficial interest acquired under an application of the principles stated in Gissing v. Gissing can only be an absolute and indefeasible interest. It cannot be one which is liable to determine or to be defeated or diminished—either automatically or by the exercise of some discretion—on the happening of some future event, for example the separation of an unmarried couple who were living together at the time of its acquisition. The validity of that proposition is in my judgment beyond doubt.

It must always be remembered that the basis on which the court proceeds is a common intention, usually to be inferred from the conduct of the parties, that the claimant is to have a beneficial interest in the house. In the common case where the intention can be inferred only from the respective contributions, either initial or under a mortgage, to the cost of its acquisition it is held that the house belongs to the parties beneficially in proportions corresponding to those contributions. But the effect of Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 379, as it has now been explained, is to presuppose a completely different intention in the case of an unmarried couple, namely that the original proportions may, at the discretion of the court, be varied by reference to the value of the house if and when they cease to live together. There are two reasons why that cannot be correct. First, it is impossible to see how, on general principles, such an intention can be inferred or implied. The only fair and reasonable inference is that an interest acquired in circumstances such as these is to be absolute and indefeasible. Second and perhaps more important, it is

A of the essence of the principles stated in Gissing v. Gissing [1971] A.C. 886 that the court has no discretion in the matter. As Lawton L.J. has pointed out in Walker v. Hall [1984] F.L.R. 126, 135, except in cases to which the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 applies, the function of the court is not to give an opinion as to what the beneficial interests ought to be, but to make a finding on the evidence as to what they are.

B How then did it come about that a different view was taken in Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 379? The arguments of counsel are not reported. Lord Denning M.R. described the question as being a new one. Neither he nor Dunn L.J. said or implied anything to suggest that it had been argued on behalf of the woman that the question was one which could not arise. If that had been argued, the question being a new one, I would have expected to find a reference to it. I think that it is possible
C that the point was never taken. In any event, for the reasons stated, I have to express my respectful opinion that the second part of the decision in Hall v. Hall is contrary to the principles stated in Gissing v. Gissing [1971] A.C. 836. I am unable to see how it could properly be applied in any other case. I think that it ought no longer to be followed at first instance.

D I have so far approached the matter without regard to the express declaration of trust which was contained in the conveyance to the plaintiff and the defendant in the present case. That approach has been adopted out of deference to the argument of Mr. Cutler on behalf of the defendant, which was to the effect that the second part of the decision in Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 379 applies as much to a case where the beneficial interests are expressly declared as it does to one where they are not. However, the plain truth is that the former case is a fortiori
E to the latter. As authority for that proposition it is only necessary to return to Goodman v. Gallant [1986] Fam. 106 and to the following passage in the judgment of the court delivered by Slade L.J. [1986] Fam. 106, 117:

F "In these circumstances the overwhelming preponderance of authority . . . in our judgment both entitle and oblige us to hold that, in the absence of any claim for rectification or rescission, the provision in the conveyance declaring that the plaintiff and the defendant were to hold the proceeds of sale of the property 'upon trust for themselves as joint tenants' concludes the question of the respective beneficial interests of the two parties insofar as that declaration of trust, on its true construction, exhaustively declares the beneficial interests."

G It is obvious that a discretion in the court to quantify the shares of the proceeds of sale by reference to the value of the house at some date other than that on which one or both of them are realised can only operate in derogation of the beneficial interests declared by the conveyance and the subsequent notice of severance.

H For these reasons I would allow the appeal, delete the judge's direction as to valuation and remit the matter to the county court for further consideration under paragraphs (5) and (6) of the originating application. There was some general discussion before us as to possible consequential adjustments. However, I do not think that it is appropriate to do more than to express, first, a belief that the principles on which the adjustments ought to be made involve no discretion on the part of the court and are now well settled by authority and, secondly, a hope that they can be disposed of by agreement between the parties.

The judge evidently thought that the plaintiff, having contributed nothing towards the cost of acquiring the house and having ceased to live with the defendant in 1975 after no more than five or six years together, did not deserve to receive a half share of its current value. That is without doubt a well tenable view of the case to which due respect will be paid. But it must again be emphasised that the ability of the courts to meet the deserts of unmarried couples lies not within the powers which Parliament has given them.

KERR L.J. I agree that this appeal must clearly be allowed on the ground dealt with by Nourse L.J. at the end of his judgment. As shown most recently by the decision of this court in Goodman v. Gallant [1986] Fam. 106, an express declaration of trust covering the respective beneficial interests of the parties is conclusive and excludes any possible resulting implied or constructive trust, and with it any possible discretionary jurisdiction relating to the assessment or valuation of the parties' beneficial shares which might otherwise exist. With respect to the judge, the decision of this court in Bernard v. Josephs [1982] Ch. 391, to which she referred, was on any view irrelevant. Not only was it concerned with a situation in which there had been no express declaration of trust, but it was also not concerned with any question as to the time when the parties' beneficial interests were to be valued. In Bernard v. Josephs it was common ground that the relevant point of time was the date of the sale or notional sale. The relevance of the time of separation was merely that it triggered off the demand by the ousted plaintiff for a sale under section 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925. The court then had to determine the appropriate accounts between the parties, which were in issue. These in turn involved consideration of adjustments which required to be made as the result of the separation, when the house ceased to be their joint home.

But primarily, as pointed out by Nourse L.J., the judge must have been relying on the decision of this court in Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 739, which is admittedly of greater relevance. The second point raised in that case did deal with the discretion which the judge purported to exercise in the present case. But since there was no express declaration of trust in Hall v. Hall, and since the discretion cannot co-exist with an express declaration of trust as here, the appeal in the present case must be allowed in any event.

However, although not directly raised by the present case, that leaves the question of the status of Hall v. Hall in cases where there is no express declaration of trust. In the light of the arguments addressed to us and of the importance which that decision may be assuming in similar situations, possibly quite frequent, we should express our views on it.

With all due respect to the members of the court in Hall v. Hall, I entirely agree with Nourse L.J. that the decision on this point cannot have been correct. It must have been wrong on at least two grounds, quite apart from the fact that the whole case is pervaded by what is now recognised as an untenable approach of differentiating between married and unmarried couples otherwise than on the basis of statutory provisions. The first reason is that, once the court had found the existence of a constructive or implied trust whereby the beneficial rights to the property belonged to the parties in whatever shares the court determined, then the necessary consequence was the recognition by the

A court of rights which are proprietary in their nature and which lie wholly outside the exercise of any discretionary powers. That was made clear, inter alia, in Gissing v. Gissing [1971] A.C. 886. The second reason is related to the first. Even if the court retained some discretionary power, it could in any event do no more than to give effect to the parties' intentions to be implied from the circumstances at the time when the trust came into existence. Even on this (mistaken) assumption however, there would be no basis for concluding that when the trust came into existence by reason of the contributions to the acquisition or subsequent improvement of, or expenditure upon, the property, it was the intention of the parties that their respective resulting rights should be valued as at the time when they might separate and one or the other might move out. There would be no ground for attributing any such intention to them unless they had so declared or agreed expressly. In effect, the only intention which could properly be attributed to them would produce the same result as the first ground for concluding that Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 379 was wrongly decided. Their inferred intention could only be that if and when they should separate, then each of them would still have whatever may be their appropriate beneficial share in the property, which would remain until such time as it might be sold or one might buy out the interest of the other. But there would never be any basis for attributing to them any implied intention that their respective shares should be valued specifically at the time of separation. Indeed, this was not the basis of the relevant part of the decision in Hall v. Hall, as shown by the extracts from the judgments which Nourse L.J. has cited.

It was not suggested in the arguments before us that Hall v. Hall, 3 F.L.R. 379 was decided per incuriam, and I therefore express no opinion about this. But in my view the precise status of the decision makes no difference in practice, although its reversal by the House of Lords at an early opportunity should no doubt be welcomed. The reason, as it seems to me, lies in the second ground which I have sought to state for concluding that Hall v. Hall was wrongly decided. Thus, even if it is impossible to consign the decision to limbo on the ground that the only correct analysis is that each of the parties must have had a proprietary interest incapable of being touched by the exercise of any discretion by the court, the exercise of any possible discretion to the same effect as in Hall v. Hall, and as in the present case, must in my view always be wrong in principle, and must therefore always be reviewable on appeal. As I have sought to explain above, unless there is some express declaration or agreement to the effect that the parties' respective beneficial shares are to be valued at the time of their separation if and when this should occur, there could never be any sufficient ground for attributing any such intention to them merely by implication from the circumstances. In the result, therefore, the parties' beneficial interests would always have to be regarded in the normal way under a trust for sale, with the effect that they would endure until such time as the property is sold, and that they will then attach to the proceeds of sale. I can see no basis in any event, by the exercise of any discretionary power, for cutting off the effect of the trust at some earlier point in time. The parties' separation will no doubt indicate that the purpose of the implied or constructive trust—to provide a joint home for them both—has failed. But this would merely trigger off a demand for a sale, as in Bernard v. Josephs [1982] Ch. 391. It would not give rise to any discretion, in subsequent proceedings to determine the parties' respective interests, to impose a valuation of these interests retrospectively by reference to the value of the property at that particular time.

For all these reasons I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Immigration—Commonwealth immigrant—Patrial's wife—Bangladeshi wife of British citizen seeking entry to United Kingdom without entry clearance—Leave to enter refused—Delay in processing applications for entry clearance in Bangladesh—Secretary of State refusing interview for entry clearance in United Kingdom—Whether refusal restraint of husband's right to enter United Kingdom without let or hindrance—Immigration Act 1971 (c. 77), s. 1(1)

The three applicants were British citizens. On respective visits to Bangladesh the first two applicants married Bangladeshi wives and the third became engaged to a Bangladeshi fiancée whom he subsequently married in the United Kingdom. Applications to the British High Commission in Dacca for entry clearance were at the relevant period subject to a delay of some 13 months. Rather than wait for the processing of their applications each applicant chose to return to the United Kingdom accompanied by his spouse. On arrival the spouses were refused entry by immigration officers. The Secretary of State, in upholding the refusal, also refused to allow the interviews for the purpose of obtaining entry clearance to be carried out in the United Kingdom, stating that he considered it unfair to allow the spouses precedence over those who were awaiting their turn in Dacca. The applicants sought judicial review of the Secretary of State's refusals to reverse the decisions of the immigration officers and a declaration that the right of a British citizen to live in the United Kingdom without let or hindrance conferred by section 1(1) of the Immigration Act 1971¹ included the right to marry and live in this country with a spouse and that any delay in the exercise of that right was unlawful.

On the applications for judicial review:—

Held, dismissing the applications, (1) that the right conferred by section 1(1) of the Act of 1971 did not by implication carry with it the right to be accompanied by a spouse or relatives who themselves required leave enter; and that even if it did the requirement that the spouses obtain entry clearance prior to admission to the United Kingdom was lawfully imposed as a requirement to establish the right of abode within the meaning of section 1(1) (post, pp. 639F–G, 640F–G).

Reg. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Phansopkar [1976] Q.B. 606, C.A. distinguished.

(2) That although the delay in processing applications could be lessened by the appointment of more entry clearance officers, the decision as to financial expenditure was one for the political judgment of the Secretary of State and was not a ground for challenging the Secretary of State's decision; and that his refusal to allow the interviews for the purpose of obtaining entry clearance to take place in the United Kingdom was not a decision which no reasonable Secretary of State properly directing himself could have reached (post, pp. 641F–642A).

APPLICATIONS for judicial review.

The applicants, Rofathullah, Soifur Rahman ali and Forizuddin, sought judicial review of decisions by the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 18 June 1986, 6 December 1985 and 14 May 1986 respectively to reverse the decisions of immigration officers to grant admission to the United Kingdom to the spouse, and in the case of the applicant Forizuddin, the fiancée, of the applicants. The applicants sought declaration that the right to come into and to go from the United Kingdom conferred by section 1(1) of the Immigration Act 1971 included the right to marry and live in the United Kingdom with a spouse and that any delay in the exercise of that right was unlawful.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Alper Riza for the applicants.

David Pannick for the Secretary of State.

TAYLOR J. These are three applications for judicial review. They have been heard together as they all raise the same points. In each the applicant is a British citizen married to a Bangladeshi wife. In each the wife was refused entry into the United Kingdom since she lacked an entry clearance certificate. The decision challenged in each case is the refusal of the Secretary of State to reverse the immigration officer's refusal.

The facts of the three cases can be stated quite shortly. The first applicant, Rofathullah, is 25 years old and was born in Bangladesh. He came to the United Kingdom in 1976 to join his father. He settled here and was registered as a British citizen in 1984. In May 1985 he went back to Bangladesh where he married Nurjahan Begum on 31 August 1985. She was a Bangladeshi citizen. He returned to the United Kingdom with his wife on 5 October 1985. They had made no application for an entry certificate in Dacca before coming to the United Kingdom because they knew that there would be a very considerable delay. On arrival the wife was refused leave to enter on the ground that she had no entry certificate. The assistance of a Member of Parliament was enlisted to seek a reversal of that decision, but by a letter of 6 December 1985 the Secretary of State maintained the refusal.

It is accepted in each of these three cases that the process of being interviewed with a view to obtaining an entry certificate in Dacca at the present time involved something of the order of 13 months' delay.

The second applicant is Soifur Rahman Ali. He is 27 years old. He is a British citizen born in the United Kingdom in Coventry of Bangladeshi parents. He has lived here most of his life, but on 13 March 1986 he married Dina Begum in Bangladesh. On 29 March 1986 he and his wife visited the British High Commission in Dacca and applied for an entry certificate for the wife to join her husband in England. There are letters from the High Commission indicating that no firm date could be given for an interview. The applicant claims that he had to return to the United Kingdom for business reasons and he was unwilling to endure any lengthy delay before his wife could join him. Accordingly he brought her back with him on 5 April 1986. She was given temporary admission whilst her case was considered, but on 4 May she was refused entry again on the ground that she had no entry clearance certificate. Once again the applicant sought help from a Member of Parliament. He also suggested by letter to the authorities that any interview that was necessary in respect of his wife's application for entry clearance might take place in the United Kingdom rather than in Dacca, but again the Secretary of State turned down the application by letter of 18 June 1986.

The third applicant is Forizuddin. He is 20 years old and was born in Bangladesh. He became a registered British citizen on 1 June 1985. He married Ashma Begum, a Bangladeshi citizen, in the United Kingdom

A on 18 December 1985. She falls to be considered as a fiancée rather than as a wife in this case because she had arrived on 23 November seeking leave to enter so as to marry the applicant. She was refused leave at that stage as she had no entry clearance, but she was granted temporary admission. She took advantage of that to marry the applicant and thereafter in this case, as in the other two, the assistance of a Member of Parliament was sought to try to overturn the decision of the B immigration officer. But by a letter of 14 May 1986 the Secretary of State refused to change the decision. Special reliance was placed in that case upon the fact that the applicant's wife was expecting a child imminently at the time that the approach was made to the Secretary of State, but unfortunately that child was stillborn in July 1986.

C It is unnecessary to recite the precise terms of the Secretary of State's decision in each case, but the rationale of each can perhaps best be summarized by referring to the letter which was written in the case of Soifur Rahman Ali on 18 June 1986. This paragraph appears in the minister's letter:

D "I attach great importance to the entry clearance requirement as an essential factor in maintaining an effective immigration control which is both firm and fair. It provides not only the opportunity for entry clearance officers to check the entitlement of applicants before they travel but also ensures that all are dealt with in a fair and orderly way. Waiving the requirement would encourage others to travel without entry clearance leading to long delays at ports while the necessary inquiries were undertaken. For these reasons I am prepared to set aside the entry clearance requirement only in E exceptional compassionate circumstances."

It is right to say that Mr. Riza does not suggest in these cases that there are any exceptional compassionate circumstances.

It is next convenient to look at the statutory provisions and at the rules which are relevant. First, reference must be made to section 1 of the Immigration Act 1971, which provides:

F "(1) All those who are in this Act expressed to have the right of abode in the United Kingdom shall be free to live in, and to come and go into and from, the United Kingdom without let or hindrance except such as may be required under and in accordance with this Act to enable their right to be established or as may be otherwise lawfully imposed on any person. (2) Those not having that right G may live, work and settle in the United Kingdom by permission and subject to such regulation and control of their entry into, stay in and departure from the United Kingdom as is imposed by this Act . . . (4) The rules laid down by the Secretary of State as to the practice to be followed in the administration of this Act for regulating the entry into and stay in the United Kingdom of persons not having the right of abode shall include provision for admitting H (in such cases and subject to such restrictions as may be provided by the rules, and subject or not to conditions as to length of stay or otherwise) persons coming . . . as dependants of persons lawfully in or entering the United Kingdom."

Section 2(1) of the Act, in the form in which it now stands having been amended by section 39 of the British Nationality Act 1981, reads:
 "A person is under this Act to have the right of abode in the United Kingdom if—(a) he is a British citizen . . .” Section 3, so far as is relevant, reads:

“(1) Except as otherwise provided by or under this Act, where a person is not [a British citizen]—(a) he shall not enter the United Kingdom unless given leave to do so in accordance with this Act . . . (2) The Secretary of State shall from time to time (and as soon as may be) lay before Parliament statements of the rules, or of any changes in the rules, laid down by him as to the practice to be followed in the administration of this Act for regulating the entry into and stay in the United Kingdom of persons required by this Act to have leave to enter . . .”

The relevant rules are those laid down in the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules of 9 February 1983 (H.C. 169), as amended by the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules of 15 July 1985 (H.C. 503). Paragraph 4 of H.C. 169 deals, inter alia, with the requirements for entry. The last sentence of paragraph 4 reads: “A person who is neither a British citizen nor a Commonwealth citizen having the right of abode requires leave to enter.” H.C. 503, by paragraph 3, substitutes new paragraphs in relation to the obtaining of entry clearance. It is unnecessary for me to read the provisions in full. Paragraph 8 of H.C. 503 substitutes new paragraphs 41 to 44 in H.C. 169 in respect of fiancées and deals with requirements before they can be admitted for settlement. Those requirements are that they must hold a current entry clearance granted for the purpose of entry and the entry clearance will be refused unless the officer is satisfied of various matters which I can shortly summarise as saying that the marriage is not a marriage of convenience. Similarly paragraph 10 of H.C. 503 substitutes new paragraphs in H.C. 169 in respect of spouses which are in similar terms to those in relation to fiancées.

Mr. Riza accepts that the wives of these applicants do not have a right of entry to the United Kingdom. They do not have a right of abode themselves, nor does the fact that they are married in each case to a British citizen give them any such right. Under the Immigration Act 1971 as originally enacted they would as Commonwealth citizens married to British citizens have had a right of abode themselves pursuant to section 2(2) as it then was. However, section 39(2) of the British Nationality Act 1981 amended the Act of 1971 to remove that right. Now wives and fiancées of British citizens who are themselves Commonwealth citizens require leave to enter the United Kingdom under section 3(1)(a) of the Act of 1971. They are subject to immigration control and to the rules made in pursuance of section 1(2), section 1(4) and section 3(2) of the Act of 1971.

Mr. Riza seeks to meet this problem by basing his case on the rights of the applicant husbands. His principal argument stems from section 1(1) of the Act of 1971. Each of the applicants having a right of abode has a right under that section to live in, come from and go to the United Kingdom without let or hindrance, subject to the exceptions stated. The argument is that if his wife is delayed for months in joining him that constitutes an indirect let or hindrance to the applicant's right. Mr. Riza contends that the right to live in the United Kingdom is not confined to a right of physical presence. It includes by implication, he says, the right to live in the United Kingdom normally with one's wife. He goes further and says not only with one's wife, but with one's children and relatives

A too. Therefore, the delay occasioned by processing entry clearance infringes the husband's right. He recognises that the phrase "without let or hindrance" in section 1(1) is qualified by the words "except as may be otherwise lawfully imposed on any person," but he maintains that once the wife is eligible to come any extensive delay in allowing her to do so is not lawfully imposed.

B Mr. Riza relies on Reg. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Phansopkar [1976] Q.B. 606. There the Court of Appeal ruled that it was unlawful for a wife's certificate of patriality to be delayed without good cause and that a desire by the authorities to be fair to all and avoid queue-jumping was not a valid reason for such delay. However, Phansopkar's case was decided when section 2(2) of the Act of 1971 still operated to give the patial's wife a right to come to the United Kingdom. Each member of the Court of Appeal emphasized the difference between one who has a right to come and one who requires leave. Thus Lord Denning M.R. said, at p. 622:

"It is only those who have a simple straightforward case for patriality who should get priority because they are entitled as of right and not by leave."

D Similarly Lawton L.J. said, at p. 623:

"Such rules as have been made under section 3(2) would not apply to patrials including wives coming within section 2(2) as they have a right to enter: they do not require leave to enter."

E The case decided that a wife having a right of abode could not lawfully be delayed in her exercise of it. Here it is common ground that the wives required leave.

F The distinction was underlined in the subsequent case of Reg. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Akhtar [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1717. There the wife was an alien and had therefore no right of abode under section 2(2) even as originally enacted. The court made it clear that the decision in Phansopkar's case did not apply to a person who did not have the right of abode.

G In my judgment, the argument based upon section 1(1) in this case is misconceived. However desirable it no doubt is in human terms that husband and wife should live together and should not have to endure long separation, section 1 cannot by implication give the husband a right to have his wife join him forthwith. The Act is concerned to distinguish between different categories of persons for the purposes of immigration. It differentiates between those who have a right of abode and those who require leave. The phrase "without let or hindrance" in section 1 cannot in my view carry with it the right to bring in forthwith a wife or relatives who themselves require leave. If it did there would be no need in section 1(4) to make provision by rules for dependants to come. Moreover, section 2(2), as originally enacted, which gave the Commonwealth wives of British citizens right of abode, would have been otiose. The amendment which replaced it has in any event made it clear that such wives require leave and the meaning of section 1(1) cannot have altered simply because section 2 has been amended.

H Mr. Pannick referred me to a decision of the Court of Appeal on similar facts which supports the view that Mr. Riza's argument is misconceived. It is Reg. v. Chief Immigration Officer at Heathrow Airport, Ex parte Brahmhatt, The Times, 12 December 1984; Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 464 of 1984, where Slade L.J. said, at pp. 14-15: A

"Though Mr. Nathan made some reference to the past history of our immigration laws going back beyond 1971, I confess that it never became completely clear to me upon what grounds he asserted that immediately before the passing of the Act of 1981 a wife in the position of the appellant would have had a right to enter this country at common law, apart from the statutory rights given her by section 2(2) of the Act of 1971. If I understood him correctly, he submitted, inter alia, that a woman in this position would have possessed such a right at common law as a by-product of the statutory right of her husband under section 1(1) of the Act of 1971 to come into the United Kingdom 'without let or hindrance.' I would, for my part, find great difficulty in accepting any such submission. However, I think it unnecessary to consider further what rights, if any, to enter this country the wife of a person who is now to be termed a British citizen would have enjoyed at common law immediately before the passing of the Act of 1981. For, in my opinion, it is quite clear that such common law right, if indeed it existed, must have been removed by the Act of 1981. B C

"In this context, I need do no more than refer to section 3(1)(a) of the Act of 1971, as amended in 1981 and quoted above, which makes it clear that a person who is not a British citizen has no right to enter the United Kingdom 'except as otherwise provided by or under this Act,' unless he is given leave to do so. In other words, whatever may have been the position before the passing of the Act of 1981, the rights of entry of any such person now stem from statute and statute alone. A person such as the appellant can gain a right of entry only by qualifying under the Act and the Rules. This, I think, is the combined effect of section 1(1), (2) and (4) and section 3(1) and (2) of the Act of 1971 as amended in 1981." D E

It is true that the argument in that case was put on the basis that the wife herself acquired a right to come as a by-product of the husband's right to live here without let or hindrance, whereas Mr. Riza simply relies upon the husband's right. However, the reasoning is analogous and in my view equally fallacious. Even if there were any merit in the broad submission that "without let or hindrance" implies a right to have one's wife and family, the exception here in relation to the wife requiring entry clearance is lawfully imposed. It depends upon section 3(1) and (2) and the rules made thereunder. F G

Mr. Riza concedes that if his main submission on section 1(1) fails, as I hold it does, he is in difficulty in pursuing his remaining contentions. They are that the delay is unreasonably long and that there is no reason why wives should not be interviewed in the United Kingdom rather than be sent back to Dacca. H

I accept Mr. Pannick's submission that the Secretary of State's decision is only open to challenge if it could be said to be illegal, irrational or involve a procedural impropriety. Apart from his point on section 1(1) of the Act, Mr. Riza does not suggest that this decision was illegal. Nor does he suggest that it involved any procedural impropriety in the sense of denying the applicant a hearing or failing to consult or any of the other manifestations of the phrase "procedural impropriety."

A What he contends here is that the decision was irrational. The irrationality he relies upon is based upon the factual background to the delay which has been mentioned. The delay, it is common ground, is due to the large number of applicants and the small number of entry clearance officers. There is no suggestion here of bad faith on the part of the authorities. There is no suggestion that the delay is being B deliberately created in order to slow down or bar immigration and there is no suggestion that the Secretary of State has prescribed, as it were, a period of delay in order to postpone the arrival of those eligible to join their spouses.

C What is accepted to be the position is that, having regard to the numbers, the period of delay in fact works out currently at about 13 months. Mr. Riza says that this could be overcome by appointing more entry clearance officers. Of course, that would involve further expense.
Mr. Pannick relies upon the fact that the expenditure is one which would have to be considered by the Secretary of State and he would be responsible to Parliament for considering what added expenditure would be justified.

D In those circumstances Mr. Pannick says that the court should be, and habitually has been, slow to interfere with the exercise of discretion by a Secretary of State. He relies further upon the dicta in Reg. v.
Secretary of State for the Environment, Ex parte Nottinghamshire County Council [1986] A.C. 240. That was a rate-capping case and it is perhaps sufficient if I read, from the headnote, the second holding in that case:

E “in the absence of some exceptional circumstances such as bad faith or improper motive on the part of the Secretary of State it was inappropriate for the courts to intervene on the ground of ‘unreasonableness’ in a matter of public financial administration that had been one for the political judgment of the Secretary of State and the House of Commons.”

F So far as Mr. Riza's second argument is concerned, namely that interviews could take place in the United Kingdom rather than applicant's wives be sent back to Dacca, a further consideration arises. The Secretary of State takes the view that it would be unfair to allow priority to those who enter in defiance of the requirement of entry certificate being obtained over those who abide by the rules and take their turn back in Bangladesh. In other words, it is the argument of fairness which G failed in Phansopkar's case [1976] Q.B. 606 because there it was sought to rely upon it where there was a right to come. Here, however, there is no such right. There is an eligibility subject to procedural rules which it is for the Secretary of State to make and place before Parliament and unless it could be shown that the system was one which was irrational in the sense that it was one which no reasonable Secretary of State could H properly arrive at, then such challenge as Mr. Riza makes to it must fail.

In my judgment, both on the question of additional expense in providing further entry clearance officers and in relation to the argument on interviews taking place in the United Kingdom where someone has sought to jump the queue, the approach which has been adopted by the Secretary of State is a reasonable one. One could not possibly say that it was one which was irrational or which no reasonable Secretary of State could have reached.

In those circumstances, the challenge on that basis must fail and accordingly, these applications must be refused.

Applications dismissed.

Judicial Review—Magistrates' court—Committal proceedings—Evidence of alleged confession to police put before examining justices—Justices' refusal to inquire into voluntariness of confession—Whether certiorari available to quash committal

C

The applicant was charged with five offences of burglary. The evidence on four of the charges consisted of alleged confessions to the police during the course of interviews. On the fifth charge the evidence against the applicant was circumstantial and did not include evidence of any alleged confession. At committal proceedings before the justices the applicant indicated that he wished to challenge the admissibility of the alleged confessions pursuant to section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984¹ on the ground that they had not been made voluntarily. The justices declined to inquire into the question whether the confessions were admissible, and committed the applicant for trial.

D

On an application for judicial review and an order of certiorari to quash the committal:—

E

Held, dismissing the appeal, that section 76(2) of the Act of 1984 had the effect that the justices were to consider the admissibility of a confession statement if that issue was raised in committal proceedings and, therefore, a refusal by the justices to do so was open to judicial review; but that, the court should only exercise its discretionary jurisdiction to quash a committal order on that ground alone in exceptional circumstances; and that, in any event, the court should not exercise its discretion in the present case since there was sufficient evidence to support the committal of the applicant on the fifth charge and, under the provisions of section 2(2)(i) of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1933, the other charges, in respect of which the evidence included the alleged confessions, were capable of being included in the indictment as being charges founded on the same facts or evidence disclosed in the depositions relating to the fifth charge (post, pp. 645D–E, 647D–F, H, 648A–B).

APPLICATION for judicial review.

The applicant, John Andrew Berry, sought judicial review by way of an order of certiorari to bring up into the High Court and quash his committal on 11 February 1986 by the Oxford City justices for trial on five charges of burglary. The grounds for the application were that the refusal of the justices to inquire into the voluntariness of confessions alleged by the prosecution to have been made by him to police in relation to four of the charges was unlawful and in breach of the provisions of section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

The facts are stated in the judgment of May L.J.

James Gibbons for the applicant.

Richard Jenkins for the prosecution.

Cur. adv. vult.

5 December. MAY L.J. read the following judgment. In this matter Mr. Gibbons moved with leave on behalf of one John Andrew Berry for judicial review in the nature of certiorari to bring up and quash his committal for trial on five charges of alleged burglary by the Oxford City justices on 11 February 1986.

The grounds upon which this application was made were based upon the provisions of section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which reads:

"If, in any proceedings where the prosecution proposes to give in evidence a confession made by an accused person, it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained—
(a) by oppression of the person who made it; or (b) in consequence of anything said or done which was likely, in the circumstances existing at the time, to render unreliable any confession which might be made by him in consequence thereof, the court shall not allow the confession to be given in evidence against him except in so far as the prosecution proves to the court beyond reasonable doubt that the confession (notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained as aforesaid."

The only evidence against the applicant on four of the burglary charges were confessions said to have been made by him to the police when they were investigating the offences. The evidence against him on the fifth charge was circumstantial and, it was contended before us, weak in the extreme. I shall have to return to this later in this judgment.

At the committal proceedings, at which the applicant appeared in person, he indicated to the justices and to their clerk that he wished to challenge the admissibility of his alleged confessions on the ground that they had not been voluntary under the provisions of section 76(2) of the Act of 1984. In an affidavit sworn by the clerk to the justices and filed in these proceedings, the latter said:

A "I considered section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in the light of section 6(1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 in that examining justices were concerned in finding a prima facie case only. Further, in the light of observations made in earlier B decided cases concerning the proper forum for the consideration of such matters I advised the justices that the issue of a confession improperly obtained was a matter for a judge in the Crown Court to decide, if prima facie evidence existed to commit the defendant for trial. The justices followed this advice and the committal continued."

C The applicant accepted that prior to the coming into force of the Act of 1984, if examining justices followed the procedure for committal proceedings prescribed by the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 and the Magistrates' Courts Rules 1981 (S.I. 1981 No. 552), this court would not interfere with a committal for trial on the ground that during the committal proceedings inadmissible evidence had been received: see Reg. v. Norfolk Quarter Sessions, Ex parte Brunson [1953] 1 Q.B. 503;
Reg. v. Ipswich Justices, Ex parte Edwards (1979) 143 J.P. 699 and Reg.
v. Highbury Magistrates' Court, Ex parte Boyce (1984) 79 Cr.App.R.
D 132.

E Counsel contended, however, that since the passing of the Act of 1984, where, as here, examining justices have not merely received inadmissible evidence, but have refused to enter upon the inquiry prescribed by section 76(2) of the Act of 1984 before receiving evidence of a confession, when it has been represented that it was or may not have been voluntary, the situation is different. By so refusing, he submitted, the justices thereby declined to enter upon an inquiry on which they were bound to enter; they did not merely receive inadmissible evidence, but they declined jurisdiction and thus the resulting committal can be challenged by certiorari.

F In support of this argument counsel referred us first to Reg. v.
Carden (1879) 5 Q.B.D. 1. In that case the question was whether upon an information for maliciously publishing a defamatory libel the examining magistrate should have received evidence as to the truth of the libel before deciding whether or not to commit the defendants for trial. The facts of that case were wholly different from those of the instant application and so also were the relevant statutory provisions.
But it had been argued that the magistrate had declined jurisdiction and G in the course of his judgment Cockburn C.J. said, at pp. 5-6:

H "It is said that in this case the magistrate has declined jurisdiction.
That involves the question whether he had jurisdiction to hear this evidence. I am clearly of the opinion that he had not. The duty and province of the magistrate before whom a person is brought, with a view to his being committed for trial or held to bail, is to determine, on hearing the evidence for the prosecution and that for the defence, if there be any, whether the case is one in which the accused ought to be put upon his trial. It is no part of his province to try the case. That being so, in my opinion, unless there is some further statutory duty imposed on the magistrate, the evidence before him must be confined to the question whether the case is such as ought to be sent for trial, and if he exceeds the limits of that inquiry, he transcends the bounds of his jurisdiction."

Counsel argued that today there is a further statutory duty imposed on the examining justices, namely that of making the inquiry into the question whether any confession relied on by the prosecution had been made voluntarily by virtue of section 76(2) of the Act of 1984.

We were also referred to Reg. v. Marsham [1892] 1 Q.B. 371. There, on the hearing of a summons against the owner of property in a new street to enforce payment of his apportioned share of the expenses of paving it, the defendant sought to give evidence to show that the amount alleged to have been expended had not actually been expended, or that it included expenses other than paving expenses. The magistrate refused to receive such evidence. An application for an order nisi for mandamus directed to the magistrate requiring him to hear and determine the summons, that is to do so according to law, was refused by a Divisional Court but was subsequently granted and thereafter made absolute in the Court of Appeal. In the course of his judgment Lord Halsbury L.C. said, at pp. 375, 376:

“No doubt a magistrate may improperly reject evidence, and the court may be unable to set him right, and the question is, whether this case comes within that category. I think that it does not; the act of the magistrate was not a mere rejection of evidence, but amounted to a declining to enter upon an inquiry on which he was bound to enter; he has not merely rejected evidence, but has declined jurisdiction, and, therefore, the right of the applicants to call upon him to exercise his jurisdiction is enforceable by mandamus . . . The magistrate was asked to enter upon an inquiry whether the subject-matter was paving or not, and it was suggested that the board had expended money on works which were wholly outside paving works. The magistrate took the view that he could not enter into the inquiry, and declined to do so, and the question for us is whether he was right. If so, no mandamus will lie; but if he was wrong, it is manifest that he absolutely refused to enter upon the inquiry and declined jurisdiction.”

“there is now an application for a mandamus upon the ground that the magistrate declined to exercise the jurisdiction given him by law. Now, the form in which he is said to have declined jurisdiction is, that he refused to hear certain evidence which was tendered before him, and it is suggested on behalf of the board that such refusal, at the most, only amounted to a wrongful refusal to receive evidence, and not to a declining of jurisdiction. The distinction between the two is sometimes rather nice; but it is plain that a judge may wrongly refuse to hear evidence upon either of two grounds: one, that even if received the evidence would not prove the subject-matter which the judge was bound to inquire into; the other, that whether the evidence would prove the subject-matter or not, the subject-matter itself was one into which he had no jurisdiction to inquire. In the former case the judge would be wrongly refusing to receive evidence, but would not be refusing jurisdiction, as he would in the latter. Here the magistrate does not say that the evidence tendered would not prove the fact that the claim of the board included matters outside the statute; he has refused to hear the evidence, even though it would prove that fact; he has, therefore, declined jurisdiction.”

A Although the circumstances of that case were again different from the present one, nevertheless it was argued that the applicable principle of law was the same. Where a magistrate is asked to enter upon an inquiry on which he is bound by statute to enter, then judicial review will lie to quash a decision reached by him without undertaking that obligatory inquiry.

B In answer to these submissions counsel for the Crown argued that the failure of the justices, on advice, to consider whether the alleged confessions by the applicant had or had not been improperly obtained did not affect their jurisdiction to decide whether a prima facie case had been made out against him and thus whether he should be committed for trial, even having regard to the provisions of section 76(2) of the Act. All that the justices may have done was to admit evidence which
C might prove to be inadmissible and there was ample authority, indeed it was accepted, that this court would not interfere with a committal by justices on this ground alone.

D Counsel, secondly, submitted that in any event certiorari was a discretionary remedy and that in circumstances such as obtained in the instant case, this court ought not to exercise its discretion in favour of the applicant: there would be ample opportunity at the trial to investigate the voluntariness or otherwise of the alleged confessions.

E Finally, counsel for the Crown submitted that the evidence relied on to raise a prima facie case against the applicant on the fifth charge of burglary did not include any alleged confession by him. Consequently his committal on this charge could not validly be challenged. By virtue of section 2(2)(i) of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1933 the indictment against the applicant could then include further counts founded on the facts or evidence disclosed in the depositions, for instance counts charging the four burglaries in respect of which the evidence led against the applicant in the committal proceedings had included the disputed confessions. On this ground also, the argument continued, it would be wrong to quash the committal of the applicant on any of the charges against him.

F I very much doubt whether the draftsman of section 76(2) of the Act of 1984 ever had in mind the possible impact that its provisions could have on committal proceedings before justices. I do not think that it can ever have been intended to produce such a radical change in such proceedings. As is well known the question of the voluntariness or otherwise of alleged confessions by an accused has hitherto seldom, if G ever, been investigated in committal proceedings before justices, save perhaps to have some matters of fact established in the cross-examination of prosecution witnesses to found a subsequent challenge to a confession at the ultimate trial on indictment.

H Nevertheless, on the authorities to which I have referred and remembering Lord Reid's classic dictum on the meaning of "jurisdiction" in Anisminic Ltd. v. Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 A.C. 147, 171, I think that as a matter of law certiorari could go to quash a committal in circumstances such as in the instant case, where the justices have refused to undertake the inquiry contemplated by section 76(2). Nevertheless I am quite satisfied that, save in the exceptional case, this court should not quash any committal on this ground alone. Judicial review is a discretionary remedy and if it were allowed to go in the circumstances of the instant case "I tremble to think what would be the result to the criminal practice of this country"—to use the words of Lord

Goddard C.J. in Reg. v. Norfolk Quarter Sessions, Ex parte Brunson [1953] 1 Q.B. 503, 505. As Geoffrey Lane L.J. said in similar vein in Reg. v. Ipswich Justices, Ex parte Edwards, 143 J.P. 699, 706: "No hardship results. If the evidence is found to be inadmissible at the trial, then the prosecution will have to do without it, to put it bluntly."

In any event, in the instant case, I think that, despite counsel for the applicant's valiant argument to the contrary, there was sufficient evidence before the justices to support their committal of him on the fifth burglary charge. On the third argument raised by counsel for the Crown therefore, it would I think be clearly wrong to accede to this application and for my part I would refuse it.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

GOLD v. HARINGEY HEALTH AUTHORITY

1987 March 10, 11, 12;
April 14

Watkins, Stephen Brown and Lloyd L.JJ.

B

Medical Practitioner—Negligence—Duty to inform—Sterilisation operation—Failure to give warning of possibility of fertility being restored—Subsequent pregnancy—Claim in negligence for non-disclosure of risk—Body of medical opinion against giving warning as to risk of pregnancy—Whether accepted professional standard test applicable to non-therapeutic advice

C

During the course of her third pregnancy in 1979, the plaintiff, after indicating that she did not wish to have any more children, was advised to undergo a sterilisation operation at the defendants' hospital after the birth of her child. The operation was duly carried out but the plaintiff later became pregnant and gave birth to a fourth child. She brought an action for damages for negligence against the defendants alleging, inter alia, that she had not been warned of the failure rate of female sterilisation operations and that if she had been warned her husband would have undergone a vasectomy instead. Medical evidence was adduced at the trial that there was a substantial body of responsible doctors who would not have given any such warning in 1979. The judge however held that the test whether there existed a substantial body of medical opinion who would have acted as the defendants had done applied only to advice given in a therapeutic context and did not apply to advice given in a contraceptive context. Applying his own view as to what information should have been given, he found that the defendants had been negligent in not warning the plaintiff that the operation might not succeed.

On the defendants' appeal:—

F

Held, allowing the appeal, that for the purposes of ascertaining the test as to the duty of care owed by a doctor to a patient there was no distinction to be made between advice given in a therapeutic context and advice given in a non-therapeutic context; that, accordingly, the judge erred in holding that advice given in a contraceptive context was not to be judged by the contemporary standards of a responsible body of medical opinion; and that, on the evidence, there was a substantial body of responsible doctors who would not in 1979 have warned the plaintiff of the failure rate of female sterilisation operations (post, pp. 656G—657B, 658A—B, 659A—D).

APPEAL from Schiemann J.

By a writ dated 10 October 1984 the plaintiff, Phyllis Gold, claimed damages against the defendants, the Haringey Health Authority, for negligence and breach of contract in the carrying out of a sterilisation operation on her on 20 August 1979. In 1982 she gave birth to a child. It was alleged that the defendants were negligent in failing to disclose to the plaintiff that the operation had a failure rate and was not guaranteed of success and, further (during the trial, by leave of the judge), in failing to discuss vasectomy with the plaintiff and/or the relative rates of failure of that and sterilisation. It was further alleged that the defendants were in breach of contract in that they undertook and guaranteed, alternatively were reasonably understood by the plaintiff to have undertaken or guaranteed, to make her permanently sterile. D

The defendants denied liability, contending that the plaintiff had been told that there was a failure rate with any sterilisation procedure and that, in any event, in 1979 a failure to warn in such circumstances would not have been negligent. E

On 16 June 1986 the judge upheld the plaintiff's claim finding the defendants negligent in not warning of a failure rate and in not mentioning vasectomy, and also finding the allegation of negligent misrepresentation proved. He gave judgment for the plaintiff for £19,000. F

By their notice of appeal, the defendants appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that the judge misdirected himself in holding that there was a distinction between advice given in a therapeutic context and advice given in connection with contraception counselling which meant that the latter was not to be judged by the contemporary reasonable standards of the medical profession; that he failed to attach any or sufficient weight to the fact that the undisputed evidence on both sides was to the effect that in 1979 approximately half the medical profession would not have warned of the risk of failure of an operation for sterilisation, nor, by implication, would they have counselled as to other appropriate methods of sterilisation or contraception; that he misdirected himself, or there was no evidence on which he could have made a finding, that there was no responsible body of medical opinion which would have failed to warn or mention vasectomy as an option in the context of someone seeking contraceptive advice; that he misdirected himself in holding that the questions as to warning of the failure rates and the relative risks of vasectomy and sterilisation were to be determined by the court's view as to whether or not the person giving advice acted negligently; and that G H

3 W.L.R.

Gold v. Haringey Health Authority (C.A.)

A the judge misdirected himself in holding that the defendants had negligently misrepresented to the plaintiff that the operation for sterilisation would render her permanently sterile.

The facts are set out in the judgment of Lloyd L.J.

Stephen Miller for the defendants.

Charles Lewis for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

14 April. The following judgments were handed down.

C LLOYD L.J. On 20 August 1979 the plaintiff, Mrs. Phyllis Gold, underwent an operation for sterilisation at the North Middlesex Hospital. It was on the day after the birth of her third child. The operation did not succeed, for in October 1982 she gave birth to her fourth child, Darren. In October 1984 she commenced these proceedings against Haringey Health Authority, despite the fact that she and her husband are delighted with Darren, their first boy, and indeed have gone on to have a fifth child, born in November 1984.

D In her writ, as amended, she claims damages for negligence in carrying out the operation. But that claim was rejected by the judge. He found that the plaintiff had failed to prove that Dr. Arzanghi, who carried out the operation, had been negligent. There is no appeal against that finding.

E But the judge went on to hold the defendants liable on another ground. He held that they ought to have warned the plaintiff that the operation might not succeed, and ought, in the circumstances, to have mentioned the alternative of vasectomy. If they had, then, according to the judge's findings, the plaintiff would not have consented to the operation, and Mr. Gold would have been vasectomised instead. By inference, he has found that the vasectomy would have been effective to prevent the birth of the fourth and fifth children. The failure rate for vasectomy was accepted as being about five per ten thousand, compared with a failure rate for female sterilisation of between two and six per thousand. The judge held that the defendants were negligent in not informing the plaintiff of the failure rate for female sterilisation, and that they are liable in damages accordingly, which he assessed at £19,000.

G Before relating the history of the matter, I desire to make one point clear. We are not in this case called on to decide whether it is desirable or not that a plaintiff should be able to claim damages for the birth of a healthy child, and a child which, in this particular case, the plaintiff and her husband are now delighted to have. In Jones v. Berkshire Area Health Authority (unreported), 2 July 1986, another unwanted pregnancy case, Ognall J. said:

H "I pause only to observe that, speaking purely personally, it remains a matter of surprise to me that the law acknowledges an entitlement in a mother to claim damages for the blessing of a healthy child. Certain it is that those who are afflicted with a handicapped child or who long desperately to have a child at all and are denied that good fortune would regard an award for this sort of contingency with a measure of astonishment. But there it is: that is the law."

Lloyd L.J.

Many would no doubt agree with that observation. But the desirability of permitting such a claim does not concern us here. At one time there was a conflict of decisions at first instance as to whether it was against public policy to allow a plaintiff to recover damages for the birth of a healthy child. But that conflict has been resolved, so far as this court is concerned, by the unanimous decision of this court in Emeh v. Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Area Health Authority [1985] Q.B. 1012. So in the present appeal we are concerned solely with the question whether the plaintiff has established negligence against the defendants by reason of their failure to warn the plaintiff that the operation might not succeed.

The history of the matter, very briefly, is as follows. The plaintiff's first and second children, both girls, were born in December 1969 and November 1972. There was then a long gap before she conceived her third child. In the course of her third pregnancy, she discussed with her husband the possibility of him having a vasectomy. According to Mr. Gold's evidence, they knew about vasectomy because two of his friends had had a vasectomy, including the plaintiff's brother-in-law. On 9 January 1982 the plaintiff went to see her general practitioner, Dr. Gomez. He confirmed she was pregnant. She told him that she and her husband were thinking of vasectomy. Dr. Gomez suggested sterilisation instead. According to the plaintiff's evidence, Dr. Gomez was not against vasectomy, but said that sterilisation would be "handier" as the plaintiff would be in hospital in any event having her third child.

On 24 July 1982 the plaintiff saw Miss Witt, the consultant to whom she had been referred at the commencement of her pregnancy. The plaintiff told Miss Witt that she did not want any more children. Miss Witt suggested sterilisation. She did not mention vasectomy as an alternative; but then neither did the plaintiff, although it had been discussed between her and her husband the previous January.

Soon after 24 July the plaintiff must have returned to see Dr. Gomez, her general practitioner. Regrettably Dr. Gomez was not called as a witness, so we do not know what took place on that occasion. All we know is that on 31 July he wrote to Miss Witt:

"Many thanks for considering this patient for sterilisation. She has two children aged 10 and 7 years and she is due for her confinement on 20 August 1979. The patient is aware that this is an irreversible operation."

It may be that there was some discussion about vasectomy, and that Dr. Gomez repeated his earlier advice that sterilisation would be "handier;" but we do not know, since Dr. Gomez was not called, and the plaintiff was not asked.

On 14 August the plaintiff saw Dr. Plummer, the house surgeon. She told her that she wanted to be sterilised, and signed a written consent in the form then current. On 19 August she gave birth to Nicola. On 20 August the operation was performed. The judge has found on the balance of probabilities that neither Miss Witt nor Dr. Plummer nor Dr. Arzanghi ever clearly explained that there was a risk of the operation failing. Mr. Miller, who appears for the defendants, does not seek to go behind that finding.

In her case as originally pleaded the plaintiff relied exclusively on the absence of any warning as to the failure rate of the operation, which, as I have said, was accepted as being about two per thousand, or about six

3 W.L.R.

Gold v. Haringey Health Authority (C.A.)

Lloyd L.J.

A per thousand if carried out immediately after childbirth. But on the third day of the evidence, when one of the plaintiff's experts was being re-examined, the judge raised the question whether it might be the defendants' duty, not only to warn the plaintiff of the failure rate for sterilisation, but also to compare the failure rate for female sterilisation with the failure rate for male vasectomy. The point was taken up later

B the same day with the first of the defendants' experts. On the following morning Mr. Lewis, for the plaintiff, applied to re-amend the statement of claim in accordance with the judge's indication, so as to allege that the defendants were negligent in failing to discuss vasectomy with the plaintiff, and to mention the relative failure rates of the two operations. Despite this amendment, Mr. Lewis made clear to us that his main case rested, and had always rested, on the simple failure to warn that

C sterilisation might not succeed.

I now turn to the evidence. The doctors were unanimous in their view that though they themselves would have warned of the risk of failure, nevertheless a substantial body of responsible doctors would not have given any such warning in 1979. One of the witnesses put the proportion of doctors who would not have given any such warning in 1979 as high as 50 per cent. How then did it come about that the judge

D convicted the defendants of negligence?

In directing the jury in Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 W.L.R. 582, 587, McNair J. said:

E "[A medical man] is not guilty of negligence if he has acted in accordance with a practice accepted as proper by a responsible body of medical men skilled in that particular art. . . . merely because there is a body of opinion who would take a contrary view."

In Maynard v. West Midlands Regional Health Authority [1984] 1 W.L.R. 634, the House of Lords applied the Bolam test to a case of wrongful diagnosis. Lord Scarman said, at p. 638:

F "It is not enough to show that there is a body of competent professional opinion which considers that there was a wrong decision, if there also exists a body of professional opinion, equally competent, which supports the decision as reasonable in the circumstances. It is not enough to show that subsequent events show that the operation need never have been performed, if at the time the decision to operate was taken it was reasonable in the sense that a responsible body of medical opinion would have

G accepted it as proper."

In Sidaway v. Board of Governors of the Bethlem Royal Hospital and the Maudsley Hospital [1985] A.C. 871, the House of Lords applied the same test to a case in which a doctor, before carrying out an operation, failed to warn his patient of a very small risk of very serious injury. It would have been open to the House of Lords to hold that the Bolam test applied to negligent diagnosis and negligent treatment, but not negligent advice. In other words, the House of Lords could have adopted the doctrine of "informed consent" favoured in the United States of America and Canada. But the House of Lords declined to follow that path. Lord Diplock said, at pp. 893-895:

"In English jurisprudence the doctor's relationship with his patient which gives rise to the normal duty of care to exercise his skill and judgment to improve the patient's health in any particular respect in which the patient has sought his aid, has hitherto been treated as single comprehensive duty covering all the ways in which a doctor is called upon to exercise his skill and judgment in the improvement of the physical or mental condition of the patient for which his services either as a general practitioner or specialist have been engaged. This general duty is not subject to dissection into a number of component parts to which different criteria of what satisfy the duty of care apply, such as diagnosis, treatment, advice (including warning of any risks of something going wrong however skilfully the treatment advised is carried out.) The Bolam case itself embraced failure to advise the patient of the risk involved in the electric shock treatment as one of the allegations of negligence against the surgeon as well as negligence in the actual carrying out of treatment in which that risk did result in injury to the patient. The same criteria were applied to both these aspects of the surgeon's duty of care. In modern medicine and surgery such dissection of the various things a doctor had to do in the exercise of his whole duty of care owed to his patient is neither legally meaningful nor medically practicable. Diagnosis itself may involve exploratory surgery, the insertion of drugs by injection (or vaccination) involves intrusion upon the body of the patient and oral treatment by drugs although it involves no physical intrusion by the doctor on the patient's body may in the case of particular patients involve serious and unforeseen risks. . . . My Lords, I venture to think that in making this separation between that part of the doctor's duty of care that he owes to each individual patient, which can be described as a duty to advise upon treatment and warn of its risks, the courts have misconceived their functions as the finders of fact in cases depending upon the negligent exercise of professional skill and judgment. In matters of diagnosis and the carrying out of treatment the court is not tempted to put itself in the surgeon's shoes; it has to rely upon and evaluate expert evidence, remembering that it is no part of its task of evaluation to give effect to any preference it may have for one responsible body of professional opinion over another, provided it is satisfied by the expert evidence that both qualify as responsible bodies of medical opinion. But when it comes to warning about risks, the kind of training and experience that a judge will have undergone at the Bar makes it natural for him to say (correctly) it is my right to decide whether any particular thing is done to my body, and I want to be fully informed of any risks there may be involved of which I am not already aware from my general knowledge as a highly educated man of experience, so that I may form my own judgment as to whether to refuse the advised treatment or not.

"No doubt if the patient in fact manifested this attitude by means of questioning, the doctor would tell him whatever it was the patient wanted to know; but we are concerned here with volunteering unsought information about risks of the proposed treatment failing to achieve the result sought or making the patient's physical or mental condition worse rather than better. The only effect that mention of risks can have on the patient's mind, if it has any at all, can be in the direction of deterring the patient from undergoing the treatment which in the expert opinion of the doctor it is in the patient's interest to undergo. To decide what risks the existence of

Gold v. Haringey Health Authority (C.A.)

Lloyd L.J.

A which a patient should be voluntarily warned and the terms in which such warning, if any, should be given, having regard to the effect that the warning may have, is as much an exercise of professional skill and judgment as any other part of the doctor's comprehensive duty of care to the individual patient, and expert medical evidence on this matter should be treated in just the same B way. The Bolam test should be applied."

How then, I ask again, did it come about that the judge found the defendants guilty of negligence, when he accepted that there was a substantial body of responsible medical opinion in 1979 who would not have given any warning? The answer is that he drew a distinction between advice or warning in a therapeutic context and advice or C warning in a contraceptive context. In a therapeutic context there was a body of responsible medical opinion which would not have warned of the failure rate. But in a contraceptive context there was no such body of responsible medical opinion. Even if there had been, he would still have found the defendants negligent, since in his view the Bolam test does not apply at all to advice given in a non-therapeutic context. He said:

D "I accept that it was the view of the majority of the House of Lords that in the therapeutic context of that case the duty to give advice was subject to the same test as the duty to diagnose and treat, and that this test, known as the Bolam test after an earlier case, was that a doctor is not negligent if he acts in accordance with a practice accepted as proper by a responsible body of medical opinion even E though other doctors adopt a different practice. This test is different from the one generally applied in actions in respect of negligent advice. I see nothing in the reasons given for adopting the Bolam test in the sort of circumstances under consideration in Sidaway which compels me to widen the application of this exceptional rule so as to cause it to apply to contraceptive counselling."

F So the judge decided against the defendants on two grounds. First, he held that the Bolam test did not apply at all in a contraceptive context. Instead he applied his own judgment as to what should have been mentioned in that context. Secondly, if the Bolam test did apply, then he found as a fact that there was nobody of responsible medical opinion which would not, in a contraceptive context, have warned of the G risk of failure. I have reversed these two grounds, since the first ground raises a question of considerable general importance.

Was the judge right when he held that the Bolam test is an exception to the ordinary rule in actions for negligence? If by an "exceptional rule" the judge meant that the Bolam test is confined to actions against doctors, then I would respectfully disagree. I have already quoted a H passage from McNair J.'s summing up in Bolam's case. In an earlier passage he had said [1957] 1 W.L.R. 582, 586:

"where you get a situation which involves the use of some special skill or competence, then the test as to whether there has been negligence or not is not the test of the man on the top of a Clapham omnibus, because he has not got this special skill. The test is the standard of the ordinary skilled man exercising and professing to have that special skill."

So far as I know that passage has always been treated as being of general application whenever a defendant professes any special skill. It is so treated in Charlesworth & Percy on Negligence, 7th ed. (1983), p. 388 para. 6–17. The Bolam test is not confined to a defendant exercising or professing the particular skill of medicine. If there had been any doubt on the question, which I do not think there was, it was removed by the speech of Lord Diplock in the Sidaway case [1985] A.C. 871, 892. Lord Diplock made it clear that the Bolam test is rooted in an ancient rule of common law applicable to all artificers. In Saif Ali v. Sydney Mitchell & Co. [1980] A.C. 198, Lord Diplock treated the same test as applicable to barristers, although he did not mention the Bolam case by name. The question in that case was whether a barrister is immune from an action in negligence in relation to advice given out of court. It was held that he is not. Lord Diplock said, at p. 220:

“No matter what profession it may be, the common law does not impose on those who practise it any liability for damage resulting from what in the result turn out to have been errors of judgment, unless the error was such as no reasonably well-informed and competent member of that profession could have made.”

Mr. Lewis did his best to argue that the Bolam test is confined to doctors. For the reasons I have given, I cannot accept that argument. I can see no possible ground for distinguishing between doctors and any other profession or calling which requires special skill, knowledge or experience. To be fair to the judge, it was not, I think, on this ground that he regarded the Bolam test as exceptional.

In passing, I should mention that the Bolam test is often thought of as limiting the duty of care. So in one sense it does. But it also extends the duty of care, as the second of the two passages I have quoted from McNair J.’s summing up in the Bolam case makes clear. The standard is not that of the man on the top of the Clapham omnibus, as in other fields of negligence, but the higher standard of the man skilled in the particular profession or calling.

Why then did the judge think that it would be an extension of the Bolam test to apply it in the present case? The reason can only have been that which I have already mentioned, namely, the distinction between therapeutic and non-therapeutic advice. Mr. Lewis took us through the Sidaway case [1985] A.C. 871 speech by speech, and paragraph by paragraph, in order to point the distinction. But I remain unconvinced. In the first place the line between therapeutic and non-therapeutic medicine is elusive. A plastic surgeon carrying out a skin graft is presumably engaged in therapeutic surgery; but what if he is carrying out a face-lift, or some other cosmetic operation? Mr. Lewis found it hard to say.

In the second place, a distinction between advice given in a therapeutic context and advice given in a non-therapeutic context would be a departure from the principle on which the Bolam test is itself grounded. The principle does not depend on the context in which any act is performed, or any advice given. It depends on a man professing skill or competence in a field beyond that possessed by the man on the Clapham omnibus. If the giving of contraceptive advice required no special skill, then I could see an argument that the Bolam test should not apply. But that was not, and could not have been, suggested. The fact (if it be the fact) that giving contraceptive advice involves a different

Gold v. Haringey Health Authority (C.A.)

Lloyd L.J.

A sort of skill and competence from carrying out a surgical operation does not mean that the Bolam test ceases to be applicable. It is clear from Lord Diplock's speech in Sidaway that a doctor's duty of care in relation to diagnosis, treatment and advice, whether the doctor be a specialist or general practitioner, is not to be dissected into its component parts. To dissect a doctor's advice into that given in a therapeutic context and that given in a contraceptive context would be to go against the whole thrust of the decision of the majority of the House of Lords in that case. So I would reject Mr. Lewis's argument under this head, and hold that the judge was not free, as he thought, to form his own view of what warning and information ought to have been given, irrespective of any body of responsible medical opinion to the contrary.

C So I turn to the second question, which assumes, as I have held, that the Bolam test applies. Here Mr. Lewis acknowledges that he is in some difficulty. For in the course of the defence evidence the judge observed to Mr. Lewis:

D "You are in the happy position of being able to say, as I understand it, that all of the defence team, as it were, are all saying that they personally would have advised, and in one case they claim they did advise. You are in that happy position. You are in the unhappy position that they will say, as you have to accept, that there were squads of people who did not."

To which Mr. Lewis replied: "Yes, if we apply the Bolam test, I have had it on this limb certainly."

E Indeed as late as Mr. Miller's closing submission the judge observed that the defendants were "home and dry" if Sidaway applied, as I have held it does. Yet when he came to give judgment, the judge had changed his mind. For the sake of convenience I repeat here verbatim the three relevant findings:

F "[1] That in a non-contraceptive context, for instance if there had been a therapeutic reason for sterilising [the plaintiff], there was a responsible body of medical opinion which would not, unasked, have mentioned the fact that the operation involved an element of risk. [2] That in the context of someone seeking contraceptive advice there was such a body of medical opinion which would not, unasked, have mentioned that the failure rate of a post partum sterilisation operation was several times as high as the ultimate failure rate of a vasectomy. [3] That in the context of someone seeking contraceptive advice there was no such body of medical opinion which would have failed to mention that there was a risk of failure of the post partum sterilisation or that vasectomy was an option or to make inquiries of the domestic situation of the party seeking advice."

H I can find nothing in the evidence which justifies the last of these findings. Mr. Lewis relies on the documentary evidence, some of which is set out in the judge's judgment. I need not refer to it in detail. As was to be expected, it emphasises the importance of counselling before deciding on an operation, whether for male or female sterilisation. In addition, the documents published by the medical defence bodies—again as was only to be expected—discourage the giving of any sort of guarantee of success. But this evidence does not meet the point made by Mr. Miller and by all the witnesses, including those called by the plaintiff, who said that (though they would themselves have warned the plaintiff of the risk of failure, there was a body of responsible doctors in 1979 who would not have done so. The judge accepted in his judgment that the distinction between advising in a contraceptive and non-contraceptive context was not "crystal clear" on the evidence. With respect, that is an understatement. The witnesses were never asked to distinguish between the two cases. There was therefore only one finding open on the evidence, namely, that there was a body of responsible medical opinion which would not have given any warning as to the failure of female sterilisation, and the possible alternatives, in the circumstances in which the defendants actually found themselves. So I would not accept the second of the two grounds on which the judge decided against the defendants.

That makes it unnecessary to consider whether, if the defendants had been under a duty to warn, they were entitled to assume that an adequate warning had been given by Dr. Gomes, the general practitioner. We know from his letter of 31 July 1979 that he warned the plaintiff that the operation was irreversible. But since he was not called, we do not know what other warning, if any, he may have given.

Mr. Lewis referred us in passing to Thorne v. Motor [1985] Q.B. 644, where it was held to have been negligent on the part of a surgeon undertaking a vasectomy not to warn of the risk of failure in accordance with his usual practice. But in that case, as Kerr L.J. pointed out at p. 680, there was no independent medical evidence called by either side. So, as Mr. Lewis sensibly agreed, it does not help him in the present case. Nor does he get any help from Jones v. Berkshire Area Health Authority (unreported), 2 July 1986 for in that case the duty to warn was admitted.

Finally, I should mention the plaintiff's claim for negligent misrepresentation. In the statement of claim it is pleaded by amendment:

"By reason of the matters pleaded in paragraphs 2-5 above the defendants negligently misrepresented to the plaintiff that the operation would render her permanently sterile and/or that sterilisation was her only contraceptive option and in reliance upon such representation the plaintiff agreed to undergo the said operation."

The judge deals with that allegation at the end of his judgment, and does so in a very few words for the sake, as he puts it, of completeness. He makes no finding as to the terms of the representation, or whether it was express or implied. All he says is, "I find that allegation proved."

The only possible justification for the judge's finding on the evidence is that it is to be inferred from the fact that the plaintiff was told that the operation was irreversible. But to draw that inference from the use of the word "irreversible" would be inconsistent with the decision of this court in Ayre v. Moulton [1986] 1 All E.R. 488, where a similar argument was advanced. Slade L.J. said, at p. 494:

"There has been some discussion in the course of argument on the meaning of the phrase 'irreversible' and as to the relevance of the statement, undoubtedly made by the defendant to the plaintiff, that the proposed operation must be regarded as being irreversible. However, I take the reference to irreversibility as simply meaning that the operative procedure in question is incapable of being reversed, that what is about to be done cannot be undone. I do not think it can reasonably be construed as a representation that the

Lloyd L.J.

A operation is bound to achieve its acknowledged object, which is a different matter altogether.”

So I would reject the plaintiff's claim for negligent misrepresentation.

For the reasons I have given the plaintiff has failed to make good her claim for negligence. Accordingly, I would allow this appeal.

B WATKINS L.J. I agree.

STEPHEN BROWN L.J. I agree that this appeal should be allowed. In my judgment the test laid down in Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 W.L.R. 582, 587 as further considered and explained by Lord Diplock in Sidaway v. Board of Governors of Bethlem Royal Hospital [1985] A.C. 871 should be applied to the facts of this case. The judge appears to have been persuaded to find a distinction between advice given in a “therapeutic” and a “non-therapeutic” context. Such a distinction is wholly unwarranted and artificial. The general duty of the doctors treating the plaintiff is, in the words of Lord Diplock at p. 893, “not subject to dissection into a number of component parts to which different criteria of what satisfy the duty of care apply.” I entirely agree with the careful analysis made by Lloyd L.J. in his judgment.

D I feel it right to add that in this case it was unfortunate that the judge was not able to hear evidence from the general practitioner, who clearly played an important and relevant role in the story.

Appeal allowed.

Costs of defendants against plaintiff in court below not to be enforced without order of court.

Costs of appeal against the legal aid fund of The Law Society, not to be proceeded with without granting The Law Society opportunity to make representations.

Leave to appeal refused.

In the first of the three appeals the taxpayers were the directors of, and owned shares in Q. Ltd., a company operating in the grocery trade. In early 1976 the taxpayers began to negotiate with C. Ltd. for a merger of the two companies and steps were taken to establish an Isle of Man holding company to act as a vehicle for the taxpayers' shares should the merger materialise. Later in that year the taxpayers were approached regarding the possibility of a sale of Q. Ltd. to J. Ltd. Thereupon the merger negotiations with C. Ltd. ceased during negotiations to sell Q. Ltd. for a price in excess of £2m. By June 1976 the taxpayers, fearing that the sale to J. Ltd. would not materialise, resumed merger talks with C. Ltd., and M. Ltd., an Isle of Man holding company, was incorporated. But talks were resumed between the taxpayers, their advisers and J. Ltd. The taxpayers on 19 July 1976 exchanged their shares in Q. Ltd. for shares in M. Ltd. On 9 August agreement was reached for J. Ltd. to purchase the share capital of Q. Ltd. from M. Ltd. for £2.2m. subject to adjustments. Payments for the shares was to be made by instalments, £1.8m. on completion of the sale and the balance by two further payments of adjustable amounts. The taxpayers between 1977 and 1981 received several substantial interest free loans from M. Ltd. They were each assessed under section 19 of the Finance Act

Craven v. White (C.A.)

1965¹ to capital gains tax for the years 1976–77 and 1977–78 on the basis that they had for tax purposes disposed of their shares in Q. Ltd. to J. Ltd., the share exchange with M. Ltd. being treated as a fiscal nullity, and that those disposals gave rise to chargeable gains, the consideration for the disposals being the sums received by M. Ltd. for Q. Ltd.'s shares. The taxpayers appealed against the assessments contending that the relieving provisions for company amalgamations contained in paragraphs 4(2) and 6 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965 exempted them from the charge to the tax. The special commissioners determined the appeals shortly before the House of Lords' decision in Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474 and they held, inter alia, that there was a single composite transaction for the purposes of the principle enunciated by the House of Lords in W.T. Ramsay Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1982] A.C. 300 but that no part of it, was to be regarded as a fiscal nullity. An appeal by the Crown from that determination was dismissed by Peter Gibson J. who held that as the taxpayers had exchanged the shares partly for a proper commercial purpose and had done so at a time when the sale of Q. Ltd. to J. Ltd. was not certain, there was no "pre-ordained series of transactions" or "single composite transaction" for the purposes of applying the Ramsay principle. In the result the share exchange could not be disregarded for fiscal purposes and the taxpayers were not to be regarded for the purposes of the tax as having made any disposal to J. Ltd.

In the second of the three cases the taxpayer company, a member of a large group of companies, decided to sell 23 acres of land that it owned. In 1980 negotiations began for a sale of that land to M.P. Ltd. for a price exceeding £200,000. Before any contract for such a sale was entered into, the taxpayer company, who at that time fully expected the proposed sale to M.P. Ltd. to materialise, contracted to sell the land to five companies in the group as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares for £180,000. It was common ground that that transaction was designed solely to avoid liability to development land tax that would otherwise arise on a direct sale of the land by the taxpayer company to M.P. Ltd. under the provisions of sections 1 and 4 of the Development Land Tax Act 1976.² In July 1980 M.P. Ltd. notified the taxpayer company that it no longer wished to purchase the land. However, due to a change in circumstances, in February 1981 M.P. Ltd. reopened negotiations that resulted in a sale in November 1981 of the land by the five group companies to M.P. Ltd. for £259,750. An assessment to the tax was subsequently raised on the taxpayer company in respect of the sale on the basis that the taxpayer company was to be regarded for tax purposes as having disposed of the land direct to M.P. Ltd. The taxpayer company appealed against the assessment to the special commissioners who upheld its case that because at the time of the sale of the land to the five companies there was no certainty that the ultimate sale to M.P. Ltd. would take place, the transactions did not constitute a single composite transaction for the purposes of the application of the Ramsay principle and accordingly the true disponors of the land were the five companies. The commissioners discharged the assessment. An appeal by the Crown was dismissed by Warner J. who held that the commissioners' decision was correct: the relevant transactions resulting in the disposal to M.P. Ltd. were not pre-arranged or pre-ordained because at the time of the sale of the land by the taxpayer company to the five companies it could not be said that there was no likelihood in practice that the ultimate sale to M.P. Ltd. would not follow.

In the third appeal the first of the taxpayers was the managing director and major shareholder in P.G.I. Ltd. and also one of the trustees of a family trust that held shares in the company. In 1973 he began negotiations, that eventually broke down, to sell P.G.I. Ltd. to another company. To postpone indefinitely liability to a capital gains tax charge on a sale of P.G.I. Ltd. an Isle of Man company was incorporated for the purpose of carrying out a share exchange scheme that would attract roll-over relief under the provisions contained in Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965. Despite the failure of the negotiations, in 1974 the shares in P.G.I. Ltd. were exchanged for shares in the Isle of Man company. In 1976 the Isle of Man company sold all the shares in P.G.I. Ltd. to a third party. Various assessments to tax were raised on the taxpayer personally and on him as a trustee and on other P.G.I. Ltd. shareholders on the basis that the 1974 share exchange constituted chargeable disposals by them. All the assessments were appealed against. In the assessment that was raised on the trustees, due to a typing error the year assessed was stated to be 1974-75: it should have related to the year 1975-76. The trustees did not notice the mistake and by the time that it came to the tax inspector's notice the time limit for raising a new assessment for 1975-76 had expired. Without notifying the trustees, the inspector had the assessment "vacated" in the assessment book and advised the collector of taxes not to proceed in respect of it against the trustees. At the hearing of the appeals the special commissioners allowed the appeals by all the shareholders. In relation to the assessment on the trustees containing the mistake, a single commissioner rejected the Crown's case that an assessment could not be withdrawn unilaterally and that in any event it was capable of being corrected under the provisions of section 114(1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970.³ He held that that assessment could not stand. The Crown appealed in respect of both the substantive and the preliminary issues. Vinelott J. allowed its appeal on the preliminary issue holding that an assessment could not be withdrawn by the unilateral act of an inspector after it had been made and served on a taxpayer and that as the error was genuine and had not misled the trustees section 114(1) of the Act of 1970 applied with the result that the assessment could be treated as a valid assessment for 1975-76 but he dismissed the Crown's appeal on the substantive issue.

On appeals by the Crown on the substantive issue raised in each case and by the trustees on the preliminary issue raised in the third case:—

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Held, (1) dismissing the Crown's appeals, that transactions, each of which had legal effects, were not to be regarded as a pre-ordained series of transactions or a single composite transaction for the purposes of applying the Ramsay principle unless at the time when the first transaction was effected all the essential features of the second transaction had already been determined by persons having both the intention and ability to procure the implementation of that second transaction; that in each of the three appeals because the first transaction had been effected at a time when there was no certainty that the ultimate sale would materialise there were no preordained series of transactions or composite transactions; that accordingly neither the share exchange transactions nor the sale of land to the five group companies could be disregarded for fiscal purposes and the taxpayers were not to be regarded either for capital gains tax purposes or for development land tax purposes as having made a disposal of the relevant assets direct to the ultimate purchasers (post, pp. 679A—680A, 686B—D, 689G—H, 690C—D, 697E—H, 702D—E, 707H, 709A, 714H—716A).

(2) Allowing the trustees' appeal, that the vacation of an assessment to tax had to be properly effected if it was to be valid and was not, in accordance with the provisions of the Taxes Management Act 1970, so effected by the unilateral act of an inspector; that in relation to capital gains tax the year of assessment was of critical importance and the revenue when issuing an assessment had to get the fiscal year to which it related correct and neither section 114(1) nor any other provision of the Act of 1970 enabled an assessment specified to be for one year to take effect as an assessment for another; it followed that the assessment raised on the trustees was to be treated as a valid assessment for 1974–75 and not for 1975–76 and accordingly did not give rise to any liability to charge against them (post, pp. 693D—E, 694B—C, H—695A, D—E, 696A—C, G—H, 708H, 716A).

CRAVEN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. WHITE (STEPHEN) SAME v. WHITE (BRIAN)

APPEAL from Peter Gibson J.

During 1976 the taxpayers, Stephen White and Brian White, together with Archibald White, were involved in the following transactions: (1) the exchange by them on 19 July 1976 of their shares in S. White and Sons (Queensferry) Ltd. for shares in Millor Investments Ltd., an Isle of Man company, and (2) the sale by Millor Investments Ltd. on 9 August 1976 to Morris and David Jones Ltd. of the shares of the company which it had acquired on 19 July 1976. They appealed against assessments to capital gains tax made on them as follows: Mr. Stephen White: 1976–77: £400,000 (main) and £1,075,000 (further) and 1977–78: £80,000; Mr. Brian White: 1976–77: £130,000 (main) and £360,000 (further) and 1977–78: £27,000. Assessments were also raised for the same years against Mr. Archibald White and against which he appealed. The special commissioners determined the appeals by reducing the assessments raised on Mr. Stephen White to £55,000 for 1976–77 and to £60,000 for 1977–78 and by discharging the assessments for 1976–77 made on Mr. Brian White and reducing that for 1977–78 to £12,098. They further determined the assessments on Mr. Archibald White in substantially reduced amounts. The Crown appealed against all the determinations. Before the appeals came on for hearing Mr. Archibald White died and personal representatives of his estate were not appointed until some later date. On 24 May 1985 Peter Gibson J. ordered that the determination of the commissioners be affirmed holding that the taxpayers could not be regarded as having made disposals of their

A shares direct to the ultimate purchaser and were entitled to claim relief for company amalgamations contained in paragraphs 4(2) and 6 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965 in respect of the share exchange transactions with the Isle of Man company.

B The Crown appealed and by a notice of appeal dated 28 June 1985 set out the grounds as (1) that the judge relied on the formulation by Lord Brightman in Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474, 527, of the limitations of the principle in W.T. Ramsay Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1982] A.C. 300: "First, there must be a pre-ordained series of transactions: or, if one likes, one single composite transaction. This composite transaction may or may not include the achievement of a legitimate commercial (i.e. business) end. . . . Secondly, there must be steps inserted which have no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax—not no 'business effect.' If those two ingredients exist, the inserted steps are to be disregarded for fiscal purposes."

D (2) That in relation to the first of those limitations: (i) the question whether there was or was not a composite transaction comprising the share exchange on 19 July 1976 and the subsequent sale on 9 August 1976 was a question of fact as held by Lord Brightman in Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474, 527–528, and accepted by the judge. The commissioners found as a fact (having had all the relevant authorities directed to their attention) that there was such a composite transaction. Such finding could only be disturbed if insupportable on the basis of the primary facts found; (ii) the judge erred in holding that the commissioners' finding of a composite transaction was insupportable. The judge [1985] 1 E W.L.R. 1024, 1033 held that the commissioners were wrong in regarding "as the essential quality of a composite transaction . . . that the taxpayer, with his advisers, should at the time the first step in the composite transaction was taken have planned the steps in the series that made up the composite transaction, regardless of whether the means of achieving all the steps lay within the control of the taxpayer or of whether there was otherwise any practical certainty that all the planned steps would be completed"; (iii) in so holding the judge confused certainty as to the series of steps, or machinery, by which any commercial end was to be achieved with certainty as to the achievement of the end itself; (iv) there was certainty on the facts as to the series of steps whereby the tax advantage was intended to be achieved. The taxpayers intended that should the sale of their shares be achieved it should be routed through G the interposed Isle of Man company; (v) provided the machinery by which the commercial end was to be achieved was pre-ordained it was irrelevant that there remained a possibility that its execution might be frustrated by a failure to achieve the commercial end itself; (vi) Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300, 323–324, said: "It is the task of the court to ascertain the legal nature of any transaction to which it is H sought to attach a tax or a tax consequence and if that emerges from a series or combination of transactions, intended to operate as such, it is that series or combination which may be regarded." The series of transactions in the case, namely the share exchange and the ultimate sale, were intended to operate "as such," namely in combination, and therefore it was that series of transactions which ought to be regarded as a whole; (vii) even if the cases in which the Ramsay principle had so far been applied have been ones in which there had been certainty both as to the machinery whereby the commercial end was to be achieved and as to the achievement of the end itself, there was nothing in the reasoning of those cases to limit the application of the principle to such circumstances; (viii) in any event, the judge erred in holding that there must be "practical certainty . . . that the series of steps would be completed once started;" (ix) it was wrong in principle that tax avoidance machinery in respect of a prospective sale should be treated as effective and outside the Ramsay principle merely because it was set in motion before the detailed terms of the sale were finally determined; (x) the effect of the judge's decision was that the Ramsay principle could be easily side stepped by the simple expedient of the taxpayer taking the first step in the composite transaction (namely, the share exchange) prior to going into the market to find his purchaser, or even just prior to the final negotiating meeting at which the details of the transaction were expected to be finalised; (xi) the true principle emerged from Ramsay itself where Lord Wilberforce said, at p. 323: "If it can be seen that a document or transaction was intended to have effect as part of the nexus or series of transactions, or as an ingredient of a wider transaction intended as a whole, there is nothing in the doctrine to prevent it being so regarded: to do so is not to prefer form to substance or substance to form." (xii) The judge erred in relying on Lord Wilberforce's reference to the "intentions of the parties" at p. 324 as indicating that, in a case like the present, the intention of the taxpayer alone was insufficient for determining what the relevant transaction was. Ramsay was a case where the entire series of transactions forming the composite transaction was from beginning to end under the control of the scheme organisers. The reference to the intention of the "parties" should be seen in that context as a reference to those scheme organisers. The judge erred in treating the reference as including, in the present case, a reference to the ultimate purchaser; (xiii) in like manner, the words of Lord Wilberforce at p. 324 referring to a case where there was "no likelihood in practice" that the end result would not be achieved must be seen in the context of a Ramsay type case where the entirety of the scheme was under the control of the scheme organisers. The judge erred in applying those words as if they were part of an enactment. Even Lord Wilberforce recognised that the degree of likelihood of achievement of the end result in such cases would "vary in emphasis." (3) In relation to the second limitation: (i) the judge erred in holding that the possible use of Millor as a holding company in a merger with Cee-N-Cee Supermarkets was a separate commercial purpose which prevented the acquisition of Millor being disregarded for fiscal purposes; (ii) it was submitted that Lord Brightman's reference to a commercial purpose was not intended to include a purpose which was alternative to, and inconsistent with, the commercial end to which the composite transaction itself was directed; (iii) since the possibility of Millor's use in a merger with Cee-N-Cee would inevitably be, and was, nullified by the sale to the ultimate purchaser, the existence of that possibility (whether or not in the minds of the taxpayers) was irrelevant to the legal analysis of the transactions which in fact took place; (iv) the Ramsay principle was concerned with identifying the relevant transaction by looking at the end result of a composite transaction, disregarding for fiscal purposes the artificially inserted steps. The artificially inserted step in the case was the interposition of Millor. That step was no less artificial because there might have been an intended use for it in the event that the intended

A scheme or arrangement did not ultimately eventuate; (v) it would be absurd if what was to be a purely fiscal device, in the events which were expected to happen and which did happen, was not to be recognised as a purely fiscal device simply because it might have served a commercial purpose if different events had taken place. (4) If, which was denied, the facts posed by the commissioners did not bring the case within the formulation of the Ramsay principle stated by Lord Brightman, it was submitted, in line with the case-by-case approach advocated in particular by Lord Scarman in Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474, 513, that the principle should be extended to cover at least a case where, as here, (i) the taxpayer's primary objective was a sale to a third party, (ii) there was a common understanding and a practical certainty that if the sale went ahead, it would be through the machinery of a share exchange with an Isle of Man company, and (iii) the sole purpose of the share exchange in the context to the sale was the avoidance of tax.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. BOWATER PROPERTY DEVELOPMENTS LTD.

APPEAL from Warner J.

D The taxpayer company, Bowater Property Developments Ltd., a member of the Bowater Corporation Plc., appealed against an assessment to development land tax made on it in the sum of £207,220 in connection with a disposal of an interest in certain land. In March 1980 the taxpayer company transferred its beneficial interest in that land to five companies in the Bowater group and in October 1981 those five companies contracted to sell their interests in the land to an independent purchaser, Milton Pipes Ltd. On appeal against that assessment the sole question for the special commissioners was whether the October 1981 disposal was, by virtue of the decisions of the House of Lords in Ramsay and subsequent cases, to be treated as a disposal for the purposes of the tax made by the taxpayer company rather than by the five group companies. The commissioners determined the issue in favour of the taxpayer company and an appeal by the Crown was dismissed by Warner J. on 18 October 1985. The judge held that the two transactions did not constitute a pre-ordained series of transactions as it could not be said that at the time when the taxpayer company disposed of the land to the five companies there was no likelihood in practice that the final sale would not follow. The Crown appealed by a notice dated 4 December 1985, the grounds of which were similar to those set out in Craven v. White.

BAYLIS (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. GREGORY SAME v. SAME AND ANOTHER

APPEAL from Vinelott J.

H In May 1983 the special commissioners determined appeals against assessments to capital gains tax made (1) on Mr. Robert Felix Gregory for 1973-74 in the sum of £785,000 and in the alternative in the same amount for 1975-76, and (2) against Mr. Gregory and Mr. Bernard John Weare in their capacity as trustees of the estate of Joseph Gregory, deceased, for 1973-74 in the sum of £155,000 and in the alternative for 1974-75 (or 1975-76) in the same amount. The substantive issue with which the appeals were concerned was whether disposals of shares in Planet Gloves (Industrial) Ltd. by its shareholders in March 1974 to P.

G. Holdings, a private unlimited company incorporated in the Isle of Man, were chargeable disposals notwithstanding the provisions for roll-over relief in paragraphs 4(2) and 6 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965. The preliminary issue arose in relation to the second of the assessments on the trustees, namely: (1) whether, in the light of certain action taken by the inspector of taxes, any such assessment was not extant; if there was such an assessment in existence; (2) whether such an assessment was for the year 1974-75 (in which event it was common ground that no capital gains tax was payable) or whether it was for the year 1975-76, the mistake on its face being capable of being disregarded by virtue of the provisions of section 114(1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970. A single special commissioner determined the preliminary issues in favour of the trustees. The substantive issue was determined at a separate hearing by special commissioners in favour of the taxpayers and all the assessments were discharged. The Crown appealed against the determinations on both the substantive and preliminary issues. On 26 November 1985 Vinelott J. upheld the commissioners' determination on the substantive issue on the ground that the share transactions did not fall within the principles designed to counteract tax avoidance schemes enunciated by the House of Lords in the Ramsay and Furniss v. Dawson cases. On the preliminary issue the judge, allowing the Crown's appeal and declaring the assessment to be a valid assessment for 1975-76, held that an assessment could not be withdrawn by the unilateral act of an inspector once it had been made and served on a taxpayer and that there was a genuine mistake which did not mislead anyone and which could be cured by virtue of the provisions of section 114(1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970.

By a notice dated 24 January 1986 the Crown appealed against the judge's decision on the substantive issue, the grounds of the appeal being similar to those in Craven v. White. By an amended respondents' notice under R.S.C., Ord. 59, r. 6(1), dated 26 January 1987, Mr. Gregory and Mr. Weare, in their capacity as trustees, contended that the judge's decision be affirmed on the alternative grounds (1) that the assessment for 1974-75, having been "vacated" by the revenue, had effectively ceased to exist, leaving no assessment capable of being corrected under section 114 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 and (2) that the determination of the commissioners refusing to correct the error in the assessment was correct because the error as to the year of assessment (1974-75 rather than 1975-76) was incapable of being corrected under section 114 and accordingly the Crown, having conceded that there was no liability to tax for the year 1974-75, that assessment was properly discharged by the commissioners.

The facts of all the cases are set out in the judgment of Slade L.J.

Jules Sher Q.C. and Alan Moses for the Crown.

Leolin Price Q.C. and Grant Crawford for the taxpayers in the first appeal.

Andrew Park Q.C. and David Goy for the taxpayer company in the second appeal.

Michael Flesch Q.C. for the taxpayers in the third appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

24 March. The following judgments were handed down.

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

A SLADE L.J. There are before the court appeals by the Crown from three judgments. The first is from a judgment of Peter Gibson J. delivered on 24 May 1985 in Craven v. White (Stephen) and Craven v. White (Brian) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1024. The second is from a judgment of Warner J. delivered on 18 October 1985 in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Bowater Property Developments Ltd. [1985] S.T.C. 783. The third is from a judgment of Vinelott J. delivered on 26 November 1985 in Baylis v. Gregory and Baylis v. Gregory [1986] 1 W.L.R. 624; [1986] S.T.C. 22. The first and third of these judgments concern assessments to capital gains tax. The second of them concerns an assessment to development land tax. The three cases are quite separate from one another on their facts. However, they raise similar problems concerning the extent and limitations of the principle relating to tax avoidance schemes which has come to be known as "the Ramsay principle." This was first stated by the House of Lords in W. T. Ramsay Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners; Eilbeck v. Rawling [1982] A.C. 300. It has subsequently been developed by their Lordships in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burnham Oil Co. Ltd. (1982) 54 T.C. 200 and Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474 in which they reaffirmed the correctness of the dissenting judgment of Eveleigh L.J. in Floor v. Davis [1978] Ch. 295.

D The facts of all the cases now before this court have certain common features. In each of them there has been a disposition by the taxpayers of assets to one or more companies, followed by a disposition of those assets by the company or companies to an ultimate purchaser. Save possibly in Craven v. White, where this element is in dispute, the first disposition has had no commercial purpose other than that of tax avoidance. In none of the cases now before the court did there exist a contractual obligation to effect the second disposition at the time when the first was made. In each case the Crown, in reliance on the Ramsay principle, asserts that, for the purpose of ascertaining their fiscal consequences, the two steps or transactions involved should be treated as a single, composite transaction under which there was a "disposal" by the taxpayers in favour of the ultimate purchaser.

F Section 19(1) of the Finance Act 1965, which introduced capital gains tax, provided:

"Tax shall be charged in accordance with this Act in respect of capital gains, that is to say chargeable gains computed in accordance with this Act and accruing to a person on the disposal of assets."

G Since a "disposal of assets" is the event which gives rise to the charge, the first inquiry must always be whether or not such a "disposal" in the relevant sense has occurred. The Act of 1965 contained provisions stating in effect that certain specifically defined events should or should not, as the case might be, be treated as involving a disposal of assets. However, it contained no comprehensive definition of the word "disposal." Accordingly, where an assessment to capital gains tax is under challenge and the transactions in question are not specifically covered by a particular statutory provision, the task of the court, in the final analysis, must always involve the identification of the relevant disposal or disposals of assets (if any). In deciding whether a disposal has occurred within the meaning of the statute, it may have to consider in particular (i) who were the parties to that disposal; (ii) what was its date and (iii) what were the assets disposed of.

The identification of the relevant disposal or disposals was the essential issue before the court in Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474 and is the essential issue in each of these three appeals, though the second of them happens to concern disposals with reference to the Development Land Tax Act 1976 rather than to the Finance Act 1965.

There are many similarities, though the taxpayers would say essential differences, between the facts of the first and third appeals and the facts of the Dawson case. A brief reference to the facts of that well known case will suffice for present purposes. The Dawsons held shares in two operating companies. They reached an agreement in principle with another company, Wood Bastow, that Wood Bastow would purchase all those shares. Before the sale took place, they entered into a scheme designed to defer the liability to pay capital gains tax to which the transfer of the shares to Wood Bastow would otherwise have given rise. To that end, with the concurrence of Wood Bastow, they arranged for their shares to be exchanged for shares in a company, Greenjacket, specially incorporated for the purpose in the Isle of Man. The final part of the scheme, which was implemented on 20 December 1971, involved two distinct steps, namely (a) a transfer by the Dawsons to Greenjacket of the shares in the operating companies and (b) a subsequent transfer of the same shares on the same day by Greenjacket to Wood Bastow. The thinking behind the scheme was that paragraph 6 of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1965 would apply, so as to prevent the transfers by the Dawsons to Greenjacket from being chargeable disposals of the shares in the family companies.

The facts of the Dawson case had at least four features in common with the facts of each of the three present appeals. They involved a transfer of assets by A to B, followed by a transfer of those same assets by B to C. The special commissioners in each case accepted that the transfer by A to B was a genuine transaction; there was nothing sham about it in the sense that it purported to be something that it was not in fact. The commissioners in each case further accepted that the transfer by A to B had passed to B the full legal and beneficial ownership of the assets in question. In each of the four cases the Crown has further sought to exact tax on the basis that for fiscal purposes there has been a disposal by A not in favour of B but in favour of C.

There are, however, certain significant differences between the facts of the Dawson case and the present case. In particular, in the Dawson case, unlike the present cases, at the time when the transfer of assets by A to B took place, there existed, by virtue of the pre-arranged scheme, the practical certainty, albeit covered by no pre-existing legally binding contractual arrangements, that the transfer of the same assets by B to C would almost immediately follow. Whether or not this renders the Dawson case distinguishable on its facts is one of the important issues on each of the present appeals.

On appeal by the Crown to this court from the decision of Vinelott J. in the Dawson case, this court rejected the Crown's claim that there had been a disposal of the shares in the operating companies by the Dawsons in favour of Wood Bastow. All its members, of whom I was one, found difficulty in accepting the re-analysis of the relevant transactions for which the Crown contended, in such a way, in Oliver L.J.'s words [1984] A.C. 474, 483, "as to attribute to them, for fiscal purposes, a legal result which they did not have and which, indeed, they were specifically designed to avoid having." Oliver L.J. was also

A particularly concerned with the prospect of double taxation. He considered, at p. 482, that, if the Crown's argument were right, when the taxpayers sold their shares in Greenjacket, their value on the sale would, under Schedule 7, fall to be measured by the asset content of Greenjacket, which would include the assets representing the proceeds of sale of the original shares in the operating companies. The gain on that transaction would then be computed under that Schedule on the difference between that value and the acquisition cost of the original shares, which, on this hypothesis, would already have been taxed. In my own judgment, at pp. 505–506, I referred to what seemed to me the conceptual difficulties involved in regarding a composite transaction embodying a transfer by A to B of the full legal and beneficial title to property and a subsequent transfer of the same property by B to C as giving rise to three disposals for capital gains tax purposes, namely a disposal by A in favour of B, a disposal by B in favour of C and a disposal by A in favour of C in each case of the same assets.

The House of Lords, however, in reversing the decision of this court in the Dawson case, concluded per Lord Brightman, at p. 528:

“The result of correctly applying the Ramsay principle to the facts of this case is that there was a disposal by the Dawsons in favour of Wood Bastow in consideration of a sum of money paid with the concurrence of the Dawsons to Greenjacket. Capital gains tax is payable accordingly.”

Their Lordships' decision made it clear that the “three disposals” point which had concerned me was, at least on the facts of that case, without substance. If in any given case the Ramsay principle applies, there will merely have been one disposal for fiscal purposes, namely a disposal by A to C; the introduction of B into the scheme will fall to be wholly disregarded for fiscal purposes: see per Lord Brightman at p. 527. By parity of reasoning, the decision indicated that Oliver L.J.'s fears of oppressive double taxation were not well founded on the facts of that case. As Lord Brightman put it, at p. 525:

“If the Crown's case were correct, there would be a disposal by the Dawsons to Wood Bastow on which capital gains tax would be payable. There could be no additional capital gains tax on the steps by which that disposal was achieved, namely the sale first to Greenjacket and then by Greenjacket to Wood Bastow, because it is the Crown's case that the fiscal consequences of the introduction of Greenjacket are to be disregarded. The revenue cannot, and does not claim to, have it both ways.”

This decision of the House of Lords has thus clearly established that, in the light of the Ramsay principle, and contrary to the views which I had expressed in this court, a composite transaction which embodies a transfer by A to B of the full legal and beneficial title to property, and a subsequent transfer by B to C of the full legal and beneficial title to the same property, is capable in certain circumstances of giving rise to a disposal by A to C for capital gains tax purposes. The task of this court on the first and third of the present appeals is to consider whether or not the facts are such as to produce this result.

The House of Lords in the Dawson case [1984] A.C. 474, while giving guidance in general terms, did not think it necessary or appropriate to attempt a comprehensive definition of the circumstances in which two such successive transfers of the same property may give rise to a disposal by A to C for fiscal purposes. As Lord Scarman observed, at pp. 513–514, the law in the area of the Ramsay principle is in an early stage of development. Nevertheless, a number of significant guidelines are to be found in their Lordships' speeches. First, they contain expositions of the general nature of the Ramsay principle, which was being applied. Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, who had himself been a party to the Ramsay decision, explained it thus, at p. 512:

“The true principle of the decision in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300 was that the fiscal consequences of a preordained series of transactions, intended to operate as such, are generally to be ascertained by considering the result of the series as a whole, and not by dissecting the scheme and considering each individual transaction separately. The principle was stated in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay, at p. 324A–C, especially where his Lordship said: ‘For the commissioners considering a particular case it is wrong, and an unnecessary self limitation, to regard themselves as precluded by their own finding that documents or transactions are not ‘shams,’ from considering what, as evidenced by the documents themselves or by the manifested intentions of the parties, the relevant transaction is. They are not, under the Westminster doctrine [Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1] or any other authority, bound to consider individually each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole.’”

“The fact that the court accepted that each step in a transaction was a genuine step producing its intended legal result did not confine the court to considering each step in isolation for the purpose of assessing the fiscal results. ‘... viewed as a whole, a composite transaction may produce an effect which brings it within a fiscal provision.’ (p. 325). Lord Wilberforce added later, at p. 326: ‘To force the courts to adopt, in relation to closely integrated situations, a step by step, dissecting, approach which the parties themselves may have negated, would be a denial rather than an affirmation of the true judicial process. In each case the facts must be established, and a legal analysis made: legislation cannot be required or even be desirable to enable the courts to arrive at a conclusion which corresponds with the parties' own intentions.’”

Secondly, Dawson establishes that the Ramsay principle is capable of applying to what has been described in argument on the present appeal as “linear transactions,” as well as to “self-cancelling transactions” such as those under consideration in the Ramsay case itself. In that case the respective taxpayers had adopted elaborate and artificial schemes which were designed to create a loss for tax purposes, capable of being set off against existing realised gains, but would nevertheless not leave the taxpayers out of pocket after the schemes had been carried through to completion. The actual decisions in the Ramsay case were that the schemes gave rise to no allowable loss (save a sum not exceeding £370 in one case). In the Dawson case, as Lord Fraser of Tullybelton pointed out at p. 512, the scheme was much simpler and had enduring legal

Slade L.J.

A consequences. However, this was not a sufficient ground for failing to apply the Ramsay principle.

B Thirdly, however, the mere fact that a scheme which involves a series of stages is designed to avoid or mitigate tax does not by itself entitle the revenue to charge tax by reference to the result of the series as a whole, without considering each individual stage separately. Lord Brightman, with whose speech the rest of their Lordships concurred, expressed, in the following crucially important passage, at p. 527, the conditions which have to be satisfied if the Ramsay principle is to be applied in any given case:

C “The formulation by Lord Diplock in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd. [1982] S.T.C. 30, 33 expresses the limitations of the Ramsay principle. First, there must be a pre-ordained series of transactions; or, if one likes, one single composite transaction. This composite transaction may or may not include the achievement of a legitimate commercial (i.e. business) end. The composite transaction does, in the instant case; it achieved a sale of the shares in the operating companies by the Dawsons to Wood Bastow. It did not in Ramsay. Secondly, there must be steps inserted which have no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax—not ‘no business effect.’ If those two ingredients exist, the inserted steps are to be disregarded for fiscal purposes. The court must then look at the end result. Precisely how the end result will be taxed will depend on the terms of the taxing statute sought to be applied.”

E Fourthly, and this is allied to the third point, as Lord Brightman stated, at p. 527, in any case where the revenue is seeking to invoke the Ramsay principle, the commissioners will be required to make two findings of fact, namely:

F “first, whether there was a pre-ordained series of transactions, i.e. a single composite transaction, secondly, whether that transaction contained steps which were inserted without any commercial or business purpose apart from a tax advantage. Those are facts to be found by the commissioners. They may be primary facts or, more probably, inferences to be drawn from the primary facts. If they are inferences, they are nevertheless facts to be found by the commissioners. Such inferences of fact cannot be disturbed by the court save on Edwards v. Bairstow [1956] A.C. 14 principles.”

G Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300, 324, had referred to the duty of the commissioners as being to “find the facts and then decide as a matter (reviewable) of law whether what is in issue is a composite transaction, or a number of independent transactions.”

H To the limited extent that he referred to this matter as being “one of law,” I think that, as Peter Gibson J. pointed out in his judgment in Craven v. White [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1024, 1031–1032, Lord Wilberforce’s opinion must be regarded as having been overruled by Lord Brightman’s speech in Dawson, with which all their Lordships concurred.

For present purposes, the third of these four guidelines is of paramount importance. In two of the three appeals before us the schemes in question admittedly included steps which had no business purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax. The principal argument in all three appeals has centred round the condition for the application of the Ramsay principle that "there must be a pre-ordained series of transactions; or, if one likes, one single composite transaction." I will refer to this as the first Ramsay condition. The first appeal, however, also concerns the application of the condition that "there must be steps inserted which have no commercial (business) purpose, apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax . . ." I will refer to this as the second Ramsay condition.

Mr. Sher, in opening the appeals on behalf of the Crown, rightly indicated that perhaps the most important point of principle which this court has to consider is the essential nature of the link between two or more transactions which will suffice to satisfy the first Ramsay condition and thus entitle the revenue or the court to treat all the transactions as one single transaction for fiscal purposes. In the course of his forceful and able argument, he naturally put the point in different phraseology and with differing shades of emphasis. However, while it is expressed in slightly more qualified terms in its notices of appeal in the other cases, I think that the basic proposition which the Crown is concerned to establish is well and clearly reflected in its notices of appeal in the Baylis cases:

"(4) It is submitted that in order to prove a pre-ordained series of transactions which culminates in an ultimate disposal it is only necessary to prove that at the time of the first transaction it was intended by the taxpayer that the first transaction should be used as conveyancing machinery in order to achieve a final disposal of the asset if a disposal was ultimately made. It is submitted that provided the machinery by which the commercial end is to be achieved is pre-ordained, it is irrelevant that there remains a possibility that its execution may be frustrated by a failure to achieve the commercial end itself or that at the time of the first transaction there was no immediate prospect or intention of finally disposing of the asset."

It will be convenient to consider in general terms this proposition, which I will call the Crown's basic contention, before turning to the particular facts of each appeal.

While in the Dawson case the proposed price and other terms of the ultimate purchase by C had been negotiated, although not to the stage of commitment, in advance of the transfer of assets by A to B, this was not so in any of the cases now before the court. Mr. Sher accepted that, if the evidence shows that, in advance of the first transaction, the purchase price and terms were all known, that may be the best evidence of the existence of one single composite transaction. Nevertheless, he submitted, the Ramsay principle is not applicable only in a case where there existed at the time of the first transaction a known purchaser who was prepared to purchase at a known price and on known terms. Since, he submitted, the purpose of the Ramsay principle is to identify the real transaction in any given case, by ignoring artificially inserted steps, the actual identification of the purchaser and the price does not signify anything of critical importance. If A Ltd. wishes to sell its land free of development land tax and fragments the land into five subsidiary companies which have not used their £50,000 free band, can it make any difference, he asked, whether at the time of the fragmentation A Ltd. has found the purchaser and negotiated the terms of the purchase or

Slade L.J.

A whether it has listed the sale in an immediately impending auction at a modest reserve which will for all practical purposes ensure its sale?

B In the Crown's submission, the essential link required to enable the revenue to treat two or more transactions as a single composite transaction within the first Ramsay condition, does not depend on the identification at the first stage of the ultimate purchaser or the proposed terms of his purchase, or indeed upon the likelihood or otherwise of the second transaction following the first. The essential link is the intention of the taxpayer at the time of the first transaction. If, it was said, he embarks on the first stage with a view to facilitating an ultimate sale of the asset by means of a second stage, and that ultimate sale eventuates, that is enough to satisfy the first Ramsay condition. In Mr. Sher's submission, it suffices for this purpose even if at the time of the transfer of assets by the taxpayer A to B, A has no present intention to sell but his intention is merely that the transfer shall serve as a convenient springboard in case at some future date it may be desired to sell. (In the course of his argument he referred to the initial transfer in such a case as an instance of "strategic tax planning," and I will use the same convenient phrase hereafter in this judgment.) In the alternative, he submitted, it must in any event suffice if, at the time of the transfer of assets by A to B, A has the present general intention to sell and intends that such transfer shall serve as a springboard for a sale when it eventuates.

E It would be quite wrong to dissect and apply every word of Lord Brightman's formulation in the Dawson case of either the first or the second Ramsay condition as if it had statutory force. In due course, the House of Lords are themselves likely to give further guidance as to the circumstances in which the Ramsay principle is capable of applying to a linear transaction. In the meantime, however, I think that we in this court are both bound and entitled to apply Lord Brightman's careful and considered formulation of the limits of the Ramsay principle (which followed a similar formulation by Lord Diplock in the Burmah case and has the approval of all their Lordships) according to what we understand to be its true meaning and intent. Proceeding on this footing, I find myself unable to accept the Crown's basic contention. In my judgment, for the reasons which I will now attempt to state, it would involve an unwarrantable extension of the Ramsay principle.

F First, as Lord Brightman's speech makes clear, their Lordships in the Dawson case regarded the phrases "a pre-ordained series of transactions" and "one single composite transaction" as synonymous. I would not regard either phrase as apt to describe two transactions, each of which, independently, undeniably had legal effect, unless, as in the Dawson, Ramsay and Burmah cases, at the time when the first transaction was effected, all the essential features, not merely the general nature, of the second transaction had already been determined by a person or persons who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of the second transaction. Special considerations might apply to a case where the second transaction consisted of a sale by auction which had been arranged before the first transaction was effected. Normally, however, it seems to me that a transfer by A to B followed by a sale by B to C could not, on the ordinary meaning of words, be together described either as "one single composite transaction" or as "a pre-ordained series of transactions" unless at the time of the first transfer C had been identified as a prospective purchaser, and all the main terms of the sale to him had at least in principle been agreed; if this is not so, they have to be regarded as independent transactions. I am fortified in the belief that the House of Lords, in their precise formulation of the first Ramsay condition, would not have accepted the Crown's basic contention, by the second, third and fourth considerations to which I am about to refer.

Secondly, in the particular circumstances of all of the Ramsay, Burmah and Dawson cases, at the time when the first stage in the relevant scheme was carried through, all the essential features of the second stage had in fact been determined by persons who had the firm intention and for practical purposes the ability to procure the implementation of the second stage. Furthermore, this point emerges more or less explicitly from many of the speeches in those decisions.

As to the Ramsay scheme itself:

"It was reasonable to assume that all steps would, in practice, be carried out, but there was no binding arrangement that they should. The nature of the scheme was such that once set in motion it would proceed through all its stages to completion:" see [1982] A.C. 300, 328 per Lord Wilberforce.

In the Rawling scheme, one of the six Jersey companies concerned had actually contracted to procure the implementation of all the steps comprised in the scheme and was in a position to obtain the requisite co-operation of two of its associated companies: see p. 332A-B. Lord Wilberforce described the common features of the Ramsay and Rawling schemes, at p. 322:

"First, it is the clear and stated intention that once started each scheme shall proceed through the various steps to the end—they are not intended to be arrested half-way: . . . This intention may be expressed either as a firm contractual obligation (it was so in Rawling) or as in Ramsay as an expectation without contractual force."

The Burmah Oil case (1981) 54 T.C. 200 raised the question whether certain transactions resulted in an allowable capital loss for the purposes of corporation tax on capital gains. Lord Fraser of Tullybelton in his speech, with which all the rest of their Lordships agreed, referred, at pp. 219–220, to certain differences between the two stage scheme there under consideration and the schemes in Ramsay and Eilbeck v. Rawling. One difference was that in those cases the taxpayers had been provided with a "preconceived and ready made plan," whereas in the Burmah case the plan, though preconceived, was specially tailor-made for Burmah. Again, in those earlier cases, it was the clear and stated intention that, once started, each scheme would proceed to completion and would not be arrested half way. In Burmah the first series of events, those occurring on 12 December 1982, could have stood on their own and need not have been followed by the second series on 18 December. However, as Lord Fraser pointed out, at pp. 219–220:

"it is clear that the events initiated on 18 December formed part of a single scheme and I have already quoted the finding by the special commissioners that they took place in the order and according to a timetable prepared in advance. . . . No doubt the directors could have chosen, even at that stage, to abandon the scheme but the

A reality was that the decision had already been taken to carry it through to completion . . .”

B In the Dawson case though there was no pre-existing contract when the scheme began to be implemented, there was an equivalent practical certainty that all its steps would be carried through to the end. Lord Brightman, at p. 520, described the manner in which the two sale agreements had been exchanged on the very same day and referred to minutes of the board meetings of the companies concerned. He commented:

C “These show that the whole process was planned and executed with faultless precision. The meetings began at 12.45 p.m. on 20 December, at which time the shareholdings of the operating companies were still owned by the Dawsons unaffected by any contract for sale. They ended with the shareholdings in the ownership of Wood Bastow. The minutes do not disclose when the meetings ended, but perhaps it was all over in time for lunch.”

D There are many other similar references in the speeches, in which the inevitability for practical purposes of the scheme proceeding from the first stage to the completion of the second stage is stressed. I do not think that the House of Lords would have been at such pains to emphasise this feature of the respective schemes if they had not regarded it as being of cardinal importance in deciding whether or not the various transactions could properly be treated as one composite transaction for fiscal purposes and whether or not the intermediate steps, inserted purely for the purposes of tax avoidance, could be disregarded for tax purposes, even though otherwise fully legally effective according to their terms.

E Thirdly, the Crown’s basic proposition is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the whole rationale of the Ramsay principle as explained by Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300, particularly at pp. 323–324 and by Lord Brightman in Dawson [1984] A.C. 474, who explained it thus, at pp. 526–527:

F “In a pre-planned tax-saving scheme, no distinction is to be drawn for fiscal purposes, because none exists in reality, between (i) a series of steps which are followed through by virtue of an arrangement which falls short of a binding contract, and (ii) a like series of steps which are followed through because the participants are contractually bound to take each step seriatim. In a contractual case the fiscal consequences will naturally fall to be assessed in the light of the contractually agreed results. For example, equitable interests may pass when the contract for sale is signed. In many cases equity will regard that as done which is contracted to be done. Ramsay says that the fiscal result is to be no different if the several steps are pre-ordained rather than pre-contracted. For example, in the instant case tax will, on the Ramsay principle, fall to be assessed on the basis that there was a tripartite contract between the Dawsons, Greenjacket and Wood Bastow under which the Dawsons contracted to transfer their shares in the operating companies to Greenjacket in return for an allotment of shares in Greenjacket, and under which Greenjacket simultaneously contracted to transfer the same shares to Wood Bastow for a sum in cash. Under such a tripartite contract the Dawsons would clearly have disposed of the shares in the operating companies in favour of Wood Bastow in consideration of a sum of money paid by Wood Bastow with the concurrence of the Dawsons to Greenjacket. Tax would be assessed, and the base value of the Greenjacket shares calculated, accordingly. Ramsay says that this fiscal result cannot be avoided because the pre-ordained series of steps are to be found in an informal arrangement instead of in a binding contract. The day is not saved for the taxpayer because the arrangement is unsigned or contains the words 'this is not a binding contract.'

G

Thus, the whole rationale of the Ramsay principle is that no distinction falls to be drawn between case (i) and case (ii) referred to in this passage "because none exists in reality." The whole of this reasoning presupposes that, in a case where there was no pre-existing contract but the Ramsay principle applies, all the steps in the pre-ordained series of transactions would have been capable of being embodied in a binding contract before the first transaction was effected, though the persons having control of the scheme did not choose or omitted so to embody them. This in turn presupposes that, before the first transaction was effected, all the essential features of the second transaction were planned, intended and ascertained.

Fourthly, I think that, if the Ramsay principle were to be held to apply to transactions of which the connecting link is so tenuous as that suggested in the Crown's basic contention, formidable uncertainty and practical difficulties would arise in the administration of our tax law, which the House of Lords, in formulating and developing the Ramsay principle, did not contemplate and would not have intended. The whole essence of this principle when it applies is that the step inserted in the series of transactions which has no commercial purpose apart from the liability to tax falls to be wholly disregarded for fiscal purposes: see Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474, 527D, per Lord Brightman. But the step so inserted may well, by itself, have immediately and permanently altered the legal rights of the parties, for example by transferring the legal and beneficial title to assets from A to B. In the circumstances envisaged in the Crown's basic contention, a substantial interval of time may elapse before any transfer of those assets by B to C ensues and, indeed, in the event, no such transfer may ever take place. In the meantime, the revenue may well assess the interested parties to tax, prima facie quite properly, on the basis that there has been a disposal of assets by A to B, effective accordingly to the tenor of the documents. (It can by no means be assumed that in the case of other tax-saving schemes the first disposal will be wholly covered by a specific statutory exemption, such as was available in the Dawson case.)

What are then to be the fiscal consequences if and when a sale of assets by B to C at last ensues? If the original scheme was designed to avoid or mitigate tax, it is to be assumed that, if it could properly do so in reliance on the Ramsay principle, the revenue would subsequently wish to claim tax on the basis of a disposal by A to C, when the sale to C eventuates. However, of one thing I am certain. The Finance Act 1965, on its true construction, does not permit one single transfer of assets by A to be treated for capital gains tax purposes both as a disposal of all those assets in favour of B and as a disposal of all those same assets in favour of C. Neither the House of Lords in the Dawson case, nor Mr. Sher in this court, suggested to the contrary. What then is

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A to be the status of the earlier assessment in such circumstances? Was it wrong when made or has it merely become wrong? If it cannot be said that it was wrong when made, how can the taxpayer escape oppressive double taxation in the absence of any relieving statutory provision? No such provision has been drawn to our attention. If the revenue is to be entitled to claim tax on the basis of a disposal by A to C, what is to be B regarded as the date of that disposal? What is to be regarded as the base value of the assets disposed of and at what date is it to be ascertained?
The list of difficult practical and conceptual problems that could arise, if the Crown's basic contention were well founded, could be multiplied.

C Though several of these problems were canvassed in some depth in argument before us, I cannot attempt to provide satisfactory answers to them and I do not think that Mr. Sher, with due respect to his submissions, was able to do so. In drawing attention to them, I observe that, in cases where the scheme involves a pre-ordained series of transactions, in the sense which I attribute to that phrase, as in the Dawson, Ramsay and Burmah cases, there may be little practical likelihood of the problems arising, because there is no practical likelihood of a substantial "limbo" period elapsing between the first and second stages of the series. In other cases, the problems might be real and D serious.

Finally, before turning to the facts of the individual cases before us, I should mention that each of the notices of appeal before us includes, inter alia, the following ground:

E "The effect of the judge's decision is that the Ramsay principle can be easily side stepped by the simple expedient of the taxpayer taking the first step in the composite transaction (namely, the share exchange) prior to going into the market to find his purchaser . . ."

While I appreciate the concern of the revenue in this context, this ground, with due respect to the submission, seems to me to beg the very question which has to be decided, namely, whether or not there has indeed been a composite transaction. They assume that two transactions F are together capable of constituting one composite transaction within the meaning of the first Ramsay condition, even though at the time of the first transaction the persons having control of the matter had not yet gone into the market to find a purchaser and there was at that time no certainty whatever that an ultimate sale would eventuate. For the reasons which I have attempted to indicate, this assumption is, in my judgment, incorrect. This was not the sort of case which the House of G Lords, in referring to "one composite transaction" can have had in mind. Various fiscal statutes expressly state that the term "disposition" includes a "disposition effected by associated operations." Simply, for example, section 51(1) of the Finance Act 1975, in the context of capital transfer tax, so provides. And section 44(1)(b) of that Act provides that "associated operations" means "any two operations of which one is H effected with reference to the other, or with a view to enabling the other to be effected or facilitating its being effected . . ." If the capital gains tax legislation had included similar provisions, the Crown's basic contention might have been easily sustainable. In my judgment, however, the gap cannot be filled by judicial legislation.

As things are, as a matter of general principle, I conclude that two successive transactions, each of which has legal effects, are not properly to be regarded as a pre-ordained series or as a single composite transaction within the meaning of the first Kamau condition as stated by the House of Lords unless, at the time when the first transaction was effected, all the essential features, not merely the general nature, of the second transaction had already been determined by a person or persons who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of the second transaction.

After these general observations, I turn to a separate consideration of the three appeals now before us.

Craven v. White (Stephen); Same v. White (Brian)

In this case the special commissioners heard together appeals by three taxpayers, Messrs. Archibald, Brian and Stephen White, against assessments to capital gains tax. They gave their decision allowing those appeals, on 18 January 1984, after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Furniss v. Dawson, but before the decision of the House of Lords. The Crown appealed against the decision in each case, but the appeals which came before Peter Gibson J. related only to Brian and Stephen White, by that time Archibald White had died.

I gratefully adopt, more or less verbatim, the judge's summary of the basic facts of the case, merely adding a few references to certain additional points which Mr. Sher drew to our attention. Archibald, Brian and Stephen White, until 19 July 1976, owned all the issued share capital of S. White & Sons (Queensferry) Ltd. ("Queensferry"), which owned and operated about a dozen supermarkets. They respectively held 701, 700 and 2,101 £1 ordinary shares. In 1973, on the advice of Queensferry's accountant, Mr. Clarke, they decided that they would either merge Queensferry with a similar business or they would sell it. Between 1973 and the summer of 1976 they sought without success to achieve the one or the other result. Early in 1976 Stephen White approached Mr. Humphreys of Cee N Cee Supermarkets with a view to resuming talks about a possible merger between Queensferry's business and that of Cee N Cee. In February or March 1976 Mr. Clarke initiated talks with Manx lawyers, Kneale & Co. ("Kneales") about establishing a holding company in the Isle of Man as a vehicle for such a merger. At about the same time as discussions were resumed with Mr. Humphreys, a company called Oriel Foods Ltd. ("Oriel") asked Mr. Clarke if Queensferry was still up for sale. Oriel itself had been acquired by R.C.A. Corporation of America ("R.C.A.") in 1974. A subsidiary of Oriel was Morris & David Jones Ltd. ("Jones"). Once Oriel's inquiry was received, negotiations with Cee N Cee were set aside and negotiations with Oriel were pursued. In May 1976 broad agreement on price had been reached, that is to say that, if a sale went through, the consideration would probably exceed £2 million and be paid in cash. In June 1976 the taxpayers were alarmed by trade press reports that R.C.A. was disenchanted with its food operations. A meeting with Oriel on 17 June to find out how the proposed sale to Oriel stood left Brian and Stephen White and Mr. Clarke feeling despondent. They had exhausted other potential purchasers and trading prospects for Queensferry were not good. They went back to Cee N Cee, which was willing to resume talks.

On 21 June 1976 Mr. Clarke arranged with Kneales to acquire an off-the-shelf company, Miller Investments Ltd. ("Miller") as a holding company for the projected merger with Cee N Cee. Miller then had a £2 issued share capital, its two £1 shares being held by two advocates'

A clerks from Kneales. In evidence before the commissioners Mr. Clarke and Stephen White insisted that the sole purpose of acquiring Millor was to act as a holding company for the shares of Queensferry and Cee-N-Cee and any other company which might join the group. The commissioners did not accept that this was the sole purpose of the acquisition. They put the matter thus:

B "The view we have formed is that Stephen White's approach to Mr. Humphreys early in 1976 was made as a final resort after repeated unsuccessful attempts since 1973 to dispose of [Queensferry]. We infer, from the fact that so soon as Oriel reappeared as a possible purchaser the talks with Mr. Humphreys were set aside, that Stephen White and Brian White regarded a deal with Oriel as a more desirable target than a merger with Cee-N-Cee."

C Nevertheless, I think it clear that the commissioners accepted as a fact that a subsidiary purpose of acquiring Millor was that it should act as a holding company if the sale to Jones did not happen but a merger between Queensferry and Cee-N-Cee should eventuate. On 23 June 1976 Millor increased its authorised share capital with a view to issuing 3,502 Millor shares in exchange for the Whites' Queensferry shares on a one for one basis. On 24 June Mr. Clarke sent to Kneales a draft which he had prepared of a contract between the Whites and Millor. Meanwhile, on 21 June 1976 Oriel had asked Mr. Clarke for a further meeting on 25 June. That meeting was held at the offices of Oriel's solicitors. Oriel asked if a draft contract for the acquisition of Queensferry could be sent to the Whites' solicitors and were told that the draft should be sent to Kneales as lawyers for Millor. Oriel's solicitors sent the draft to Kneales. The commissioners found that following the meeting of 25 June negotiations for the acquisition of Queensferry by Oriel "resumed more strongly and continued, albeit not always smoothly, towards the execution of the agreement on 9 August." Nevertheless, notwithstanding the increased purposefulness of these negotiations, the talks with Cee-N-Cee also continued.

F On 9 July 1976 Queensferry's authorised share capital was increased and 3,502 new ordinary shares were issued to the Whites on renounceable letters of allotment while the existing ordinary shares were converted into deferred ordinary shares with diminished rights. The commissioners found that the purpose of this reorganisation of share capital was on the advice of Kneales to effect stamp duty savings should the contract for the sale to Jones by Millor be entered into. On or before 14 July Millor offered to acquire the issued share capital of Queensferry. It offered to buy the deferred ordinary shares for 50p each and to exchange one Millor share for each Queensferry ordinary share, the offer to remain open until 9 August. On 19 July the taxpayers entered into an agreement with Millor ("the July agreement") accepting Millor's offer, and the Whites held shares in Millor in the same proportions as they had held shares in Queensferry. On 20 July the Queensferry board approved and registered the transfers of the deferred ordinary shares to Millor and agreed that, when the renounced letters of allotment for the ordinary shares were received, registration would be completed in accordance with the forms of renunciation. On 9 August there was a meeting between representatives of Oriel and Jones on the one hand and Stephen and Brian White and Mr. Clarke and the two directors, both H shares in Queensferry, of Millor on the other. That meeting was stormy: at one stage Stephen White and his party walked out. But agreement was in the end reached and Millor and Jones entered into a written agreement ("the August agreement") whereby Jones agreed to purchase the whole of the issued share capital of Queensferry for a consideration of £2.2 million subject to adjustment. That consideration was apportioned as to 50p for each deferred ordinary share and the balance to the ordinary shares. Payment of the consideration was to be by instalments, £1.8 million on completion and then two other payments of adjustable amounts. In the event, £2,459,493 was paid by Jones. Following completion and between 25 March 1977 and 6 October 1981 Millor made several interest free loans to the Whites. In all £275,000 was lent to Stephen White, but of that £50,000 was repaid on 30 September 1981; £145,000 was lent to Brian White and £100,000 to Archibald White; £1,500 was expended on acquiring options on three Manx companies, and the balance lent interest free to those companies.

Assessments to capital gains tax were raised against each of Messrs. Archibald and Brian White in the sum of £490,000 for 1976-77 and in the sum of £27,000 for 1977-78, and against Mr. Stephen White in the sum of £1,475,000 for 1976-77, and in the sum of £80,000 for 1977-78. At the hearing of their appeals before the commissioners it was submitted on their behalf that the only disposals by them were the disposals of their Queensferry shares to Millor and that of those disposals only the sale of the deferred ordinary shares to Millor was a disposal for capital gains tax purposes, the exchange of the Queensferry ordinary shares for the Millor shares being, by the combined effect of paragraphs 4(2) and 6 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965, no disposal for such purposes. On the other hand, in reliance on the Ramsay principle, the Crown submitted that the taxpayers had for such purposes disposed of all their shares in Queensferry to Jones, on the ground that the transfer of their shares to Millor should be treated as a fiscal nullity. Alternatively, it was submitted, the taxpayers fell to be assessed on the amounts which they received from Millor by way of loans and at the time when the loans were made.

The commissioners found that, before the July agreement with Millor was entered into, the taxpayers and Mr. Clarke had reached an understanding that, if a sale to Jones transpired, arrangements could be made for the Whites to have the use of the proceeds of sale, either directly or indirectly, for their own purposes. Nevertheless, they pointed out that this understanding was "of a different nature from the carefully thought out and dovetailed arrangements reflected in the transactions considered" in Floor v. Davis [1978] Ch. 295 and in Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474. Without spelling out their understanding of the nature of a "composite transaction," they said:

"We consider that we are constrained by authority to look at the transactions as a whole (Ramsay). We have found that the primary objective of the [taxpayers] was to conclude a sale of [Queensferry's] shares to Jones. That objective was achieved, and the agreements of July and August are to be looked upon as parts of a composite transaction comprising those two agreements, if no more; it is irrelevant that the terms of the August agreement were not finally settled until the day it was executed."

Nevertheless, following the decision of the majority of this court in Floor v. Davis, on what was described as the first stage of the transaction in that case, the commissioners held that the July and August agreements

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A were real transactions, that Millor acquired the Queensferry shares as a principal and that accordingly the taxpayers could not be regarded as having disposed of their shares direct to Jones. They therefore held that there was no disposal for capital gains tax purposes of the Queensferry ordinary shares effected by the July agreement. However, they also held that on each of the occasions when one of the taxpayers received a loan he must be deemed to have made a part-disposal of the shares which he
B formerly owned in Queensferry.

By the time that Peter Gibson J. heard the Crown's appeal against the rejection of the commissioners' argument that the taxpayers had made a disposal for capital gains tax purposes of their Queensferry shares to Jones, the view of the majority of this court in Floor v. Davis had been held by the House of Lords in the Dawson case to have been
C wrong and the dissenting judgment of Eveleigh L.J. in Floor had been reaffirmed as correct. It was submitted to the judge that the scheme employed by the taxpayers was exactly the same as that in Dawson and that, given the finding of the composite transaction by the commissioners, the court should hold that the only true reasonable conclusion, on the facts found by them, was that the transfer of the Queensferry shares to Millor had no commercial purpose other than the avoidance of tax. It
D was therefore submitted that, by virtue of the Ramsay principle, the real transaction was the sale by the taxpayers of their Queensferry shares to Jones for the moneys which they caused to be paid to Millor and that the taxpayers were liable to capital gains tax.

Mr. Sher submitted to the judge, as he did before us, that the important characteristic of each step forming part of a "composite transaction" is that it should be intended by the taxpayer to be one step
E in a series of steps. For this he particularly relied on Lord Wilberforce's words in the Ramsay case [1982] A.C. 300, 323:

"If it can be seen that a document or transaction was intended to have effect as part of a nexus or series of transactions, or as an ingredient of a wider transaction intended as a whole, there is F nothing in the doctrine to prevent it being so regarded: . . ."

However, in the next paragraph, Lord Wilberforce referred to the "intentions of the parties" which, in Peter Gibson J.'s view [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1024, 1031, suggested that he may not have regarded the intentions of the taxpayer alone as sufficient for determining what the relevant transaction was. Furthermore, Lord Wilberforce went on to say G [1982] A.C. 300, 324 that the commissioners:

"are not, under the Westminster doctrine or any other authority, bound to consider individually each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole. This is particularly the case where (as in Rawling) it is proved that there was an accepted obligation once a scheme is set in motion, to carry it through its successive steps. It may be so where (as in Ramsay or in Black Nominees Ltd. v. Nicol (1975) 50 T.C. 229) there is an expectation that it will be so carried through, and no likelihood in H practice that it will not."

Peter Gibson J. observed [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1024, 1032:

"Lord Wilberforce in the passage cited refers to two classes of case to which the Ramsay principle has or may have application and which correspond to the contractual and non-contractual arrangements to which Lord Brightman referred in giving the rationale of the Ramsay principle. It is to be noted that to the non-contractual class of case Lord Wilberforce applies the description that it is where there is an expectation that the series of steps will be carried through once a scheme is set in motion and there is no likelihood that it will not. The practical certainty, to adopt Mr. Price's phrase, that the series of steps will be completed once started is a feature of the rationale of the Ramsay principle as expounded by Lord Brightman and is well exemplified in all the cases in which the principle has been held to apply. The justification for equating the non-contractual arrangement with the contractual is that looking at the realities of a pre-planned tax-saving scheme where every step has been arranged there is no distinction between the two. both will in practice be carried through to their intended conclusion. Contrast the case where in reality there is a distinct possibility that a planned series of steps may not be completed as planned; in those circumstances the real position is not the equivalent of a contractual arrangement capable of being enforced."

The judge, at pp. 1032-1033, recognised that the commissioners had attempted to make a finding of a composite transaction for the purpose of the application of the Ramsay principle and that, having regard to what had been said in Dawson, this was a finding of fact which was reviewable on the principles of Edwards v. Bairstow [1956] A.C. 14. Having referred to this and other findings of fact by the commissioners, he commented, at p. 1033:

"It would appear from these findings that what the commissioners regarded as the essential quality of a composite transaction was that the taxpayer, with his advisers, should at the time the first step in the composite transaction was taken have planned the steps in the series that made up the composite transaction, regardless of whether the means of achieving all the steps lay within the control of the taxpayer or of whether there was otherwise any practical certainty that all the planned steps would be completed. Thus, although I do not doubt that the commissioners were attempting to make a finding of a composite transaction for the purpose of the application of the Ramsay principle, to my mind they have not directed themselves correctly in law. The case would have to be remitted to the commissioners, as Mr. Sher submitted it should, unless there was only one true and reasonable conclusion on the facts as found or there was some other point decisive of the appeals."

However, looking at the primary facts found by the commissioners, he concluded that, at the time when the July agreement was made, there was no "practical certainty" that the sale to Jones would be completed; on the contrary there was a live possibility that it would not. In those circumstances, he concluded that it was impossible to say that the July agreement and the August agreement were parts of a composite transaction, so as to satisfy the first Ramsay condition. He considered (see p. 1033) that the commissioners had misdirected themselves in law because they

"regarded as the essential quality of a composite transaction . . . that the taxpayer, with his advisers, should at the time the first step in the composite transaction was taken have planned the steps in

A the series that made up the composite transaction, regardless of whether the means of achieving all the steps lay within the control of the taxpayer or of whether there was otherwise any practical certainty that all the planned steps would be completed.”

B As a second, further ground of his decision the judge, at p. 1034, held that, in any event, the second Ramsay condition was not satisfied, because it could not properly be said that the July agreement had no commercial purpose other than the avoidance of a liability to tax. He therefore held that the Ramsay principle, as formulated by the House of Lords, had no application to the case. It was common ground that, if the July agreement did not fall to be disregarded, the provisions of paragraphs 4 and 6 of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1965 were applicable, so that the transfers of the ordinary shares in Queensferry by the taxpayers to Millor were to be treated as not being disposals for capital gains tax purposes. He therefore dismissed the Crown’s appeals.

C In relation to the first of the two main grounds of Peter Gibson J.’s decision, Mr. Sher submitted to us that the judge erred in holding that the commissioner’s finding of a composite transaction was insupportable on Edwards v. Bairstow principles. On the contrary, he contended, the judge himself, in applying the “practical certainty” test referred to above, applied the wrong test; he confused certainty as to the series of steps by which a particular commercial end is to be achieved with certainty as to the achievement of the end itself. It was irrelevant, in Mr. Sher’s submission, that, at the time of the July agreement, there remained a possibility that the sale to the Whites would not ultimately be achieved; the crucial point was that, at that time, the taxpayers had a firm intention that, if a sale to the Whites should be achieved, it would be routed through the interposed company, Millor.

E In any event, even if contrary to his submission, the “practical certainty” test were the correct one, Mr. Sher suggested that it was satisfied on the facts. At the time of the first transfers of the shares in Queensferry on 19 July 1976, the negotiations for the ultimate sale had advanced a long way. The proposed purchaser, Jones, was identified. F The approximate likely consideration, in excess of £2 million, had been known since May 1976. From that time onwards, the taxpayers had been striving towards the object of an ultimate sale to Jones. These negotiations faltered between 17 and 21 June. However, from that time on they continued, according to the commissioners’ findings, with increased purposefulness until the contract with Jones was finally concluded on 9 August; this contract had been in draft form since 25 June 1976. In Mr. Sher’s submission, the fact that Jones may not have had any settled intention to purchase as at 19 July 1976 was irrelevant; the judge erred in considering that the intentions of the contemplated purchaser are relevant in deciding whether or not there is one composite transaction in any given case; the intentions of the taxpayer are the only relevant intentions. G H

As a matter of legal analysis, I would for my part prefer to express the first Ramsay condition by reference to the test suggested at the end of the first section of this judgment, rather than by reference to the “practical certainty” test adumbrated and applied by the judge. It seems to me, with respect, that the former test perhaps reflects more accurately both the wording of the phrase “a pre-ordained series of transactions, i.e. a single composite transaction” and the essential rationale which enables such a composite transaction to be regarded as involving a disposal by A to C, rather than a disposal by A to B for tax purposes. Nevertheless, both tests come to much the same thing. Unless, at the time when the first transaction in the series is effected, all the essential features of the second transaction have already been determined by persons who have the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of the second transaction, there will be no practical certainty that the second transaction will be effected.

I agree with the judge that, on the basis of the facts found by the commissioners, they could not in law properly have found that the July and August agreements constituted a single composite transaction so as to satisfy the first Ramsay condition. As at the date of the July agreement, the taxpayer, though hoping and intending that the sale to Jones would go through if they could achieve it, did not have the practical ability to ensure this result. Their ability to do so depended on what Jones might finally be willing to contract with Millor on terms which the taxpayer regarded as acceptable. This, I think, is the relevance of Jones' intentions. The final decision of Jones was still unpredictable. As is indicated by the "stormy" meeting which took place on 9 August 1976, only at the last moment was there any practical certainty that the August agreement would be concluded. As Mr. Price cogently submitted in his skeleton argument: "Acceptance of the [Crown's] submission [that the first Ramsay condition was satisfied] would mean that the status of the share exchange with Millor could not be known on 19 July 1976, being contingently disregardable depending on whether a sale to Jones eventuated. Since the sale to Jones did take place on 9 August 1976, that period of uncertainty was only 21 days. But suppose the sale had not been concluded as quickly or possibly at all? The intention to create such uncertainty, especially in the context of taxation, should not be imputed to their Lordships."

In my judgment, this appeal should fail because the first Ramsay condition is not satisfied. In these circumstances, it is unnecessary to reach any conclusion in regard to the judge's view that the second Ramsay condition is not satisfied. I will only make these brief comments in this context. Though it is clear that the steps involving the interposition of Millor in the series of transactions had business effect, the relevant question is whether or not, on the commissioners' findings of fact, it could properly be said that the interposition of Millor had "no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax." Having studied these findings, I think that a proper reading of them indicates that the commissioners (a) regarded the primary purpose of both the acquisition of Millor and the subsequent transfer of the Queensferry shares to Millor as being to avoid the tax which would otherwise have been immediately payable on the ultimate sale to Jones, if that sale were eventually to take place; (b) accepted that a subsidiary purpose of both that acquisition and that transfer was that Millor should act as a holding company of the Queensferry shares if a sale to Jones did not happen but a merger between Queensferry and Cee-N-Cee eventuated and; (c) nevertheless, regarded the primary objective of the taxpayers at all material times as being to conclude a sale to Jones.

In these circumstances, I see the force of the submission made on behalf of the taxpayers that it cannot properly be said that the interposition of Millor had no commercial purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax. Nevertheless, I would find some difficulty

- A in accepting that the mere existence of what may be described colloquially as a “long-stop” purpose, such as mentioned in (b) above, can prevent the second Ramsay condition from being satisfied in a case where the Ramsay principle would otherwise apply on the facts. Such a conclusion would at present appear to me contrary to the true intent of the Ramsay and Furniss v. Dawson decisions. However, I find it unnecessary to express any concluded view on this point. For the reasons stated, relating to the first Ramsay condition, I would dismiss this appeal.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Bowater Property Developments Ltd.

This appeal concerns the Development Land Tax Act 1976, which imposed new tax on the realisation of the development value of land.

- C Section 1, so far as material, provided:
- “(1) A tax, to be called development land tax, shall be charged in accordance with the provisions of this Act in respect of the realisation of the development value of land in the United Kingdom. (2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person shall be chargeable to development land tax on the realised development value, determined in accordance with this Act, which accrues to him on the disposal by him on or after the appointed day of an interest in land in the United Kingdom . . .”

Section 4(1) provided:

- “Subject to the following provisions of this Act, the realised development value accruing to a person on the disposal by him of an interest in land shall be the amount (if any) by which the net proceeds of the disposal exceed the relevant base value of that interest.”
- E

Section 4(3) defined “the net proceeds of the disposal of an interest in land”, and section 5 defined “relevant base value.” Section 12, as amended by section 116 of the Finance Act 1980, gave an exemption for the first £50,000 of development value. It provided, inter alia:

- “(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, if the total amount of realised development value which accrues to any person in a financial year and on which, apart from this section, that person would be chargeable to development land tax does not exceed £50,000, development land tax shall not be chargeable on any of that realised development value. (2) If subsection (1) above does not apply to any person in respect of a financial year, then, subject to the following provisions of this section, the sum of £50,000 shall be deducted from the amount of realised development value on which, apart from this subsection, that person would be chargeable to development land tax in that financial year.”
- F
- G

- H Section 20(1) provided that a disposal of an interest in land by a member of a group of companies to another member of the group should be treated for the purposes of the Act of 1976 as a disposal and acquisition for which no consideration was given.

The respondent to this appeal by the Inland Revenue Commissioners is Bowater Property Developments Ltd., the taxpayer company, a company in the group of which the Bowater Corporation Plc. is the parent. Another of the subsidiaries in the Bowater group is Bowaters

United Kingdom Paper Co. Ltd. ("B.U.K.P."). By November 1978 agreement had been reached between B.U.K.P. and a company outside the Bowater group, Milton Pipes Ltd. ("M.P.L."), subject to contract, for the sale to M.P.L. of 23 acres of land near Milton Regis in Kent, known as "Crafts Marsh," for a sum of £202,500. In these negotiations, it had also been agreed that the contract would be conditional on planning permission being obtained for the uses to which M.P.L. wished to put the land. On 7 March 1979 the taxpayer company exercised an option to purchase Crafts Marsh from B.U.K.P. and thus became its owner. At about that time, one of Bowater's taxation advisers lined up a number of Bowater subsidiaries willing to take undivided shares in Crafts Marsh—a fragmentation exercise designed to make maximum use of the exemption under section 12 of the Act. At that date the exemption level stood at only £10,000 and no fewer than 18 subsidiaries were involved. Draft deeds were sent to M.P.L. on 9 March 1979 which indicated that a disposal in favour of the 18 subsidiaries was contemplated as a prelude to the sale to M.P.L. However, by 25 March 1980, no contract had yet been concluded with M.P.L. because of uncertainties relating to planning and other matters.

I now take up the story, more or less verbatim, from the judgment of Warner J. On 25 March 1980 the taxpayer company contracted to sell Crafts Marsh for £180,000 to five other companies ("the five companies") in the Bowater group as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares. It is not in dispute that that transaction ("the first transaction") had no business purpose. The five companies were selected because none of them had used any part of its £50,000 exemption from development land tax under section 12 of the Act of 1976 as amended. The sole object of the first transaction was to avoid the liability to development land tax which would otherwise fall on the taxpayer company if the sale to M.P.L. went through. At the time of the first transaction there was, as the commissioners found, a firm expectation on the Bowater side that that sale would go through, but the chances of M.P.L. being willing to sign a contract on or about 25 March 1980 were nil. On 22 May 1980 Mr. Goodger, a group legal adviser in the Bowater Corporation's legal department, during the course of what the commissioners describe as "a somewhat desultory correspondence" between himself and the solicitors acting for M.P.L., sent to them, to replace an earlier draft, a revised draft contract, conditional on M.P.L. obtaining planning permission. In this draft the five companies were of course named as vendors. On 7 July 1980 M.P.L.'s solicitors wrote to Mr. Goodger in these terms:

"Dear Sir,

"Land at Crafts Marsh

"We thank you for your letter of 22 May. We are sorry to tell you that the present economic situation with its direct effect on the concrete making industry has compelled our clients to give up the proposal to purchase your company's land. We enclose the various documents which you have sent us."

It appeared to those concerned on the Bowater side that the sale had fallen through for good. During the ensuing months it remained their general policy to sell Crafts Marsh, but they had no other potential purchaser in mind and they did not actively seek one. Early in February 1981, circumstances having changed, particularly from the planning point of view, the solicitors who had been acting for M.P.L. telephoned the

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A Bowater Corporation's legal department to say that M.P.L. was interested in Crafts Marsh again. Negotiations were thereupon reopened. They resulted in the exchange on 23 October 1981 of unconditional contracts for the sale of Crafts Marsh by the five companies to M.P.L. for £259,750 ("the second transaction"). The sales were completed on 23 November 1981.

B On 13 February 1984 the Inland Revenue Commissioners, in reliance on the Ramsay principle, assessed the taxpayer company to development land tax on the footing that the second transaction should be treated for tax purposes as a disposal by the taxpayer company. The commissioners held that, on the facts of this case, that principle did not apply and they discharged the assessment.

C In this case it was undisputed that the second Ramsay condition was satisfied. The submissions made before the judge concerned the first Ramsay condition and are to be found summarised in his judgment [1985] S.T.C. 783, 796–798. It will be seen that, following the lines of what I have called the Crown's basic contention, they involved a submission by Mr. Sher that the Ramsay principle applies whenever it is found that a step has been taken with a view to avoiding tax in a certain event and that event actually occurs. Warner J. said, at p. 796:

D "Thus, he says, in the present case, what matters is the expectation or intention of those concerned on behalf of the Bowater group at the time of the first transaction. They at that time expected the sale of Crafts Marsh to go through and their purpose in causing the first transaction to take place was to avoid development land tax on that sale. Therefore, the Ramsay principle applies, and the break in the negotiations between the Bowater group and [M.P.L.] that occurred from July 1980 to February 1981 was irrelevant."

Warner J. rejected these submissions of the Crown. He expressed himself in entire agreement with the reasoning that led Peter Gibson J. to hold in Craven v. White that the first Ramsay condition was not satisfied. He expressed the ratio of his final conclusion, at p. 800:

F "The crucial fact, to my mind—a fact of which the events of May and July 1980 are but evidence—is that it had not been pre-ordained or pre-arranged, at the time of the first transaction, that the second transaction would follow. Applying the test suggested by Lord Wilberforce's words, it could not be said at that time that there was 'no likelihood in practice' that the second transaction would not follow. When it followed, 19 months later, it followed as an independent transaction."

G

H The Crown's case on this appeal, as I see it, stands or falls on the Crown's basic contention. For the reasons which I have given in the first section of this judgment, I think that that contention is not well founded and that the relevant test for the purpose of the first Ramsay condition is that which I have indicated in that section. On the facts of this case, that test is not satisfied. It cannot conceivably be said that, at the date of the first transaction (25 March 1980), all the essential features of the second transaction, which ultimately took place on 23 October 1981, had already been determined by a person who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability to procure, the implementation of that second transaction. If the "practical certainty" test is to be preferred, that test likewise is not satisfied.

Further detailed reference to the facts is unnecessary, but I mention a few points drawn to our attention by Mr. Park, on behalf of the taxpayer company, as illustrating the difficulties, to my mind insuperable, of holding that on 23 October 1981, either in substance or in reality, or within the meaning of the Act of 1976, there was a disposal of the land by the taxpayer company in favour of M.P.L.: (i) at the time of the second transaction the five companies, not the taxpayer company, had been the legal and beneficial owners of the land for some 19 months. (ii) The taxpayer company was not a party to the contract of sale of 23 October 1981. (iii) The taxpayer company was not a party to the negotiations which led to that contract and did not receive any of the proceeds of sale. (iv) The taxpayer company had no control over the land through the five companies. The Bowater group holding company controlled both the taxpayer company and the five companies, but the taxpayer company had no control, directly or indirectly, of the five companies.

It is common ground that the first transaction was effected without any commercial or business purpose, apart from a tax advantage. Nevertheless, on the facts found by them, I do not think it would have been open to the commissioners properly to find that the first and second transactions were one single composite transaction. The judge, in my view, was plainly right in deciding that, when the second transaction followed, it did so as an “independent” transaction in the sense of that phrase as used by Lord Wilberforce in the Ramsay case [1982] A.C. 300, 324.

Various other matters were canvassed in the course of argument, in particular suggested possibilities of double taxation. I do not find it necessary to deal with these matters. More generally, I would, with respect, associate myself with the following observations of Warner J., at p. 798:

“Counsel for the Crown argued that, unless his submissions were accepted, the application of the Ramsay principle in the ‘linear’ or bilateral type of case would be haphazard. A well-advised taxpayer need never be affected by it, because he could always ensure that the tax avoiding transaction was carried out before any deal with the other party was clinched. That argument would be very convincing if it were legitimate to regard the Ramsay principle as a judge-made anti-tax-avoidance rule, which it was open to the courts to mould and develop in the light of their experience of tax avoidance devices. Indeed counsel for the Crown went so far as to suggest that I should so regard it. In my opinion, however, that would be nothing short of unconstitutional. Under our constitution the imposition of taxation is a matter for Parliament. Indeed within Parliament itself it is a matter in which the House of Commons has a predominant role. The only function of the courts in this sphere is to interpret and apply the legislation enacted by Parliament in accordance with relevant legal principles. Among the relevant legal principles is the principle that the courts are bound to seek to ascertain the true nature of a transaction and to give effect to it. That, to my mind, is the real basis of the Ramsay principle. (I choose the phrase ‘true nature,’ but other expressions such as ‘reality’ or ‘substance’—in the sense in which I understand the latter

3 W.L.R.

A term to have been used by Lord Bridge in Furniss v. Dawson—will do just as well.)”

To call the true nature of the series of transactions in the present case a disposal made on 23 October 1981 in favour of M.P.L. by the taxpayer company would appear to me to involve a travesty of the facts.

I would dismiss this appeal.

B

Baylis v. Gregory; Same v. Same

C The decision of Vinelott J., which is under appeal by the Crown in this case, was given on appeals by the Crown against two related decisions of the special commissioners. These decisions had discharged assessments to capital gains tax respectively on Mr. R. F. Gregory and on Mr. Gregory and Mr. J. B. Weare (“the trustees”) jointly as trustees of the estate of Joseph Gregory deceased. They arose out of a transaction, or series of transactions, concerning the shares of a company called Planet Gloves (Industrial) Ltd. (“P.G.I.”) in which Mr. Gregory and the trustees held shares. There were ten other shareholders of P.G.I. All were members of Mr. Gregory’s family, trustees of family settlements or employees of P.G.I., except Mr. Weare. He was the company’s accountant and held a few shares in his own right. Appeals by the Crown against the discharge of assessments on the other shareholders had been held over pending the judge’s decision on the appeals before him.

E Once again, I will gratefully adopt, more or less verbatim, the greater part of the judge’s summary of the facts found by the commissioners. P.G.I. carried on a clothing business. At all material times Mr. Gregory was its managing director. He also, through his personal and trustee holdings, had voting control of P.G.I. In 1973 he negotiated, on behalf of all the shareholders, a sale of the entire issued share capital of P.G.I. to an investment company, Cannon Street Investments Ltd. (“Cannon”). In the course of the negotiations it was suggested to Mr. Gregory that liability to capital gains tax could be indefinitely deferred if the shares of P.G.I. were exchanged for shares of a holding company incorporated in the Isle of Man, which would sell them on to Cannon—thus, it was hoped, obtaining the benefit of the relief afforded by paragraphs 6 and 4 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965. It was also suggested that there would be no fiscal penalty if the proceeds of sale were later sent by the holding company to the shareholders rateably in proportion to their shareholdings. Mr. Gregory arranged for a private unlimited company called P. G. Holdings (“Holdings”) to be incorporated in the Isle of Man. Early in 1974, before shares of P.G.I. were exchanged for shares of Holdings, Cannon wrote to say that it could not proceed with the purchase. Mr. Gregory and the other shareholders decided that they would nonetheless proceed with the share exchange. There was no disadvantage in doing so. The exchange would be carried out by means of the issue and renunciation of the holdings of bonus shares of P.G.I. on which no stamp duty would be payable. The machinery would be there for use if a sale of the shares of P.G.I. were subsequently negotiated. The exchange was duly completed on 11 March 1974 pursuant to an agreement made that same day.

There matters rested for some time. Mr. Gregory took no steps to find a purchaser. Then, in the late spring of 1975, he learned by chance that another company, Hawtin Ltd., might be interested in acquiring the shares. Discussions in May and June 1975 came to nothing. However, in November 1975, Hawtin approached him again. The renewed negotiations bore fruit, and on 30 January 1976 an agreement was concluded between Holdings and Hawtin for the sale of all the shares of P.G.I. for £1.75 million to be satisfied by a down payment of £1 million, a further payment of £550,000 on 31 December 1979, and an issue of convertible loan notes for the face value of £200,000. The agreement was completed on the same day in the Isle of Man. As a result of advice given by counsel the proposal that the proceeds of the sale should be lent to the shareholders of Holdings was deferred for a year save that £50,000 was lent to Mr. Gregory. The commissioners found that "a more general withdrawal of funds, to take place in March 1977, was in contemplation at the date of the sale agreement." In the meantime, the balance of the £1 million was invested. In March loans totalling £945,000 were made. Further loans were made after the deferred consideration of £550,000 had been paid (the payment of this sum having been by agreement deferred for a further six months). Although the Crown at one time contended that the loans were gains accruing to the shareholders, that claim was not pursued before the commissioners.

The question whether these transactions gave rise to a liability to capital gains tax was the subject of correspondence between a Mr. Rothwell, district inspector of taxes for the Pontypridd District, and Mr. Weare starting in 1978. In March 1980 Mr. Rothwell arranged for assessments to be made on all the shareholders for the year 1973–74. In March 1982 Mr. Rothwell decided that alternative assessments should be made for the year 1975–76. On 15 March 1982 he wrote to Mr. Weare's firm to say that alternative assessments would be made for the year 1975–76. Mr. Weare's firm was only concerned with the tax affairs of the trustees and one of the taxpayers. Alternative assessments for the year 1975–76 were against all the shareholders, including Mr. Gregory personally, for that year, though Mr. Rothwell had asked a subordinate to issue an assessment for 1975–76 to the trustees, the subordinate regrettably made an assessment, dated 15 March 1982, expressed to be for the fiscal year 6 April 1974 to 5 April 1975. At the same time he issued a notice of assessment bearing the same date, also expressed to be for that fiscal year. Mr. Weare's firm appealed against all the assessments. In the case of the trustees, their letter, dated 8 April 1982, read:

"We refer to capital gains tax assessment dated 15 March 1982 marked 1974–75. Please take this letter as formal appeal. Our appeal is based on paragraph 6 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965. We are requesting full postponement of tax."

At this stage Mr. Rothwell noticed the error. He also noticed that, as 5 April 1982 had passed, it was too late to make an assessment for the year 1975–76. So on 26 April 1982 he marked in his records on a standard form opposite the calculation of "Total Chargeable Gains—(Estimated) £155,000," in the column headed "Amendment" the words "Vacated" and "Raised in error." Then, opposite the calculation of the tax payable at 30 per cent. (£46,500) appear the words "Tax discharged—£46,500," and at the foot the tax payable as amended is stated to be "Nil." Mr. Rothwell notified the collector of taxes of this change but not Mr. Weare.

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A When preparing the appeals to the commissioners the taxpayers' solicitors wrote to the inspector of taxes, Pontypridd, and enclosed a schedule of appeals (24 in all: two for each taxpayer). In that schedule two assessments are shown as made on the trustees, one for 1973-74 and one for 1975-76.

B In substance, three issues have been argued on these appeals, namely: (A) Since 26 April 1982, when the assessment made against the trustees expressed as an assessment for 1974-75 was "vacated," has that assessment been capable of having any legal effect at all? (B) If the answer to question (A) is yes, can the last-mentioned assessment be treated as a good assessment for the fiscal year 1975-76, either by virtue of section 114 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 or otherwise? (C) Does the Ramsay principle entitle the Crown to claim that there have been disposals by the trustees and by Mr. Gregory personally in favour of Holdings? I will deal in turn with these issues, of which the first and second do not concern Mr. Gregory in his personal capacity.

Issue (A)

D The recent decision of this court in Honig v. Sarsfield [1986] S.T.C. 246 has established that, for the purpose of applying the time limit imposed by section 40(1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970, an assessment is made at the time when the inspector, authorised to make such an assessment, signs the certificate in the assessment book, not when notice of the assessment is served on the taxpayer. By what he suggested is parity of reasoning, Mr. Flesch, on behalf of the trustees, submitted that an inspector can effectively vacate or nullify an assessment merely by making an appropriate entry in his records, unilaterally and without any notice to the taxpayers. When Mr. Rothwell marked in his records the words "vacated" and "raised in error," this, it was submitted, ipso facto nullified the assessment made against the trustees.

E Though for the purpose of the relevant time limits an assessment can be made in the privacy of the inspector's office, it will have little, if any, other effect until notice of it is served on the person assessed. Until such service, such person is under no liability to pay; nor does the right of appeal conferred by section 31 of the Act of 1970 arise. However, once notice of the assessment has been served, the position entirely alters. The taxpayer can get rid of the assessment by means of a successful appeal under section 31. Section 50 provides for the reduction or increase of an assessment in the case of an appeal. Section 54 provides for the settling of appeals by agreement. Section 32(1) contains express provisions for the vacation of an assessment in specified circumstances. It reads:

H "If on a claim made to the board it appears to their satisfaction that a person has been assessed to tax more than once for the same cause and for the same chargeable period, they shall direct the whole, or such part of any assessment as appears to be an overcharge, to be vacated, and thereupon the same shall be vacated accordingly."

However—and this, in my judgment, is the crucial point—the Act of 1970 confers no general powers on an inspector to vacate an assessment. Significantly, section 29(6) specifically provides:

“After the notice of assessment has been served on the person assessed, the assessment shall not be altered except in accordance with the express provisions of the Taxes Acts.”

A

In the present case, therefore, section 29(6) would, in my opinion, have clearly precluded Mr. Rothwell from altering the relevant assessment so as to reduce the sum assessed to a nominal sum. It is perhaps more debatable whether section 29(6) on its true construction would itself have prohibited him from withdrawing or vacating an assessment. Nevertheless, Mr. Sher was, in my judgment, right in submitting that the vacation of an assessment has to be effected properly if it is to be valid, and in the absence of any statutory authority for the purported “vacation” by Mr. Rothwell, his entry in the assessment book which purported to record a vacation was not properly made and had no legal effect. In agreement with the judge, I would therefore reject the trustees’ contentions on issue (A).

Issue (B)

As did the judge, I regard the next issue as more difficult. In this context I should begin by dealing with what seems to have been a new line of argument raised by Mr. Sher in this court and not canvassed in the court below. He pointed out that the assessment against the trustees related to capital gains tax, not income tax, and that, while income tax is payable in respect of income actually or notionally received over a period of time, capital gains tax is payable in respect of actual or notional disposals. In the latter case, as he put it, a particular time does not ordinarily have to be identified by the revenue beyond identifying the year in which the event took place. In the present case there were only two possible relevant events, namely, the share exchange which took place in the fiscal year 1973–74 (11 March 1974) and the sale to Hawtin which took place in the fiscal year 1975–76 (30 January 1976). Accordingly, there were only two fiscal years in which the relevant disposal could have taken place, that is to say 1973–74 or 1975–76. On 15 March 1982 Mr. Rothwell had written to Mr. Weare’s firm to say that, following the assessments already made for the year 1973–74, alternative assessments would be made for the year 1975–76. On that same day the revenue made an assessment against the trustees, which it marked with the year 1974–75, and sent out a notice of assessment marked with the same year. The notice was one of a bundle of 12 assessments all directed to the same transaction. The other assessments and notices of the assessments were duly marked with the year 1975–76. In these circumstances, Mr. Sher submitted, no one concerned believed that the assessment issued against the trustees and marked with the year 1974–75 was intended as anything other than an assessment for the year 1975–76. It was plainly intended to relate to the disposals which had taken place on 30 January 1976. In all the circumstances, it was submitted, the assessment was an assessment for the year 1975–76 and the Crown does not have to rely on section 114 of the Act.

E

F

H

I have some sympathy with this argument because it would seem to me that Mr. Weare’s firm, or their clients, on receipt of the notice of assessment marked 1974–75, could not in all the circumstances, after proper thought, have reasonably believed that either the notice of assessment, or the assessment to which it referred, was intended by the revenue to relate to any year other than 1975–76. Nevertheless, apart

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A from section 114, to which I will revert, I find it impossible to hold that the assessment either was or took effect as an assessment for 1975–76. Contrary to Mr. Sher's submissions, as I understood them, the year of assessment is of critical importance in relation to capital gains tax. This is illustrated by section 19(3) of the Finance Act 1965, which provided:

B “a tax, to be called capital gains tax, shall be assessed and charged for the year 1965–66 and for subsequent years of assessment in respect of chargeable gains accruing in those years . . .”

Section 113(3) of the Act of 1970 provided:

C “Every assessment . . . notice of assessment . . . required to be used in assessing, charging, collecting and levying tax shall be in accordance with the forms prescribed from time to time in that behalf by the board . . .”

D The printed prescribed form of notice of assessment, which was employed by the revenue in the present case, predictably has a heading in the top left-hand corner: “Capital gains tax. Year ending 5 April 19 . . .” The body of the notice begins with the words “This notice gives particulars of an assessment made on you for the year shown above.” (The emphasis is mine.) All these matters illustrate that the year of assessment is an essential element of the assessment itself. The assessment is what is written in the assessment book. Section 114 apart, I find it is impossible to say that an assessment for one specified fiscal year can ever be or take effect as an assessment for another fiscal year. Section 114 apart, the fact that the taxpayer may have appreciated that a mistake has been made on receiving the notice of assessment is, to my mind, irrelevant in this context.

E I now turn to section 114 which provides:

F “(1) An assessment, warrant or other proceeding which purports to be made in pursuance of any provision of the Taxes Acts shall not be quashed, or deemed to be void or voidable, for want of form, or be affected by reason of a mistake, defect or omission therein, if the same is in substance and effect in conformity with or according to the intent and meaning of the Taxes Acts, and if the person or property charged or intended to be charged or affected thereby is designated therein according to common intent and understanding. (2) An assessment shall not be impeached or affected—(a) by reason of a mistake therein as to—(i) the name or surname of a person liable, or (ii) the description of any profits or property, or (iii) the amount of the tax charged, or (b) by reason of any variance between the notice and the assessment.”

H The judge took the view that section 114 will enable an assessment expressed to be for one year to be treated and take effect as an assessment for another year provided that the Crown can show that there was a genuine mistake and that in all the circumstances there was no real possibility that the taxpayer was in any way misled. While I again have some sympathy with this view, which was supported by Mr. Sher in this court by way of alternative submission, I do not find myself able to concur in it, since I do not think it is warranted by the wording of the section. Subsection (2) has no application to the facts of this case. The only words of subsection (1) which can possibly be relied on by the Crown are the following:

“An assessment . . . which purports to be made in pursuance of any provision of the Taxes Acts shall not . . . be affected by reason of a mistake . . . if the same is in substance and effect in conformity with or according to the intent and meaning of the Taxes Acts . . .”

The assessment in the present case, which the Crown asserts “is not to be affected,” is an assessment for 1974–75. Mr. Flesch accepted and contended that, as an assessment for that fiscal year, it would not be affected by reason of a mistake if the other conditions specified in section 114(1) were satisfied. However, as he pointed out, the subsection does not provide for rectification of an assessment; it is not the equivalent of the “slip rule.” The relevant fiscal year of assessment is an integral, fundamental part of the assessment itself. I, for my part, find it impossible to read the wording of section 114(1), wide though it is, as justifying in any circumstances the treatment of an assessment made for one fiscal year as an assessment made for another fiscal year. If the revenue make an assessment for the wrong year, their proper course is to issue a new assessment for the correct year. It is pertinent to observe that section 29(6) of the Act of 1970 would preclude them from themselves amending an assessment by substituting a reference to one fiscal year for another.

In the course of argument, three authorities relating to the effect of section 114 were cited: British Estate Investment Society Ltd. v. Jackson (1956) 37 T.C. 79; Fleming v. London Produce Co. Ltd. [1968] 1 W.L.R. 1013 and Hart v. Briscoe [1979] Ch. 1. However, I did not derive any great assistance from these authorities, since the judgments in those cases were directed to facts very different from those of the present case. However, in a passage in his judgment in the Fleming case (which judgment primarily concerned the statutory predecessor of section 114(2)) Megarry J. made the general observation, at p. 1027, that he would be slow to accept that the subsections “provide an impervious coverlet for gross errors.” Vinelott J. in the present case was not persuaded that gross error must be absent before what he described as the “dispensing power in section 114” can be exercised. I would merely make this comment. As I am sure the judge appreciated, section 114, where it applies, does not strictly confer a “dispensing power.” In a case where it applies, it gives the revenue or the taxpayer, as the case may be, the statutory right to claim that the assessment, warrant or other proceeding in question shall not be affected by reason of a mistake etc. If, contrary to my view, this statutory right has any relevance in relation to an assessment which has been made for the wrong year, I think it unlikely that the legislature would have intended that it would be exercisable where the error was a gross one—as in the present case I think it must have been. To sum up, however, in my judgment, neither section 114 nor any other statutory provision provides an escape route for the revenue if they issue an assessment for the wrong fiscal year. This is something they must get right.

For all these reasons, I think that the assessment made against the trustees cannot be treated as an assessment for the year 1975–76. It is common ground that, if it is to be regarded as an assessment for 1974–75, it can give rise to no legal liability on the part of the trustees.

Issue (C)

Even if my conclusion on issue (B) is correct, this does not dispose of the disputes relating to the assessment made against the taxpayer,

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A Mr. Gregory, personally. I must therefore proceed to consider issue (C).
The Crown's contention was that the exchange of the shares of P.G.I.
for the shares of Holdings and the subsequent sale of the P.G.I. shares to Hawtin constituted one single composite transaction which, on an application of the Ramsay principle, is to be treated for fiscal purposes as involving a disposal by the taxpayers of the P.G.I. shares to the ultimate purchaser, Hawtin. I propose to deal with this contention very B shortly, because I think that the reasons for which I would reject the Crown's similar claims in the two earlier appeals apply a fortiori on the facts of the present cases. Attention, however, should be drawn to a few particularly significant facts. In these cases, as the commissioners found, by the time when the shares of P.G.I. were exchanged for shares of Holdings on 11 March 1974, the previously contemplated sale to Cannon had fallen through. The commissioners found as facts:

C "The incorporation of Holdings and the share exchange which followed . . . were . . . not made without an appreciation of the possible value of having taken those steps if, at some future date, the [taxpayers] decided to sell the P.G.I. shares to an outside purchaser. But at that time an intention of selling (or of procuring a D sale) was absent: it came into being not earlier than the summer of 1975."

On these findings, the transfer of the P.G.I. shares to Holdings (though, as the commissioners found, it passed the full legal beneficial interest to Holdings) was made solely by way of what has been referred to in the opening section of this judgment as "strategic tax planning." At that E time no sale at all was in contemplation. The highest it could be put on behalf of the Crown is that the parties intended that the interposition of Holdings should serve as a convenient springboard (convenient for tax purposes) in case at some future date it might be desired to sell the shares in P.G.I.

There is no dispute that the second Ramsay condition is satisfied. In the circumstances, however, I agree with Vinelott J. that it is impossible F to say the same of the first Ramsay condition. The revenue's case is again founded on the Crown's basic contention referred to in the opening section of this judgment. In the court below particular reliance appears to have been placed on Lord Wilberforce's reference in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300, 323, to "a transaction intended to have effect as part of a nexus or series of transactions or as an ingredient of a wider G transaction intended as a whole." The exchange of the P.G.I. shares, it was postulated, could properly be regarded as a transaction so intended, within Lord Wilberforce's words. Therefore, it was submitted, the first Ramsay condition was satisfied. I much doubt the correctness of the premise of this submission. Even accepting the premise, however, I do not think the conclusion would follow. Lord Wilberforce's words now fall to be read in the light of what Lord Diplock subsequently said in H Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd., 54 T.C. 200, 214 and what Lord Brightman said in Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C.
474, 527, in the authoritative formulation of the first Ramsay condition.
In my judgment, that condition does not come near to being satisfied on the facts of the present case. It cannot properly be said that the share exchange and the subsequent sale of the shares to Hawtin were a pre-ordained series of transactions or a single composite transaction because, at the date of the share exchange, so far from the essential features of a sale to Hawtin or any other purchaser having already been determined, no one had the intention, still less the practical ability, to implement a sale to Hawtin, or indeed to any other purchaser.

The judge referred to the greater conceptual difficulties involved in treating the shareholders in P.G.I. as if they had entered into a tripartite arrangement for the sale of the shares in P.G.I. to Hawtin, in a case such as this, where the sale on by the interposed company, Holdings, had not been arranged at the time of the share exchange. He also made some cogent comments in relation to double taxation. I do not, however, find it necessary further to explore these points.

For the reasons which I have already stated, I would dismiss these appeals.

PARKER L.J. For the purposes of this judgment I shall first state the essential facts of the three appeals in the shortest possible form and indicate how the issues for determination arise. [His Lordship then set out a summary of the facts, sections 19(1) and (3), 20(1) and 22(3) of the Finance Act 1965 and sections 1 and 4 of the Development Land Tax 1976, the basic contentions of the Crown and continued:] In one sense, the question to be determined here is, in two cases, whether the taxpayers disposed of shares to the ultimate purchaser and whether, thereby, a chargeable gain accrued to them within section 19 and 20 of the Finance Act 1965. In the other case, it is whether the taxpayer company disposed of Crafts Marsh to the ultimate purchaser and whether, thereby, realised development value accrued to it within sections 1 and 2 of the Development Land Tax Act 1976. This, however, is, in my view, a gross over-simplification. The true question is, in each case, whether, on the true construction of any of the other provisions of the respective Acts, the taxpayers are, on the facts, brought within the charging sections.

In searching for the answer to this question I shall deal first with well settled principles before I examine in any detail the three decisions which together form the Ramsay principle. Lest it be thought that in so doing I am reluctant to escape from the ghosts or shackles of the past, I should perhaps make it clear that I do so because they were reiterated by Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay and because Lord Diplock stated in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd., 54 T.C. 200, 214 that the new approach in Ramsay did not involve over-ruling previous decisions of their Lordships' House. Since in Ramsay Lord Russell of Killowen, Lord Roskill and Lord Bridge of Harwich agreed with Lord Wilberforce, and since in Burmah Lord Scarman, Lord Roskill and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook agreed with Lord Diplock, I regard myself as bound to do so. I take those principles from the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300, 323–324.

“A subject is only to be taxed upon clear words, not upon ‘intendment’ or upon the ‘equity’ of an Act. Any taxing Act of Parliament is to be construed in accordance with this principle.”

“What are ‘clear words’ is to be ascertained upon normal principles: these do not confine the courts to literal interpretation. There may,

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Parker L.J.

- A indeed should, be considered the context and scheme of the relevant Act as a whole, and its purpose may, indeed should, be regarded: see Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Wesleyan and General Assurance Society (1946) 30 T.C. 11, 16, per Lord Greene M.R. and Mangin v. Inland Revenue Commissioner [1971] A.C. 739, 746, per Lord Donovan. The relevant Act in these cases is the Finance Act 1965, the purpose of which is to impose a tax on gains less allowable losses, arising from disposals.”
- B

- It is not entirely clear at first sight how, if intendment is to be excluded, “purpose” is to be included. I can myself derive no assistance on the point from Lord Greene M.R.’s judgment in the Wesleyan case for his observations on construction related to the construction of a document.
- C He did, however, make some general observations of relevance to the present appeals. He said, at p. 16:

- “In dealing with income tax questions it frequently happens that there are two methods at least of achieving a particular financial result. If one of those methods is adopted, tax will be payable. If the other method is adopted, tax will not be payable. It is sufficient to refer to the quite common case where property is sold for a lump sum payable by instalments. If a piece of property is sold for £1,000 and the purchase price is to be paid in ten instalments of £100 each, no tax is payable. If, on the other hand, the property is sold in consideration of an annuity of £100 a year for ten years, tax is payable. The net result from the financial point of view is precisely the same in each case, but one method of achieving it attracts tax and the other method does not. There have been cases in the past where what has been called the substance of the transaction has been thought to enable the court to construe a document in such a way as to attract tax. That particular doctrine of substance as distinct from form was, I hope, finally exploded by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1.”
- D
- E
- F

On the particular point Lord Donovan’s judgment in Mangin v. Inland Revenue Commissioner [1971] A.C. 739 does not assist either, but again it is of value on the general ambit of Lord Wilberforce’s first principle. Lord Donovan said, at p. 746:

- “... one has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment. There is no equity about a tax. There is no presumption as to tax. Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used’: per Rowlatt J. in Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1921] 1 K.B. 64, 71, approved by Viscount Simons L.C. in Canadian Eagle Oil Co. Ltd. v. The King [1946] A.C. 119, 140.
- G
- H Thirdly, the object of the construction of a statute being to ascertain the will of the legislature it may be presumed that neither injustice nor absurdity was intended. If therefore a literal interpretation would produce such a result, and the language admits of an interpretation which would avoid it, then such an interpretation may be adopted. Fourthly, the history of an enactment and the reasons which led to its being passed may be used as an aid to its construction.” (Emphasis added.)

In connection with the first principle I cite two further passages from speeches in their Lordships' House In Partington v. Attorney-General (1869) L.R. 4 H.L. 100, 122, Lord Cairns said:

A

"as I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation, it is this: If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be admissible, in any statute, what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute."

And in Tennant v. Smith [1892] A.C. 150, 154, Lord Halsbury L.C. said:

"In various cases the principle of construction of a taxing Act has been referred to in various forms, but I believe they may be all reduced to this, that inasmuch as you have no right to assume that there is any governing object which a taxing Act is intended to attain other than that which it has expressed by making such and such objects the intended subject for taxation, you must see whether a tax is expressly imposed." (Emphasis added.)

D

When Lord Wilberforce referred to the purpose of the Finance Act 1965 being to impose a tax on gains less allowable losses, arising from disposals, he was, as it seems to me, stating the "purpose" within those limits mentioned by Lord Halsbury L.C. In this limited sense the purpose does not appear to be of any assistance in the present appeals for the detailed and elaborate provisions of the Finance Act 1965 make it clear that the purpose was to tax some people and not others in respect of certain transactions and not others, and one can only determine which people and which transactions by looking at the words of the sections.

F

Principle 2

"A subject is entitled to arrange his affairs so as to reduce his liability to tax. The fact that the motive for a transaction may be to avoid tax does not invalidate it unless a particular enactment so provides. It must be considered according to its legal effect."

G

This principle is stated by Lord Wilberforce without qualification. The first sentence is a paraphrase of what Lord Tomlin said in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1. The remainder appears to me to summarise the effect of the rest of Lord Tomlin's speech but, in view of later developments, it is desirable that Lord Tomlin's statements should be seen in context. He said, at pp. 19-20:

"it is said that in revenue cases there is a doctrine that the court may ignore the legal position and regard what is called 'the substance of the matter' . . . This supposed doctrine (upon which the commissioners apparently acted) seems to rest for its support upon a misunderstanding of language used in some earlier cases.

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Parker L.J.

A The sooner this misunderstanding is dispelled, and the supposed doctrine given its quietus, the better it will be for all concerned, for the doctrine seems to involve substituting 'the incertain and crooked cord of discretion' for 'the golden and streight metwand of the law.' Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be. If he succeeds in ordering them so as to secure this result, then, B however unappreciative the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or his fellow taxpayers may be of his ingenuity, he cannot be compelled to pay an increased tax. This so-called doctrine of 'the substance' seems to me to be nothing more than an attempt to make a man pay notwithstanding that he has so ordered his affairs that the amount of tax sought from him is not legally claimable. . . .

C "The matter was put accurately by my noble and learned friend Lord Warrington of Clyffe when as Warrington L.J. in In re Hinckes, Dashwood v. Hinckes [1921] 1 Ch. 475, 489 he used these words: 'It is said we must go behind the form and look at the substance . . . but, in order to ascertain the substance, I must look at the legal effect of the bargain which the parties have entered into.'"

D Principle 3

E "It is for the fact-finding commissioners to find whether a document, or a transaction, is genuine or a sham. In this context to say that a document or transaction is a 'sham' means that while professing to be one thing, it is in fact something different. To say that a document or transaction is genuine, means that, in law, it is what it professes to be, and it does not mean anything more than that."

Principle 4

"Given that a document or transaction is genuine, the court cannot go behind it to some supposed underlying substance." As to this principle Lord Wilberforce said, at p. 323:

F "This is a cardinal principle but it must not be overstated or overextended. While obliging the court to accept documents or transactions, found to be genuine, as such, it does not compel the court to look at a document or a transaction in blinkers, isolated from any context to which it properly belongs. If it can be seen that a document or transaction was intended to have effect as part of a G nexus or series of transactions, or as an ingredient of a wider transaction intended as a whole, there is nothing in the doctrine to prevent it being so regarded: to do so is not to prefer form to substance, or substance to form. It is the task of the court to ascertain the legal nature of any transaction to which it is sought to attach a tax or a tax consequence and if that emerges from a series or combination of transactions, intended to operate as such, it is that series or combination which may be regarded. For this there is authority in the law relating to income tax and capital gains tax: see Chinn v. Hochstrasser [1981] A.C. 533 and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Plummer [1980] A.C. 896. For the commissioners considering a particular case it is wrong, and an unnecessary self limitation, to regard themselves as precluded by their own finding that documents or transactions are not 'shams', from considering what, as evidence by the documents themselves or by the manifested members of the parties, the relevant transaction is. They are not, under the Wexminster doctrine or any other authority, bound to consider individually each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole. This is particularly the case where (as in Rawling) it is proved that there was an accepted obligation once a scheme is set in motion, to carry it through its successive steps. It may be so where (as in Ramsay or in Black Nominees Ltd. v. Nicol (1975) 50 T.C. 229) there is an expectation that it will be so carried through, and no likelihood in practice that it will not. In such cases (which may vary in emphasis) the commissioners should find the facts and then decide as a matter (reviewable) of law whether what is in issue is a composite transaction, or a number of independent transactions." (Emphasis added.)

I confess to finding some difficulty in appreciating how one can arrive at the conclusion that the legal nature of a series of transactions is something which in law it is not. It appears to me that this is preferring substance to form and this certainly appears to have been the view of both Lord Roskill and Lord Bridge of Harwich in their speeches in Barms v. Dawson [1984] 1 A.C. 474, 515, 517. I shall return to this question later.

First I shall consider whether, on any construction of any provision of either of the two Acts here in question, it can be said, within the four principles, that the taxpayers disposed of their shares or their land to the ultimate purchaser and thereby made a chargeable gain or realised development value. In my view, the answer must plainly be no. It would only be possible to arrive at such a result by implying some elaborate proviso in paragraph 6 of Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1965 and section 20 of the Development Land Tax Act 1976. In the one case such a proviso would have to be on the following lines: "Provided that, if the sole purpose of the exchange is to avoid the tax which would have resulted had the original holding been sold to a third party and the shares are thereafter sold to a third party, then the sale to the third party shall be treated as if it were a disposal by the original owner to the third party and the proceeds of sale shall be treated as a capital sum derived from the disposal by the original owner." The implication could not, however, stop there, or so it seems to me. The original owner would still be possessed of the new holding and provision would need to be made as to what was to happen if and when he disposed of the new holding for, in the absence of such a provision, the position of the new holding is unascertainable. If one is to ignore the exchange, does one also ignore the acquisition and the subsequent disposal of the new holding?

In the Bowmer case also there would have to be some provision, equally elaborate, to achieve the result contended for by the Crown. The contention is only made because the fragmentation resulted in the five companies having greater free allowances than the original owner. What then must be read in? There are clearly many possibilities, none of them being expressed. Whatever solution were adopted it would seem to involve elaborate implication. If Lord Donovan in Mangin v. Inland Revenue Commissioner [1971] A.C. 739, 746, was right, nothing is to be implied. If imputed and equity are excluded, there is, in any event, no warrant for reading in anything. If motive does not invalidate, the

A share exchanges and the fragmentation stand. If the legal results of genuine documents are looked at there is no question of the taxpayers being chargeable. If the parliamentary purpose is looked at it appears to be clear. In the two share cases it was that there should be no tax on the disposal constituted by the change but tax on a subsequent disposal of the new holding by the original owner. In the development land case it was similar.

B Unless, therefore, the Ramsay principle is wide enough to override, but without overruling, the four principles, the Crown's case must fail. I turn, therefore, to this aspect of the case. In Ramsay and in Burmah the question was whether the taxpayers had succeeded in creating an allowable loss and it was held that they had not. I find it unnecessary to examine further the speeches in that case, for in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd., 54 T.C. 200 the House of Lords defined the ratio of the case and it is with that that this court is concerned. Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, with whose speech all other members of the Judicial Committee agreed, said, at p. 220:

D "The ratio of the decision in Ramsay is to be found in the speech of Lord Wilberforce at [p. 326] where he said this: 'The capital gains tax was created to operate in the real world, not that of make-belief. As I said in Aberdeen Construction Group Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1978] A.C. 885, it is a tax on gains (or I might have added gains less losses), it is not a tax on arithmetical differences. To say that a loss (or gain) which appears to arise at one stage in an indivisible process, and which is intended to be and is cancelled out by a later stage, so that at the end of what was bought as, and planned as, a single continuous operation, is not such a loss (or gain) as the legislation is dealing with, is in my opinion well and indeed essentially within the judicial function.' At p. 337 of the same case I said this with reference to the cases of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Plummer [1980] A.C. 896 and Chinn v. Hochstrasser [1981] A.C. 533: 'The essential feature of both schemes was that, when they were completely carried out, they did not result in any actual loss to the taxpayer. The apparently magic result of creating a tax loss that would not be a real loss was to be brought about by arranging that the scheme included a loss which was allowable for tax purposes and a matching gain which was not chargeable.' The question in this part of the appeal is whether the present scheme, when completely carried out, did or did not result in a loss such as the legislation is dealing with, which I may call for short, a real loss. In my opinion it did not."

Apart from defining the ratio of the Ramsay case, the Burmah case is, in my view, principally of importance for a passage in the speech of Lord Diplock with whose speech Lord Scarman, Lord Roskill and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook agreed. Lord Diplock said, at p. 214:

H "It would be disingenuous to suggest, and dangerous on the part of those who advise on elaborate tax-avoidance schemes to assume, that Ramsay's case did not mark a significant change in the approach adopted by this House in its judicial role to a pre-ordained series of transactions (whether or not they include the achievement of a legitimate commercial end) into which there are inserted steps that have no commercial purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax which in the absence of those particular steps would have been payable. The difference is in approach. It does not necessitate the over-ruling of any earlier decisions of this House; but it does involve recognising that Lord Tomlin's oft-quoted dictum in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1 at p. 19, 'Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be,' tells us little or nothing as to what methods of ordering one's affairs will be recognised by the courts as effective to lessen the tax that would attach to them if business transactions were conducted in a straight-forward way." (Emphasis added.)

This passage is of importance for three reasons: (i) it defines the subject matter to which the significant new approach in Ramsay is to be applied; (ii) it states that the difference in approach does not involve over-ruling any earlier decisions of the House of Lords; (iii) it accepts specifically Lord Tomlin's dictum in the Duke of Westminster case [1936] A.C. 1, 19–20 but states that the new approach does involve recognising that the dictum is silent or at least nearly silent as to its scope or ambit.

As to the first of these matters, the definition goes further than Ramsay because it includes cases where the series of transactions includes the achievement of a legitimate commercial end. It is, however, much more specific than Ramsay for it appears to limit the cases to which the new approach is to be applied to those in which there are: (i) a series of transactions, which (ii) are pre-ordained, and into which (iii) there are inserted steps which have no commercial purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax which, in the absence of those particular steps, would have been payable.

It is important to realise that Lord Diplock was not saying that, given these elements, the tax which the inserted steps are designed to avoid is payable. He was saying only that, given those elements, it is a proper case for the new approach. That approach is one in which one must look for the real loss or gain. In my view, he could not have been going further than I have indicated, for ultimately the question is one of construction of a taxing Act and, previous decisions not being over-ruled, they as well as the Ramsay principle must be applied. He cannot, therefore, have been saying that, given the elements mentioned, the result follows whatever the language.

I now come to Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474, which clearly extended the Ramsay principle. The facts were very different. The transactions were only two in number, were not self-cancelling or circular, and included the achievement of a legitimate commercial end. In essence, those transactions consisted in the transfer from A to B Ltd. of shares in X Ltd. in exchange for shares in B Ltd. and the sale by B Ltd. of the shares in X Ltd. to C. The transactions, as transactions, were, therefore, in essence the same as the transactions here under consideration, although the fiscal advantages sought were different. Here in the two share exchanges the advantage was, as in the Dawson case, sought by the taxpayers themselves by way of tax deferment. In the case of the Crafts Marsh transactions, however, the advantage was a group advantage in the availability of the five companies' free allowances. Although the Dawson transactions were the same, the nature of the operation was markedly different in that case to the operations in the present cases. Lord Brightman described the Dawson operation, at p. 520:

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Parker L.J.

A "There are very full minutes of the board meeting of one of the operating companies and similar minutes exist in the case of the other company. These show that the whole process was planned and executed with faultless precision. The meetings began at 12.45 p.m. on 20 December, at which time the shareholdings of the operating companies were still owned by the Dawsons unaffected by any contract for sale. They ended with the shareholdings in the ownership of Wood Bastow. The minutes do not disclose when the meetings ended, but perhaps it was all over in time for lunch."

B

And Lord Bridge, at p. 518, said that the purpose of the scheme was to ensure that for a "scintilla temporis" the beneficial interest in the shares was held by Greenjacket (B Ltd.). The two transactions were thus carried out within a very short space of time, they were plainly pre-ordained and the purpose of the first was solely to defer payment of tax which would have been payable on a direct sale.

C

I have ventured to say a little about the facts in Dawson before investigating the legal effect of the decision, for it is, in the present appeals, important to bear them in mind. To ascertain the legal effect requires, I fear, an examination in some detail of the speeches delivered by their Lordships. I take them in the order in which they were delivered. Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, who had in the Burmah Oil case identified the ratio of Ramsay, now identified its principle. He said, at p. 512:

D

"The true principle of the decision in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300 was that the fiscal consequences of a preordained series of transactions, intended to operate as such, are generally to be ascertained by considering the result of the series as a whole, and not by dissecting the scheme and considering each individual transaction separately. The principle was stated in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay, at p. 324A-C, especially where his Lordship said: 'For the commissioners considering a particular case it is wrong, and an unnecessary self limitation, to regard themselves as precluded by their own finding that documents or transactions are not 'shams,' from considering what, as evidenced by the documents themselves or by the manifested intentions of the parties, the relevant transaction is. They are not, under the Westminster doctrine [Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1] or any other authority, bound to consider individually each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole.'" (Emphasis added.)

He concluded, at p. 513:

"The series of two transactions in the present case was planned as a single scheme, and I am clearly of opinion that it should be viewed as a whole. The relevant transaction, if I may borrow the expression used by Lord Wilberforce [1982] A.C. 300, 324, consists of the two transactions or stages taken together. It was a disposal by the respondents of the shares in the operating company for cash to Wood Bastow. I would allow the appeals."

The acceptance of the Westminster doctrine is to be noted, as also is Lord Fraser's reference to "the fiscal consequences of a pre-ordained series of transactions, intended to operate as such."

Lord Scarman made some observations which deal with the general approach but also accepted the Westminster principle. He said, at pp. 513–514:

“What has been established with certainty by the House in Ramsay’s case is that the determination of what does, and what does not, constitute unacceptable tax evasion is a subject suited to development by judicial process. The best chart that we have for the way forward appears to me, with great respect to all engaged on the map-making process, to be the words of my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock, in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd. [1982] S.T.C. 30, 32 which my noble and learned friend, Lord Brightman, quotes in his speech (post, p. 521B–C). These words leave space in the law for the principle enunciated by Lord Tomlin in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1, 19 that every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as to diminish the burden of tax. The limits within which this principle is to operate remain to be probed and determined judicially. Difficult though the task may be for judges, it is one which is beyond the power of the blunt instrument of legislation. Whatever a statute may provide, it has to be interpreted and applied by the courts: and ultimately it will prove to be in this area of judge-made law that our elusive journey’s end will be found.”

I pause to observe that I find some difficulty in reconciling this approach with the well-established principle that the subject is only to be taxed by clear words.

By contrast with those who had gone before him Lord Roskill, referring to the Duke of Westminster’s case said, at p. 515:

“1936, a bare half-century ago, cannot be described as part of the Middle Ages but the ghost of the Duke of Westminster and of his transaction, be it noted a single and not a composite transaction, with his gardener and with other members of his staff has haunted the administration of this branch of the law for too long. I confess that I had hoped that that ghost might have found quietude with the decisions in Ramsay and in Burmah. Unhappily it has not. Perhaps the decision of this House in these appeals will now suffice as exorcism.”

Lord Bridge of Harwich appears to have taken the view that the Westminster doctrine is only applicable in the case of a single transaction. He said, at p. 516:

“Of course, the judiciary must never lose sight of the basic premise expressed in the celebrated dictum of Lord Tomlin in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1, 19 that: ‘Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be.’”

He continued, at p. 517:

“The strong dislike expressed by the majority in the Westminster case for what Lord Tomlin described, at p. 19, as ‘a doctrine that the court may ignore the legal position and regard what is called “the substance of the matter,”’ is not in the least surprising when one remembers that the only transaction in question was the duke’s

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Parker L.J.

A covenant in favour of his gardener and the bona fides of that transaction was never for a moment impugned. When one moves, however, from a single transaction to a series of interdependent transactions designed to produce a given result, it is, in my opinion, perfectly legitimate to draw a distinction between the substance and the form of the composite transaction without in any way suggesting that any of the single transactions which make up the whole are other than genuine. This has been the approach of the United States federal courts enabling them to develop a doctrine whereby the tax consequences of the composite transaction are dependent on its substance, not its form. I shall not attempt to review the American authorities, nor do I propose a wholesale importation of the American doctrine in all its ramifications into English law. But I do suggest that the distinction between form and substance is one which can usefully be drawn in determining the tax consequences of composite transactions and one which will help to free the courts from the shackles which have for so long been thought to be imposed upon them by the Westminster case. I shall attempt no exhaustive exposition of all the criteria by which, for the purpose I suggest, form and substance are to be distinguished. Once a basic doctrine of form and substance is accepted, the drawing of precise boundaries will need to be worked out on a case by case basis."

I come finally to the speech of Lord Brightman with which all other members of the Judicial Committee agreed. Having examined in some detail the judgments in Floor v. Davis [1978] Ch. 295 and the judgments both at first instance and in this court in Dawson itself, gently chiding those who delivered them for what appeared to him to be a determination to resist any inroads into the principles of the Duke of Westminster case, he said, at p. 527:

"The formulation by Lord Diplock in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burnmah Oil Co. Ltd. [1982] S.T.C. 30, 33 expresses the limitations of the Ramsay principle. First, there must be a pre-ordained series of transactions; or, if one likes, one single composite transaction. This composite transaction may or may not include the achievement of a legitimate commercial (i.e. business) end. The composite transaction does, in the instant case; it achieved a sale of the shares in the operating companies by the Dawsons to Wood Bastow. It did not in Ramsay. Secondly, there must be steps inserted which have no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax—not 'no business effect.' If those two ingredients exist, the inserted steps are to be disregarded for fiscal purposes. The court must then look at the end result. Precisely how the end result will be taxed will depend on the terms of the taxing statute sought to be applied."

This last quotation, in my view, embodies the limits of the Ramsay principle. The limitations of the principle therein stated are such that, in my view, the Crown must fail in the present cases for in none of them can the ultimate transaction be considered as part of a pre-ordained series. But in my view Dawson leaves many questions unanswered. Taking the last two sentences of the quotation, the question arises as to the consequences of disregarding the share exchanges and land fragmentation for fiscal purposes when the effect of the transactions has already been stated by Parliament to have no immediate fiscal results. What happens when the new holdings are ultimately sold? What would have happened on the land fragmentation in the Bowater appeal if it had resulted in realised development value not offset by the taxpayer company's free allowance? How can one look at the end result and then see how the end result is to be taxed when the terms of the taxing statute do not apply to the real legal result unless the Duke of Westminster case and indeed the four principles are overruled? How does one reconcile the fact that what finally attracted tax, according to the Crown, was the sale to the ultimate purchaser which neither legally, beneficially or in reality was made by the taxpayer? I would find it easier to follow if the result were said to be that the taxpayer lost the advantage of the share exchange or the fragmentation as the case may be, but this would be to give it fiscal consequences not to deny it such consequences. The merit would, however, be that one would not be left in a situation when, in the share cases, the taxpayer has in his hands the new holdings which would attract tax if there were a gain on disposal.

More generally, if it is to remain the case that the subject is chargeable only by statute and only by clear and express words, how can it be right to say that taxing the subject is not suitable to be dealt with by the blunt instrument of statute but must be probed and developed by judicial decision?

All these questions will no doubt be answered by their Lordships when they deal, as it seems inevitable that they will, with appeals from this court. For myself, I am unable to answer them and am thankful that it is unnecessary for me to do so. One way or another it appears to me that the ghost of the pre-Westminster doctrine which that case sought to lay to rest would, if the present appeals are to succeed, have to be resurrected. At present, I am of the clear view (1) that the Crown's contention in these cases is to borrow Lord Tomlin's words "nothing more than an attempt to make a man pay notwithstanding that he has so ordered his affairs that the amount of tax sought from him is not legally claimable;" (2) that to extend the Ramsay principle to the present cases would involve substituting "the uncertain and crooked cord of discretion for the golden and straight metwand of the law;" and (3) that for the commissioners to determine the fiscal end result of a series of transactions and then apply the statute is a process which involves determining that a taxable transaction has occurred before looking at the language of the statute instead of seeing whether any and which words of the statute can fairly be read as applying to what has taken place. Where every step is artificial as in Ramsay and Burmah I find no difficulty in understanding that the statute cannot be read as covering the so-called loss thereby created. Where, as in Dawson, the transactions are conducted so that the first survives only for a "scintilla temporis," I find it less easy to understand but do not need to for I am bound by the decision in the Dawson case. It may be that Dawson can be further extended but I do not think that this court can extend it to cover these cases. The House of Lords can, of course, do so but, as presently advised, I cannot see how it can be done without overruling, at least to some extent, many of their previous decisions.

On the detailed analysis of the facts and all other points I agree with and have nothing to add to the judgments of Slade and Mustill L.JJ. which I have had the opportunity to read in draft.

I too would dismiss the appeals.

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

- A MUSTILL L.J. I also agree that these appeals should be dismissed. A study of the speeches delivered in W. T. Ramsay Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners and Eilbeck v. Rawling [1982] A.C. 300; Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd. (1982) 54 T.C. 200 and Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474 would appear to warrant the following propositions. (1) The fiscal consequences of a transaction or group of transactions are to be determined by applying the words of the taxing statute to the facts of the individual case. If the outcome of the transaction, properly understood, falls within the words of the statute, also properly understood, the appropriate fiscal consequence will follow. Otherwise it will not. (2) When considering the application of the statute to the facts of the individual case the court must view both the language of the statute and the components of the transaction in a broad fiscal perspective, and must not confine itself to the narrower focus which would be appropriate if the purpose was to elucidate and enforce the private rights created by the documents in which the transaction is embodied. (3) Nevertheless, the determining factor will always be the language of the statute. The subject is not to be taxed on the intendment or the equity of the Act. (4) Unless the enactment specifically so provides, a transaction which falls properly into one fiscal category is not to be transferred to another simply because the motive or one of the motives for embarking upon it is to obtain a fiscal advantage. (5) A document is not to be treated as a sham unless it is intended to convey to third parties or the court the appearance of creating between the parties legal rights and obligations different from the actual legal rights and obligations which the parties intend to create. (6) If the transaction under scrutiny consists of a single element the court will look behind the language of the relevant document only for the purpose of considering whether or not it is a sham. If it is not, its fiscal consequences will be ascertained solely by reference to its legal effect. (7) If, however, it is contended that the relationship between the taxpayer and the other relevant parties is of a composite nature consisting of a number of linked transactions, the inquiry does not end at the point when the fact-finding tribunal has concluded that none of the documents which embody the relevant elements can be discarded as a sham. The court must, it is true, recognise that these documents may have lasting legal consequences—in the sense, for example, that they create enforceable contractual rights, or effect a transfer of title, or alter the capital structure of a company. But the process of matching the facts to the words of the statute is not necessarily confined to an examination of these consequences. The fact finding body must also look to see whether there stands behind the legal relationships a unitary business relationship by reference to which the application of the fiscal statute ought to be determined. (8) A business relationship may be regarded as unitary notwithstanding that the performance of all its stages was not assured by contractual obligations already in existence when the first of the steps was put in train. (9) If it is found that the individual elements did together create a unitary business relationship, and if it is necessary to decide what account should be taken of this relationship when applying the taxing statute, it is material to consider whether any of the individual elements which are said to make it up was taken with a view to the avoidance of tax, and without any other business purpose. (10) The question to be considered when applying the last stated proposition is

- C
- D
- E
- F
- G
- H

whether the step in question had a business purpose. The inquiry is not limited to whether it had any enduring business or legal consequence.

The problem raised by the present group of appeals is to determine the breadth of the concept which, in the propositions just stated, has for the moment been indicated by the word "unitary." (I have made use of this word to avoid begging any of the questions which may be raised by concentrating on a single one of the expressions which are found in the reported cases.) Do the principles of Ramsay and Dawson extend to a case where the multiple transactions take the same general shape as was intended when the first step was embarked upon, but where there is an unforeseen interruption in the execution of the series, or where the later stages are carried through in different terms, or with different parties, from what had originally been planned? If the tests for the application of the principle are satisfied, is the outcome in a fiscal sense limited to the disregarding of the steps which have no business purpose, or are there other consequences? What is the status of the steps which are ultimately disregarded, at a time when the plan is in suspense or is being reformulated?

Understandably, much of the argument before this court concentrated on the expression "a pre-ordained series of transactions" and "a single composite transaction," for these and other closely related formulations are stamped with authority by the speeches in the three leading cases. I believe, however, that this direct approach must be adopted with some caution. On one side, there may be an inclination to read the various formulae as if they formed part of the taxing statute itself. Too minute a scrutiny of the bare words may cause their context to be overlooked. Thus, at one stage of the argument, it was proposed that there should be recourse to a dictionary, to ascertain the precise meaning of "pre-ordained." This cannot be the right method. On the other hand, if too much regard is paid to the context, the reader may be led to believe that the new principles apply only to situations on a par with those discussed in Ramsay and Dawson. The speeches delivered in the Dawson case make it plain how misguided this would be. In these circumstances I believe that it is useful to begin by looking at the way in which the law has arrived at its present state, and then going on to consider the practicability of applying one reading rather than another to transactions, different from those under examination in Ramsay and Dawson, which may commonly arise in practice.

Accordingly, I think it appropriate to begin by identifying the steps by which the doctrine has evolved. In Ramsay itself the chain of relevant dealings began at a time when a transaction had already been concluded in "the real world" with consequences which were fiscal as well as contractual: namely, the taxpayers had made a chargeable gain. Nothing in what followed was designed to modify this transaction in any way. Instead, the intention was to conjure up a new situation in which the taxpayers would, without in reality making a gain or suffering a loss, have attributed to them a loss which could for fiscal purposes be set against the existing chargeable gain. Since the two aspects were entirely separate, it was possible for the House of Lords to concentrate on the later dealings (which alone were carried out with tax avoidance in mind), to view them in the round, and to recognise that, because their elements nullified each other, they were entirely sterile in the result, even if possessing transient legal effects when viewed in isolation. This feature made it possible for the House to disregard the second group of

A transactions in their entirety, so far as their fiscal consequences were concerned.

The position in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd., 54 T.C. 200 was in one important respect the same: namely, that before the tax avoidance manoeuvres were set in train there had been anterior transactions with real fiscal as well as contractual consequences. In fact, there had been two such transactions. In one, the taxpayers had realised gains which were assessable for corporation tax. In the other the taxpayer company had suffered a loss in the shape of a bad debt owed by Holdings, which was not allowable against the liability for corporation tax. The difference between this case and Ramsay was that, whereas in the latter the self-cancelling tax avoidance transactions were entirely distinct from the dealing which had brought about the gain, the scheme in Burmah was intended to convert the fiscal outcome of the second anterior transaction from a bad debt owed by Holdings into an allowable loss on the realisation of the taxpayer company's shares in Holdings. Notwithstanding this difference, it was possible to focus on the later group of transactions, and to recognise that, when viewed in the round, they did not lead to any disposal of the real asset—the B.P. shares—or any real loss in the sense contemplated by the statute. The essence of the decision was that the tax avoidance dealing could be disregarded for fiscal purposes: and it is, in my view, significant that Lord Diplock, at p. 215F, referred to the intermediate circular book entries as being “ignored.”

When the House came to consider Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474 it was faced with a very different situation. No longer was there a free standing anterior transaction which could remain intact once the tax avoidance dealings had been stripped away. Instead, the integrated plan had a genuine commercial object: namely, the disposition of the asset by the taxpayer (“A”) and its acquisition by a third party buyer (“C”). The tax avoidance element was introduced, not after the genuine transaction was complete, but by the interpolation into the planned future transaction of a commercially superfluous party, in the shape of Greenjacket Investments Ltd. (“B”). These two elements were knitted together in the scheme, so that the nullification of the artificial tax avoidance aspects, with the consequent exposure of its true fiscal implications, could not be achieved simply by treating the redundant dealings as if they had never occurred: for, if the transfers from A to B, and thence from B to C were ignored, there would be nothing left to bridge the gap between A and C. The process of reasoning in Dawson was therefore different from that of the two earlier cases. Instead of merely subtracting the commercially meaningless steps by ignoring them, the court had to give effect to an additional underlying fiscal reality which was not reflected in the documents actually executed: viz. a direct transfer from A to C, for which the consideration was furnished by C to B, at the request of A. The Dawson case demonstrates that, in what has been called a “linear” as distinct from a “circular” transaction, the court must carry out the following exercise: (i) consider whether all the dealings under scrutiny form part of a single transaction; (ii) consider whether any of the steps have no commercial purpose; (iii) discard those that have no such purpose and (iv) identify what Lord Brightman called the end result of the single transaction. Precisely how the end result is to be taxed will then depend on the terms of the taxing statute which it is sought to apply.

It is against this background of a developing doctrine that the tests formulated in Ramsay and Burmah, and reiterated in Dawson, must properly be understood. In Dawson, as in the other two cases, the documents creating the inserted steps were not a sham. It follows that they did have real legal effects. They created obligations which were enforceable in law, they effected transfers of legal or equitable interests which were valid as against third parties; they brought about real changes in the capital structure of the various companies. Moreover, their nature was such that, at least when considered in isolation, they were capable of having fiscal consequences of their own. Yet they had to co-exist with another underlying transaction which gave rise to different fiscal consequences. This caused no practical problems in the Dawson case. The scheme went through in a short space of time exactly as planned. A precisely specified outcome had been contemplated at the outset, and precisely this outcome had been achieved by the end. No lasting rights were created by the intermediate dealings. Moreover, any fiscal consequences which may have theoretically flowed from these dealings were so transient that they could have caused no problems in practice. Then replacement by the fiscal consequences of taxing A as on a direct transfer to C took place so quickly that the problem of the way in which the dispositions from A to B and B to C should be taxed could never directly arise.

The same ready solution is not, however, available when in timing or execution there is a discontinuity between the stages by which the end result is reached. Here, the earlier steps may possess in the real world fiscal as well as legal consequences of their own, which are not so easily disregarded when the later stages come to be performed. It seems to me that an understanding of the language used in Ramsay, Burmah and Dawson must take account of the apparent tension between the two or more sets of legal and fiscal consequences; and that the words of the speeches should not be read as extending the principle to situations where these consequences cannot genuinely co-exist. By way of illustration, one may take a hypothetical case much pressed in argument. Imagine that the taxpayer, A, envisages that on some future occasion he may wish to dispose of an asset, or engage in some other commercial transaction, with an independent third party, of whose identity he has at present no idea. He recognises that, if the transaction ever does take place, there will be a fiscal advantage if it is channelled through an intermediary, B. Against this contingency he decides to carry out the transaction with B straight away, and does so, with consequences which are reflected by entries in registers of title or shares, and by appropriate debits and credits in the accounts of the two companies. Assume also that the dealing with B has a fiscal consequence so far as A is concerned—whether by way of chargeable gain, or allowable loss, or in some other manner. At this stage, there can be no ground on which the revenue could abstain from assessing, or the taxpayer from paying, the relevant kind of tax by reference to the transaction as actually carried out. Ix hypothesi the transaction is not a sham. Nor, consistently with the principles set out by Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300, 313-314, could the argument for the Crown be carried to the length of suggesting that, in the absence of express statutory warrant, the existence of an ulterior motive could be a ground for taking the transaction fiscally otherwise than at its face value. Unless it falls into an exempted category, the outcome of the transaction will fall to be brought into

A account as loss or gain, or in some other way, when A's overall tax position is computed. Indeed, if the interval of time is long enough, his liability may be actually assessed and paid. Let it now be assumed that, after a substantial interval, A decides to implement the original scheme by causing B to carry out with C a transaction of the type which A had contemplated from the outset. In its argument on the present appeals, the Crown asserted that the Ramsay/Dawson principle requires A to be re-taxed on the basis of a direct disposition from himself to C. But, if this is so, what is to be the fiscal status of the concluded transaction between A and B, and of the crystallised version of A's overall tax position founded upon it? Mr. Sher suggested that the fiscal position might be reconstituted by means of an appeal by one party or the other against the original assessment. But an appeal could succeed only if the original tax return by A and the assessment based on it could properly be treated as erroneous, and apt for correction. Yet there seems no sense in which it is possible to say that the return and assessment were wrong when made, and Mr. Sher was unable to cite any authority in support of the notion that they could be retrospectively invalidated when the transaction with C went through. As an alternative, Mr. Sher suggested that the whole matter could be disentangled by reworking A's accounts for the current and earlier years on the basis that the transaction with B had never taken place, and then by extra-statutory concession giving credit for any tax actually paid in respect of the transaction in earlier years against the assessment which brings into account a notional transfer direct from A to C. With due respect to the resourceful arguments of Mr. Sher, this expedient seems to me only to paper over the intellectual difficulties which arise from trying to force this situation into the mould of a doctrine conceived by the House of Lords in quite different circumstances. The only link between the two dealings is the common fiscal purpose. It is, however, quite plain from the authorities that this alone is not enough. It must also be possible to treat the dealings as part of a single transaction. In the example stated there are, to my mind, two transactions, not one.

F Another example may be given. Imagine that the plan made by A contemplates that the sale by B to C will be made on terms which may be labelled "X." After the transaction between A and B has been completed, a difficulty is encountered, as a result of which it is possible to complete the second stage only if its terms are changed to "Y." If it is held that, in the real world, there is a triangular transaction between A, C and B, what are its terms? The transfer away from A was never on terms "Y"; the transfer to C was never on terms "X." So also if the example is varied to make the breakdown in the plan relate to the identity of the purchase, rather than the terms on which he buys; the essence of the problem is the same.

H I must emphasise that the purpose of these examples—and they are only examples—is not to repeat the argument over double taxation which was disposed of by Lord Brightman in Dawson. The problems arising from the Crown's argument on the present appeals are of a different nature. Still less is there any intention to hint that the clock should be set back to where it was before Ramsay. The principle is firmly established and, if its application within its necessary limits gives rise to problems, these must be solved. It is, however, legitimate to recognise that such limits do exist. The House has entrusted to the courts the task of elaborating this doctrine, which is still in a state of evolution. When considering its thrust and effect, and working out how to apply it in new situations, an examination of the circumstances in which the House has held that it can successfully be applied, and of the practical difficulties of applying it in other circumstances, must surely help to arrive at an understanding of what the speeches were intended to convey. Approaching the matter in this way, I would conclude that the doctrine cannot have been intended to have the wide compass for which the Crown contends. This is indeed the opinion which I would have formed simply by reading the language used by their Lordships in Ramsay [1982] A.C. 300, Burmah, 54 T.C. 200 and Dawson, [1984] A.C. 474 in what would seem to be its natural sense. Given the importance of the issue, it may be permissible to set out at a little length the expressions actually used. Taking the speeches in the order in which they were delivered, we find per Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay: “a nexus or series of transactions” (p. 323H); “a series or combination of transactions, intended to operate as such” (p. 324A); “a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole” (p. 324B); “a composite transaction” (p. 325B); “an indivisible process” (p. 326E); “a [scheme] planned as, a single continuous operation” (p. 326E); and per Lord Fraser of Tullybelton: “each step . . . so closely associated with other steps with which it formed part of a single scheme” (p. 337); “a complete prearranged scheme” (p. 337E); “a complete scheme” (p. 338A); “inter-connected transactions” (per Lord Diplock in Burmah at p. 2149); “[a . . . transaction] planned as a single scheme” from Dawson (per Lord Fraser at p. 513D); “a series of interdependent transactions” (per Lord Bridge of Harwich at p. 517B); “interlocking, interdependent and pre-determined transactions” (per Lord Bridge at p. 517G) and “one single composite transaction” (per Lord Brightman at p. 527c). In view of the weight of argument directed to the precise meaning of “pre-ordained” in the authoritative formulation by Lord Brightman in Dawson at p. 527c, it is important to register that his Lordship treats the expression “a pre-ordained series of transactions” as interchangeable with “one single composite transaction.”

It is, of course, essential to avoid the mistake of confusing a description of the case before the court with a definition of the principle to be applied in future cases, but I confess that, quite apart from the practical considerations already mentioned, I can see nothing in any of the speeches to sustain the Crown’s proposition that the Ramsay principle extends to all cases where an initial step is taken with an ultimate tax advantage in mind, and there is subsequently, after whatever interval and in whatever precise form, another step of the kind originally envisaged.

Against this background I turn to the individual appeals. These have already been discussed in detail by Slade L.J., and I may therefore deal with them very shortly. In each case the start and finish must be the words of the statute. I believe that a valuable touchstone was furnished by Lord Diplock and Lord Fraser of Tullybelton in Burmah when they spoke of “the real” loss and by Lord Scarman when he spoke of the need to determine “where the profit, gain, or loss is really to be found.” Of the three appeals, the Craven v. White cases offer the most scope for debate, since at the time when the first stage of the transaction was carried out a sale by Millor to Jones was on the cards, and such a sale did take place, within a relatively short time span on terms which were, at least as to price, not dissimilar to those originally contemplated.

3 W.L.R.

Craven v. White (C.A.)

Mustill L.J.

A Nevertheless, I cannot find in the events leading up to the sale any ground for holding that “the real disposal” by the taxpayers was to Jones rather than Millor. At the time when the shares ceased to be the property of the taxpayers they were destined for Millor and nowhere else. There was then no formulated plan fixing the identity of the ultimate recipient, or the terms on which the shares would be transferred;
B nor any settled intention on the part of Oriel or Jones that the latter should participate in a triangular dealing such as was revealed by the House of Lords in Dawson. Whatever the precise boundaries of the word “pre-ordained,” it cannot, in my view, be stretched to cover a series of dealings so intermittent in execution and so unformed at the outset. In my judgment, there was not here a single composite transaction or operation, but two distinct transactions, and the fiscal C implications of the two stages ought to be ascertained by reference to the legal effect of the contracts from which they sprang.

I have reached the same conclusion in relation to Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Bowater Property Developments Ltd. As subsequent events demonstrated, there was a hope and an expectation, at the time when the land was transferred to the five companies, but there was in no sense a practical certainty, that an onward sale would be made to Milton D Pipes on the terms negotiated a few months previously by B.U.K.P. In the event, the sale did ultimately go through, but on different terms, and after a lapse of 20 months. This discontinuity must, in my view, rule out any treatment of the dealings as an indivisible whole, or the treatment of the sale by the taxpayer company to its affiliates as if, in a fiscal sense, it had never happened. So far from being pre-ordained, the E transaction might well have never happened at all—or, if it had happened, might have been concluded between different parties, if another buyer had come forward before the change of mind by Milton Pipes.

For my part, I would regard the Baylis v. Gregory cases as the plainest of the three appeals, so far as concerns the issue which is common to all. On 11 March 1974, when the exchange with Holdings F took place, not only was Hawtin not visible on the horizon as a potential purchaser, but there was no sale to anyone presently in contemplation.
For the reasons already stated, I cannot follow how, on any understanding of what was said in the three leading cases, events which occurred nearly two years later could retrospectively convert the share exchange into one element in a composite transaction of which the timing, terms, parties and even existence were at that stage quite unpredictable. Ramsay and G its successors demand that dealings which have none but a fiscal purpose should not be allowed to camouflage an underlying transaction which exists in the real world, but this is no warrant for compressing into a supposed unity two transactions which are in truth distinct. In my judgment the disposal was to Holdings, and to Holdings alone. It is true, as was emphasised in argument, that this opinion carries with it the consequence that an operation performed for reasons of what has been H called “strategic tax planning,” by which the first stage of a linear series of transactions is carried out in isolation in the expectation that it may prove useful in the future, will escape the taxation net if it is followed at some later stage by a dealing of the type envisaged. Certainly, the Ramsay principle is open to elaboration; its frontiers are not yet determined. But I would regard the argument advanced by the Crown as involving not simply an expansion of the principle, but a striking out into a whole new field of judicial legislation in a manner inconsistent with the constraints announced at the time when the doctrine itself was being propounded.

As to the other two issues arising on the appeal from the decision of Vinelott J. I have nothing to add to what has been said by Slade L.J., with whose conclusions I respectfully agree.

For these reasons, therefore, I also would dismiss all these appeals.

Appeals dismissed with costs.

Leave to appeal in Craven v. White cases on terms as to payment of costs and as to repayment of tax already paid with interest.

Leave to appeal refused in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Bowater Property Developments Ltd. and Baylis v. Gregory cases.

16 July. The Appeal Committee of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Ackner and Lord Oliver of Aylmerton) allowed petitions by the Crown in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Bowater Property Developments Ltd. and Baylis v. Gregory for leave to appeal.

A church, built in 1797 following a local Act of Parliament of 1790 which enabled building to be funded by, inter alia, the allotment and sale of pews, had a square nave with 20 rows of pews on each side of the nave aisle. The altar was at the east end of the sanctuary, a long way from the congregation, and there was no room for an altar either in the nave or at the foot or top of the chancel steps. The church fulfilled an important civic function by providing a venue for about eight concerts each year. With the twin objectives of bringing the priest and the choir nearer to the congregation and of improving the arrangements for concerts, proposals were put forward which included the removal of the pews and their replacement by chairs on a circular carpeted area beneath the dome and the introduction of a mobile altar. The proposals having received the approval of a majority of the parochial church council, the team rector and churchwardens petitioned for a faculty to authorise works, inter alia, to remove all the pews from the nave and to concrete and carpet a circular area under the dome and to provide a mobile altar. The petition was opposed by eight parishioners, two of whom, together with a third person who was not a party to the proceedings, claimed rights to occupy certain pews. The chancellor held that the claimants had established rights to use their pews which could not be removed by faculty and that, as those pews could not be taken down, a faculty for the removal and replacement of the pews in the nave must be refused since an arrangement of chairs with three pews in their midst would be untidy and unattractive.

On appeal by the petitioners:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that, as a matter of construction, the Act of 1790 created perpetual rights to the exclusive use, during divine service and other religious observances at times when the church was open for worship, and subject to the regulations of the church, of individual and identifiable pews; that those rights were tied to the geographical locations of the pews as originally sited; that the pews could not be permanently removed without the consent of the owners and the owners' rights could not be destroyed by a faculty; and that, accordingly, a faculty could not be granted authorising the removal of the pews in the nave, as to remove all but three would be absurd (post, pp. 723G—724A, B, C–E).

Per curiam. (i) The listing of a church as a building of special architectural or historic interest pursuant to the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 indicates that a faculty which might affect the special nature of such interest should only be allowed in cases of clearly proved necessity. When a church has received a sum such as £80,000 of public money towards repairs there must be an obligation to consult the Department of the Environment (post, p. 720B-D).

(ii) The Faculty Jurisdiction Rules 1967 require speedy amendment. If proper and informed decisions are to be made in cases where there are valid, concerned and yet conflicting interests, it is vital that the Department of the Environment, the local planning authority and the various voluntary bodies should be able to give their evidence, preferably orally, but if that is impossible, in writing (post, p. 722A-B).

APPEAL from Boydell Q.C., Ch. at the Oxford Consistory Court.

By a petition dated 20 September 1983 the petitioners, the Reverend Ronald Mitchinson, Mr. Jim Church, Mr. William Yarnold and Mr. Jack Billington, the team rector and churchwardens of the parish of Banbury, sought a faculty to authorise, inter alia, (1) the removal of all the pews from the nave of St. Mary's Church and the concreting and carpeting of a circular area beneath the dome of the church; (2) the provision of a mobile altar and platform in the nave to the west of the chancel; (3) the repositioning of the pulpit to a more northerly position in the church; and (4) the removal of the chancel wall and choir stalls. The petition was opposed by eight parishioners, Mr. K. H. Bolton, Mrs. G. M. Jakeman, Mr. C. D. Hone, Mrs. A. Hopcraft, Mr. C. F. Herbert, Mr. John Williamson, Mr. M. S. Hedges and Mrs. E. Palmer. On 21 February 1985 the chancellor, inter alia, refused to authorise the removal of the pews and the provision of a carpeted area beneath the dome and the provision of a mobile altar and platform in the nave. The petitioners appealed against that refusal.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

4 October. SIR JOHN OWEN, DEAN OF THE ARCHES, read the following judgment. On 21 February 1985 Boydell Q.C., Ch. [1986] Fam. 24 gave judgment in the Consistory Court of Oxford. His judgment was a model of clarity of thought and expression and fully revealed his learning and industry. This is an appeal from that part of the judgment which provided that the petitioners, they being the team rector and the

A three churchwardens of the parish of Banbury, should be refused a faculty for (1) the removal of the main block of pews in the nave of St. Mary's Church and for the provision of a circular carpeted area in the nave beneath the dome and consequential work and (2) the provision of a mobile altar and platform in the nave.

B The chancellor found against the petitioners on two main grounds: (1) that two of the parties opponent, namely Mr. Bolton and Mrs. Jakeman, and also a Mr. Strange who was not a party to the proceedings, are entitled, by statutory rights now vested in them but originally created by an Act of Parliament of 1790 (30 Geo. 3, c. 72), to the use in perpetuity [1986] Fam. 24, 37c "during divine service and other religious observances at times when the church is open for worship, subject to the regulations of the church," of enclosed pews in the main block, those pews being of the same nature and in the same position as those constructed in 1797: these rights he found to be not removable by faculty and in practice to be such as to make the whole proposed scheme impractical; and (2) that, even if there had been power to remove such pew rights by faculty, in his discretion he would have found against the petitioners and, even if there had been no established rights to pews as to which there is no doubt, he would probably have refused the faculty on the basis that on a consideration of all the factors relevant the petitioners had not persuaded him that it would be right at this stage to authorise the removal of such pews.

E By their notice of appeal the petitioners raised a number of objections. As a result of the way in which the appeal has been argued it is possible to say that there are two main questions. (1) What are the present pew rights of Mr. Bolton, Mrs. Jakeman and Mr. Strange? (2) If there was a discretion to grant the faculty, was the chancellor right in exercising it against the petitioners?

Boydell Q.C., Ch., in his judgment, dealt with the essential history of the church. It is not necessary for me to repeat all of this. Certain aspects are, however, crucial to a proper consideration of the two questions.

F Under the provisions of the Act of 1790 the existing medieval Banbury parish church was demolished, in part by gunpowder, in that year. The Act was necessary to raise the money required for rebuilding; a main source was to be the sale of pews or seats. Samuel Pepys Cockerell designed the replacement church which was opened, before completion, in 1797. The replacement was completed in 1822 to the further design of his son, Charles Robert Cockerell. The original and completion designs, which included box pews, if not those at present in situ then others of a similar nature and location, have led to the construction of a church which has been described as neo-classical. In 1864 the interior was remodelled by A. W. Blomfield, who added a chancel and may well have had the existing box pews cut down in size. I see no reason to differ from the chancellor's conclusion [1986] Fam. 24, 30H that "The present pews are the pews of 1797 which were remodelled in the 1870s." I also agree with the chancellor that the date of the existing pews is not of great importance in determining whether they should now be removed. It is to be noted that Blomfield, at a time when they were not well-regarded, still retained the box pews. It seems likely that he regarded them as a necessary and integral part of the Cockerells' building.

On 9 April 1952 the church was listed as a building of special architectural or historic interest. It is now listed as a building Grade A. If it were not for the ecclesiastical exemption in section 56(1)(a) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 the effect of this listing would be to make it a criminal offence under section 55 to execute any works to the building which would affect its character as a building of special architectural or historic interest. By section 54(9) of the Act of 1971 "any object or structure fixed to a building . . . shall be treated as part of the building." An argument based solely on this consideration was not developed at the hearing of the appeal and it is sufficient to state that, although the exemption is necessary so that in such cases the dead hand of the past shall not prevent the proper use of a building consecrated to the worship of God, a listing does indicate that a faculty which might affect the special nature of the architectural or historic interest—and certainly the removal of all the pews from this church would do this—should only be allowed in cases of clearly proved necessity.

The faculty jurisdiction must and does treat churches such as St. Mary's, Banbury, as treasures not only for the people of the parish, whether churchgoing or not, not only for the Anglican Church, but also for the country at large. When, as here in 1977-1981, the church has received some £80,000 of public money towards repairs, there must be an obligation to consult the Department of the Environment which it is now clear, although this played no part in the decision of either the chancellor or this court, was at first favourable to the petitioners but subsequently was not. As I shall make it clear, I do not agree with this original, but subsequently changed, attitude.

The arguments used by the petitioners to support the petition are both liturgical and secular. The liturgical argument, as I understand it, is that the priest and choir and congregation should be much closer together than is possible at present and that there should be a central altar around which the priest and congregation should be able to worship together, the priest in a westward facing position and the congregation gathered around and close to the altar. The churchmanship which supports such an approach to worship is perfectly reasonable and by no means uncommon; when, as here, it is desired by the incumbent and the parochial church council it should normally lead to a re-ordering, if there is no listing and if this can be done without necessitating any permanent and irreversible change to the building. Where such a change would be necessitated it will be necessary to balance the claims of the congregation against the claims of conservation.

The secular argument is that the removal of the pews would facilitate the provision of important public musical concerts which have been held in the church, at an average annual rate of eight concerts, for many years but which could more economically, more effectively and more comfortably be provided if the faculty were to be granted and all the pews were to be removed. It is apparent from the team rector's evidence that the plans on which the petition is based came into existence as a result initially of a desire to act in accordance with a recommendation, made by the director of a fund raising campaign in 1977 to raise money for roof repairs, that the work necessary to make it possible to use the church as a top class concert hall should be completed. Whilst this again is an interest to be considered it can only be considered in the light of the undoubted fact that the primary purpose of a church is as a place of worship.

In re St. Mary's (Arches Ct.)

A The Diocesan Advisory Committee report dated 12 September 1983 enthusiastically supported the present proposals. Some might think the language of the report rather extreme and hard to justify. The passage I have in mind states:

B "This unique baroque church, designed by the Cockerells, was more a theatre than a church, though later alterations added a chancel and removed the east section of the four galleries. It was further marred by the huge blocks of pews, cramped and uncomfortable, the boards beneath them were apparently laid on bare earth and are now rotting. We thought Mr. Gotch's plans most commendable, creating a central carpeted space under the dome, with three groups of chairs, restoring the baroque appearance of the church. Cockerell père et fils would surely be delighted by these proposals."

C I merely note that the church is not a baroque church and far from the church being marred by a later addition of pews they were a necessary and integral part of the original Cockerell design.

D At the hearing before the chancellor there was no evidence from the Council for the Care of Churches; this was because no witness could attend on the days fixed for the hearing. Criticism was made of the chancellor because he did not take into account letters written on behalf of the council. Miss Cameron says that, because the council is a body entitled by rule 6(2) of the Faculty Jurisdiction Rules 1967 (S.I. 1967 No. 1002) to appear and give evidence, the chancellor should not have insisted ([1986] Fam. 24, 26) on rejecting the written representations unless the other side agreed to his admitting them, which they did not, but should have received those letters whilst rejecting written representations from the Department of the Environment and the various interested specialist bodies. The chancellor was told that both the Department of the Environment, whose representations he did not see although I have now seen the original letter, and the council, whose representations he did see, changed their attitudes to the proposals—but in different directions from each other—between their earlier and later written submissions. In these circumstances the chancellor decided, at p. 27:

"in the absence of witnesses from those, and the other, bodies whose evidence could be tested it would have been neither just nor helpful to have had regard to their various and diverse written representations."

G Rule 6(1) of the Faculty Jurisdiction Rules 1967 provides that the evidence at the hearing shall, unless the judge otherwise orders, be given orally. At the outset the chancellor made it clear that he would not otherwise order. He was, in my judgment, entitled and correct in the circumstances to exclude the council's written representations. I am able to add that having seen the written representations it seems clear that they would not—even if received in evidence—have affected the chancellor's decision or shaken his acceptance of much of the evidence of Mr. Peter Howell, a distinguished member of both the Victorian Society and the Oxfordshire Architectural and Historical Society, who was called as a witness by one of the parties opponent.

H There was also no evidence from the Department of the Environment or from the Georgian Group, the Oxford Architectural and Historical Society or other such societies. Such evidence would not, under the Rules, have been receivable. The Rules require speedy amendment. If proper and informed decisions are to be made in cases such as this where there are valid, concerned and yet conflicting interests, it is, in my judgment, vital that the Department of the Environment, the local planning authority and the various splendid voluntary bodies should be able to give their evidence preferably orally, but if that is impossible, in writing. Paragraph 191 of the Report of the Faculty Jurisdiction Commission 1984 recommends a change in the Rules which would allow the reception of such evidence. I trust and hope that this change will soon be made.

I now turn to the two questions raised by the notice of appeal.

(1) What are the present rights of pewholders?

It is common ground between the petitioners and the respondent parties opponent that each of the three named pewholders, two of whom are parties whilst the third is not, has good title by succession to whatever initially passed to his or her original predecessor in title.

A convenient starting point for the consideration of the extent of those rights is the proposition that although a right to use a particular seat or pew may have been acquired by a faculty or presumed faculty there is no right at common law to buy or sell a seat or pew. There is no question here of faculty rights. Although the common law is so restricted Parliament is not. Acts of Parliament conferring pew or seat rights have not been uncommon. The two pewholders who are parties opponent claim rights under the Act of 1790. Miss Cameron, for the petitioners, argues that on a proper construction of the Act each pew-right holder is entitled to no more than to be seated for divine services and other religious observances in a position in the church which is no less advantageous in relation to other seats and to the altar than the pew allotted to his or her predecessor in title. If she is right the pew-right holder's property rights can present no absolute bar to the grant of the faculty now sought by the petitioners. Mr. Henty, for the first and second parties opponent, argues that the pewholders are entitled to the use for divine services and other religious observances of their allotted and numbered pews as and where they now are. A faculty cannot overrule a statutory right and it is clear that if Mr. Henty is right the petition must, in all common sense, fail.

Both Miss Cameron and Mr. Henty agree that the Act of 1790 created interests, each in the nature of an easement, and that to ascertain the nature and extent of that right it is necessary to construe the Act. In Brumfitt v. Roberts (1870) L.R. 5 C.P. 224 Bovill C.J., having stated, at p. 232:

"The right in a pew is essentially a right to use it for the services of the church, and, at times when it is open for use, subject to the regulations of the church; and there is no right of access to it or to use it for other purposes or in any other manner"

further stated, at p. 233, that the interest which passed by the statute considered in that case was "not an interest in land, but an interest of a peculiar nature created by the Act of Parliament, and more in the nature of an easement, though there are attached to it incidents of perpetuity of possession which could only be attached to such a right by the power of

3 W.L.R.

In re St. Mary's (Arches Ct.)

- A legislation. The statute has created a special interest in the pews and seats not known to the common law, and such interest exists by force of the statute; . . .”

B On all of this there is agreement. The difference, as I understand it, between the contention of Miss Cameron and that of Mr. Henty is that, whereas Miss Cameron claims that the right is not in an individual geographically fixed pew or seat but in a seat or seats of some kind in an area from which the originally allotted pew and its geographical location may have been excluded, Mr. Henty claims that the pew-rights originally conferred were, as are the present rights, in specific pews, whether similarly constituted or not, in specific permanent, originally allotted locations.

- C Under the description “Allotment of Pews” the Act provides that the trustees:

D “shall allot and appoint to and for the use of each person who shall subscribe ten pounds or upwards towards the expenses of taking down and rebuilding the said church, chancel, and tower, such one pew or seat as shall be sufficient to contain commodiously such subscriber, and his or her family; and the said trustees are hereby directed, at any time or times after such allotments and dispositions of such pews or seats as aforesaid shall have been made to or for the use of the subscribers as aforesaid, to sell and dispose of all or any of the residue of such pews or seats, and allot the same to any person or persons, and in such manner as they shall think fit and proper; and all such pews or seats shall be vested in the said subscribers and purchasers thereof respectively, his and her heirs and assigns, immediately upon the allotting of the same . . .”

The Act further provides:

F “when the pews and seats are allotted or appointed as aforesaid, the said trustees . . . shall cause them to be numbered, and such numbers to be entered in a book, with the names of the persons to whom the pews or seats shall be allotted or appointed; . . . Provided always, that for the better preservation of uniformity in the pews or seats of the said church, no person entitled to any pew or seat therein, shall be permitted to affix any lining thereto, or to paint the same, under a penalty of ten pounds . . .”

G Accordingly, the Act empowered the trustees of the scheme to create pew or seat rights to individual and identifiable pews or seats. It is common ground that the Cockerell design provided for pews such as those which the petitioners now seek to remove and that the original allocations were to pews, i.e., not to movable chairs but to enclosed seats affixed to the floor of the building and “vested” in the purchasers or subscribers.

H I have to gather the effect of the statute by considering it in its entirety. I cannot accept that it was ever contemplated by the original purchasers and subscribers that the rights created by the Act were not tied to the geographical locations of those pews as originally sited. I have no hesitation in finding that the Act, the original trustees and the original subscribers and purchasers contemplated statutory rights to the use on religious occasions of specific fixed numbered pews: the purchasers would not have paid for uncertainly located seats.

Indeed, there being an undoubted right to grant a faculty for the exclusive use of a specific identified pew I see no reason to think that the scheme contemplated by the Act contemplated any less. In this connection Mr. Henty submits that the nature and the extent of the rights created may be appreciated by a consideration of the remedy for interference. Philipps v. Halliday [1891] A.C. 228 is authority for saying that where, by means of a faculty, there is an exclusive right to the use of a numbered pew, the destruction of that pew will entitle the faculty holder to bring an action of disturbance in order to maintain it. I see no reason why the sale of a pew should pass a lesser right.

Miss Cameron argues that the Act could not have contemplated perpetual rights but, in my judgment, the Act did confer perpetual rights just as did the Act considered in Brumfit v. Roberts, L.R. 5 C.P. 224. The use of the term "sale" is only consistent with a perpetual right and so also is the provision that "all such pews or seats shall be vested in the said subscribers and purchasers thereof respectively, his and her heirs and assigns," for before 1822 the only way of creating a fee simple by a direct grant inter vivos was by such a limitation to the grantee and his or her heirs.

I am sure that the chancellor was correct when he held that each existing pew-right is a right to use the existing relevant numbered pew during divine service and other religious observances at times when the church is open for worship, subject to the regulations of the church.

Further, I am satisfied that the pews cannot be permanently removed without the consent of the owners—any other decision would be inconsistent with any form of ownership—and that no faculty may destroy the statutory rights created by the Act. This is sufficient to decide the appeal against the petitioners, for the petition is for a faculty to remove all the pews and to remove all but three would be absurd. I shall, however, also consider the second question.

(2) Assuming a discretion in the chancellor to grant a faculty was he right in exercising it against the petitioners?

Sitting as I now do as the appellate judge I may draw any inferences of fact which might have been drawn by the chancellor. I may give any judgment or direction which the chancellor ought to have given. I may remit the matter with a direction for rehearing and determination by the chancellor's court or I may allow the appeal substituting my own discretion if the chancellor's exercise of discretion was based on an erroneous evaluation of the facts taken as a whole. I intend to take none of these courses since I am satisfied that the chancellor was correct in his decision that even if such discretion had been available to him he would not have exercised his discretion in favour of the petitioners.

I am satisfied that the chancellor gave full and proper weight to the evidence of the team rector, to the almost unanimous support of the parochial church council and to the favourable report of the Diocesan Advisory Committee. These factors are important. They were clearly in the chancellor's mind and were evaluated by him. However, it was necessary also to have in mind the law as stated by Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, in Nickalls v. Briscoe [1892] P. 269, 283:

"The notion that the matter here in question should be decided by the wishes of the majority of the parishioners proceeds, in my opinion, upon an entirely mistaken view of the law. The appellants

3 W.L.R.

In re St. Mary's (Arches Ct.)

- A have put forward their attachment to the old church and its interesting connection with times gone by; but they seem to forget that the sacred edifice has a future as well as a past. It belongs not to any one generation, nor are its interests and condition the exclusive care of those who inhabit the parish at any one period of time. It is in entire conformity with this aspect of the parish church that the law has forbidden any structural alterations to be made in it, save those which are approved by a disinterested authority in the person of the Ordinary, whose deputed discretion and judgment we are here to exercise today."
- B

- C It is accordingly apparent that a chancellor cannot only consider the views, especially liturgical views which are notoriously subject to change, of the incumbent and congregation: he cannot only consider the views of conservationists. He is appointed by law to be a disinterested but informed and committed guardian of all interests and he must consider all relevant factors. Then, bearing in mind that the burden is on those who propose changes (see per Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, in Peek v. Trower (1881) 7 P.D. 21, 27–28), he must decide whether or not there should be a faculty for change.

- D Nothing would be gained by my setting out all the other factors which Boydell Q.C., Ch. rightly took into account in this case. The comfort or discomfort of pews and especially these pews; the aesthetic acceptability of carpeting; the fact that the chancellor has given permissions which will allow the petitioners to construct a permanent platform, which can be used for divine services and for concerts, and to have an altar at the top of the chancel steps; the fact that there are three pewholders whose rights would be gravely affected and others were no doubt all considered by the chancellor but, in my opinion, these are all minor when weighed against the fact that St. Mary's is a building of special architectural and historic interest and the removal of the pews, which were an integral part of the design of the church and which have been there since the church was built, would gravely damage those interests.
- E
- F

- G That and the further fact that there is no clearly proved necessity for change are sufficient to decide the second question against the petitioners, but it will be helpful to add a few general observations which will indicate the attitude of this court to these problems when there is a conflict, as here, between the interests of worship and the interests of conservation. The following principles may act as guidelines. (a) It must never be forgotten that a church is a House of God and a place for worship. It does not belong to conservationists, to the state or to the congregation but to God. (b) In deciding whether to allow a re-ordering the court will not only have in mind the matters listed e.g., by Spafford Ch. in In re Holy Innocents, Fallowfield [1982] Fam. 135, 137–138, but also these other matters: (i) the persons most concerned with the worship in a church are those who worship there regularly although other members of the church may also be concerned. (ii) When a church is listed as a building of special architectural or historic interest a faculty which would affect its character as such should only be granted in wholly exceptional circumstances, those circumstances clearly showing a necessity for such a change. When the faculty rules have been amended it should be possible to add "and should never be granted unless the evidence, oral or written, of every concerned body has been invited, and if tendered, considered." A re-ordering of such a church solely to accommodate liturgical fashion is likely never to justify such a change. (iii) Whether a church is so listed or not a chancellor should always have in mind not only the religious interests but also the aesthetic, architectural and communal interests relevant to the church in question. (iv) Although the faculty jurisdiction must look to the present as well as to the future needs of the worshipping community a change which is permanent and cannot be reversed is particularly to be avoided.
- H

In the circumstances the appeal fails. I shall, if necessary, hear arguments as to costs at a later date.

Appeal dismissed.

Ecclesiastical Law—Faculty—Holy Table—Petition to install large block of sculpted marble as Holy Table—Whether capable of being Holy Table—Whether Holy Table properly described as "altar"—Whether sculpture aesthetically suited to church—Weight to be given to non-expert evidence—Relevance of wishes of non-resident parishioners—Whether faculty to be granted

The rector and a churchwarden of a parish in the City of London petitioned for a faculty authorising the provision of an altar, sculpted by a leading sculptor from a cylindrical piece of marble eight feet in diameter and weighing 10 tons, on a footpace in the centre of the church beneath the dome. The church, designed by Sir Christopher Wren, was oblong with a superstructure supported by 16 slender Corinthian columns and was listed as a building of special architectural or historic interest. The petition was supported by the parochial church council and was unopposed, an appearance being entered by the archdeacon to put the petitioners to proof of their case. Temporary permission was granted for the altar to be introduced into the church, which was undergoing extensive restoration, to enable witnesses and the chancellor to see it in its proposed position. The chancellor dismissed the petition, holding that the altar was not capable of being a Holy Table and that, as a matter of discretion, he would not have granted a faculty because the altar was not congruent with the architecture of the church.

In re St. Stephen's⁸ (Eccl.Ct.)

A On appeal by the petitioners:—
 Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that a Holy Table was no longer illegal merely because it was not movable or because it was made of stone; that a table could be defined as a horizontal surface raised above the ground used for meals and other purposes; and that the subject matter of the petition clearly fell within the wide bounds of what could reasonably be called a Holy Table and would not be unlawful (post, pp. 730D–G, 735D–E, 754E–F, 758E–F).

B (2) That the chancellor's decision that, as a matter of discretion, it would be wrong to allow the permanent introduction of the altar into the church was based on an erroneous evaluation of the evidence; that the opposing views of experts as to the congruence in terms of aesthetic judgment of the altar with the architectural design of the church were of equal weight and validity; that the cumulative weight of opinion in favour of retaining the altar from witnesses who, without special knowledge of Wren's architecture, were nevertheless experienced in matters of aesthetic judgment showed that the presence of the altar would cause very few to be unable to derive as much delight and inspiration from the beauty of the church as they would were the altar not there; that the undisputed and exceptional excellence of the altar as a work of art was a factor of separate and substantial weight in favour of granting a faculty unless there was some sufficient reason for rejecting it; that the chancellor had failed to give proper weight to the wishes of the rector and those who though non-resident parishioners were directly concerned with the care of the church; and that the benefits to be obtained by the grant of a faculty greatly outweighed the fact that some future worshippers and visitors might wish that the altar was not there (post, pp. 735B–C, 743D–E, 746F–H, 748C–D, H—749B, 750B–C, 757A–D, 758E–F).

E Per curiam. (i) A doctrine of the Eucharistic sacrifice which is not that of a repetition of the sacrifice of Calvary can lawfully be held in the Church of England and consequently the Holy Table can lawfully and properly be called an altar (post, pp. 732E, 753F–G, 758E–F).

F (ii) The fact that an ecclesiastical building is listed as a building of special architectural or historic interest is a relevant consideration in deciding whether or not to grant a faculty. But it is not right to say that in such a case a faculty which would affect its character as such should only be granted in circumstances clearly showing a necessity for such change (post, pp. 734G—735A, 752E–F, 758A).

APPEAL from Newsom Q.C., Ch. in the London Consistory Court.

By a petition dated 25 March 1985 the rector of the parish of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, in the City of London, Revd. Prebendary Edward Chad Varah, and the churchwarden of the parish in charge of restoration, Mr. Peter Garth Palumbo, sought a faculty authorising the provision of a travertine stone altar, sculptured by Mr. Henry Moore O.M., set in the space under the dome of the church on a footpace of two steps also in travertine. No appearance was entered in opposition, and, at the request of the consistory court, the Archdeacon of London entered an appearance to put the petitioners to proof of their case. On 20 February 1986 the chancellor dismissed the petition.

The petitioners appealed by notice of appeal dated 30 April 1986 on the grounds that (1) the chancellor erred in law in determining that the Henry Moore altar was incapable in law of constituting "a convenient and decent table of wood, stone or other suitable material . . . for the celebration of the Holy Communion" and was thus outwith Canon F2 of the Canons of the Church of England; (2) further or alternatively, if (which was not admitted) the Henry Moore altar was incapable of constituting a table, the chancellor erred in law in determining that the petition must therefore fail as a matter of law, notwithstanding the continued presence within the church of the altar which had been situated therein since the consecration of the church and incontestably constituted a table within Canon F2; (3) further or alternatively, the chancellor's exercise of his discretion to refuse the faculty was unreasonable where (a) the petition was supported unanimously by the rector, the churchwarden, the parochial church council and the joint patrons of the living, (b) the petition had the support of the archdeacon who entered an appearance solely at the chancellor's request, (c) there was no dispute as to the intrinsic beauty of the Henry Moore altar which was designed specifically for the church, and (d) there was in evidence a very substantial body of expert opinion to the effect that the altar would enhance the church both aesthetically and liturgically; and (4) further or alternatively, the chancellor wrongly declined to grant a faculty permitting the altar to remain in the church for an interim period of three years so that its aesthetic, liturgical and pastoral effect could be evaluated following the restoration of the fabric of the church and its contents and following the resumption of worship therein.

17 February. The following judgments were handed down.

In re St. Stephen's (Eccl.Ct.)

A BISHOP OF CHICHESTER. This is an appeal from a decision given in the London Consistory Court by Newsom Q.C., Ch. on 20 February 1986. By his decision the chancellor refused a faculty for the introduction of a stone altar, carved by Mr. Henry Moore O.M., into the Church of St. Stephen, Walbrook, in the City of London. The petition for a faculty was dated 25 March 1985 and was presented by the Reverend Prebendary Edward Chad Varah, rector of the parish of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and Mr. Peter Garth Palumbo, one of the churchwardens of the parish, with the unanimous support of the parochial church council. No appearance was entered in opposition to the citation but at the request of the chancellor the then Archdeacon of London, the Venerable Francis William Harvey, entered appearance to put the petitioners to proof. The appellants are the rector and Mr. Palumbo. The Court of Ecclesiastical Causes Reserved has asked for an intervention by the archdeacon similar to that in the original hearing. Since the appeal was lodged, however, the Archdeacon of London has died and the Bishop of London, acting under the provisions of section 9 (3) of the Faculty Jurisdiction Measure 1964, has appointed Mr. D. W. Faull to act in his place for the purposes of the appeal.

D Whereas it seems to have been assumed at the outset of the hearing in the consistory court that the matters at issue were architectural and aesthetic, in the course of the hearing questions were raised about the distinction between an altar and a table and the nature of the Eucharist which caused the chancellor to decide that in law he could not grant a faculty for the Henry Moore altar. He has therefore certified in relation to the appeal that the case involved questions of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial, and that brings the appeal to this court rather than to the Arches Court of Canterbury as provided by the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963, section 10.

E

The chancellor, having determined the question of law to his satisfaction, went on to consider whether if he were wrong on that point and had power to allow the introduction of Mr. Moore's sculpture into the church he could correctly exercise his discretion by so doing. His conclusion was that if he had a discretion in law he ought not to exercise it by granting the permanent faculty sought by the petition. He concluded that in such circumstances he ought not to grant a faculty.

F

This case therefore falls into two principal parts. The first concerns the question of what constitutes a Holy Table and involves a consideration of whether the Eucharist or the Lord's Supper is in any sense a sacrifice. The second concerns the suitability of the Henry Moore artefact to be placed in the Church of St. Stephen, Walbrook.

G

As regards the first of these questions it is to be noted that section 45(3) of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963 declares that the present court is not bound by any precedents set by decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in relation to any matter of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial. The background to the passing of that Measure, as evidenced by the reports of the Canon Law Commission 1947, the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission 1954 and the Church and State Commission 1952, shows that there was a widespread desire to free the Church from the binding effects of decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical cases. Most of those decisions had been given in a period of acute theological controversy and there was a desire that they be reviewed in the light of changed circumstances, further historical research into the period of the English

Reformation, and the more recent ecumenical developments in the understanding of Christian doctrine. This court is therefore free to consider the issues afresh, taking account of more recent legislation and of historical and theological knowledge which was not available to the courts in the mid-nineteenth century. The important case of Faulkner v. Litchfield and Stearn (1845) 1 Rob.Eccl. 184, on which the chancellor relied heavily, does not have the same force for us as he felt it to have for him.

The decision as to what is and what is not a Holy Table is in the first place affected by the Holy Table Measure 1964 and Canon F2 of the Canons of the Church of England passed in consequence of that Measure. Section 1 of the Measure provided that the Holy Table "may be either movable or immovable and may be made of wood, stone or other material suitable for the purpose for which the Table is to be used." The Measure of 1964 was repealed by the Church of England (Worship and Doctrine) Measure 1974 leaving the question governed by Canon F2 which requires that "in every church and chapel a convenient and decent table, of wood, stone, or other suitable material, shall be provided for the celebration of the Holy Communion."

The Canon does not refer explicitly to the question of movability but we hold that the chancellor was correct in saying [1986] 3 W.L.R. 790, 796:

"I do not think that the Canon should be construed, following as it does the Measure of 1964, so as to restore the restriction on immovability removed by the Measure. It follows that a Holy Table is no longer illegal merely because it is not movable, or because it is made of stone."

I did not find it easy to follow the philosophical argument put forward by counsel for the archdeacon concerning the concept of "tableness." I find myself in sympathy with Dr. Johnson's definition of a table as "A horizontal surface raised above the ground, used for meals and other purposes," and I prefer this to the definition in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary on which the chancellor relied, at p. 797, which described a table as "An article of furniture consisting of a flat top of wood, stone, or other solid material, supported on legs or on a central pillar, and used to place things on for various purposes . . ."

Such a definition would exclude those many Holy Tables in English churches and cathedrals which resemble rather more a tomb chest or a sideboard. I have no doubt that the Henry Moore altar falls within the wide bounds of what can reasonably be called a Holy Table.

Before finishing with this part of the case attention must, however, be given to the chancellor's view that there is a fundamental difference between a table and an altar and that the Henry Moore artefact has more the character of an altar and is therefore illegal. I do not think that great weight should be attached in this respect to the words of the rector quoted by the chancellor in his judgment, at p. 794. They are somewhat confused, capable of differing interpretations, and it is not at all clear how much attention Mr. Moore himself paid to them. In my view, I must attend rather to the chancellor's own words where he said at p. 795:

3 W.L.R.

In re St. Stephen's (Eccl.Ct.)

Bishop of Chichester

- A "The distinction between 'altar' and 'table,' when the words are correctly used, is in itself essential and deeply founded, since 'altar' signifies a place where a sacrifice is to be made, a repetition at every Mass of the sacrifice of our Lord at Calvary. This was the view of the Mass as held in the unreformed Church of England immediately before the Reformation, whatever may have been the case in the earliest ages of the Church. The reformers took the other view, viz., that the Holy Communion was not a renewed sacrifice of our Lord, but a feast to be celebrated at the Lord's table."
- B

It is not clear whether the words "as held in the unreformed Church of England" are intended to mean the popular religion which prevailed in the unreformed Church of England or the official teaching of that Church. Again, the phrase "the reformers took the other view" either limits the Reformation to a short period of time or assumes a uniformity of outlook among the "reformers" which makes no allowance for their differences. What the chancellor says about the pulling down of the medieval altars and the substitution of wooden tables in the period following the publication of the Prayer Book of 1552 is correct, but he greatly oversimplifies the doctrinal questions which lay behind this and does not appear to take account of the long period of development between the Prayer Book of 1552 and that of 1662.

- D
- E The chancellor's argument appears to be as follows. To call the Holy Table an altar means that it is a place of sacrifice, and to speak of sacrifice in relation to the Eucharist means "a repetition at every Mass of the sacrifice of our Lord at Calvary." But no Anglican theologian of whatever churchmanship would maintain that the celebration of the Eucharist is a repetition of the sacrifice of Calvary and it is highly improbable that any Roman Catholic would do so either. Even at the time of the Reformation Bishop Gardiner of Winchester, defending the traditional faith against Cranmer, wrote:

- F "The oblation and sacrifice of our Saviour Christ was, and is, a perfect work, once consummate in perfection without necessity of reiteration, as it was never taught to be reiterate, but a mere blasphemy to presuppose it." (See: Stone, Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist (1909), vol. ii, p. 151).

- G In the 1662 Communion Office the first of the two prayers after the distribution of the Holy Communion refers to "this our sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving" and behind that lies the Latin liturgical phrase sacrificium laudis.

In 1897 the Archbishops of Canterbury and York in their formal response to the condemnation of Anglican Orders by Pope Leo XIII expounded the Anglican Communion rite, and in particular the prayer just quoted, as follows:

- H "we think it sufficient in the Liturgy which we use in celebrating the holy Eucharist,—while lifting up our hearts to the Lord, and when now consecrating the gifts already offered that they may become to us the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ,—to signify the sacrifice which is offered at that point of the service in such terms as these. We continue a perpetual memory of the precious death of Christ, who is our Advocate with the Father and the propitiation for our sins, according to His precept, until His coming again. For first we offer the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; then next we plead and represent before the Father the sacrifice of the cross, and by it we confidently entreat remission of sins and all other benefits of the Lord's Passion for all the whole Church; and lastly we offer the sacrifice of ourselves to the Creator of all things which we have already signified by the oblations of His creatures. This whole action, in which the people has necessarily to take its part with the Priest, we are accustomed to call the Eucharistic sacrifice." ("Answer of the Archbishops of England to the Apostolic Letter of Pope Leo XIII on English Ordinations," paragraph XI.)

Such words could be paralleled by quotations from a long line of Anglican divines from the 16th century to the present day as well as by the Agreed Statement on the Eucharist of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission, recently approved by the General Synod as consonant in substance with the doctrine of the Church of England. Further evidence concerning this part of the case was supplied to this court by counsel for the petitioners in the affidavit of the Reverend Dr. Douglas Geoffrey Rowell and has been most helpful. An affidavit on the subject of sacrifice by the Reverend Dr. Ulrich Simon was also supplied by counsel for the archdeacon. I note that Dr. Simon says that he had read Dr. Rowell's affidavit and that he would not dispute the historical evidence which Dr. Rowell gives. I note also that Dr. Simon says

"I do not think myself that at even the most superstitious time before the Reformation any Christian, except a madman, could have conceived of the altar as a place of real immolation."

It is clear, in my view, that a doctrine of the Eucharistic sacrifice which is not that of a repetition of the sacrifice of Calvary can lawfully be held in the Church of England and consequently that the Holy Table can lawfully and properly be called an altar. I leave the last word on this to Lancelot Andrewes, Bishop, successively, of Chichester, Ely and Winchester, in the reign of James I:

"If we agree about the matter of Sacrifice, there will be no difference about the Altar. The Holy Eucharist being considered as a Sacrifice (in the representation of the Breaking the Bread and pouring forth the Cup), the same is fitly called an Altar; which again is as fitly called a Table, the Eucharist being considered as a Sacrament, which is nothing else but a distribution and an application of the Sacrifice to the several receivers. The same Saint Augustine that in the place alleged doth term it an Altar saith in another place, Christus quotidie pascit. Mensa Ipsius est illa in medio constituta. Quid causae est, o audientes, ut mensam videatis, et ad epulas non accedatis? The same Nyssen in the place cited, with one breath calleth it θυσιαστηριον, that is an Altar, and ιερα τραπηζα that is, the Holy Table. Which is agreeable also to the Scriptures; for the Altar, in the Old Testament, is by Malachi called Mensa Domini. And of the Table, in the New Testament, by the Apostle it is said, Habemus Altare. Which, of what matter it be,—whether of stone, as Nyssen, or of wood, as Optatus,—it skills not. So that the matter of Altars makes no difference in the face of our Church." (From "Two Answers to Cardinal Perron," quoted in More and Cross, Anglicanism (1935), p. 497.)

I conclude that the chancellor misdirected himself as to the question

Bishop of Chichester

A of law and I must therefore go on to examine the second part of his judgment in which he stated that if he had a discretion in law he ought not to exercise it by granting the permanent faculty sought by the petition.

B The correct approach to the question was laid down by this court in In re St. Michael and All Angels, Great Torrington [1985] Fam. 81 following a dictum of Sir Henry Willink Q.C., Dean of the Arches, in In re St. Edburga's, Abberton [1962] P. 10, 15. That approach has also been adopted in a case involving purely aesthetic consideration in In re St. Paul's, Jarrow (unreported), 15 May 1984. That was an appeal to the Chancery Court of York against the refusal of Garth Moore Ch. in the Durham Consistory Court to grant a faculty for the introduction of a stained glass window. The judgment of the Auditor, Owen Q.C., is not binding on this court but we have found it useful as a guide in dealing with an appeal against an aesthetic decision. He said:

C "The general rule governing appeals of this kind is well established and is that I may allow the appeal by substituting my own discretion for that of the chancellor if I am satisfied that the discretion of the chancellor was exercised on an erroneous evaluation of the facts taken as a whole."

D These last words are not entirely consistent with the Auditor's statement that he takes comfort from the fact "that this appeal is mainly concerned with aesthetics, where the chancellor's tastes will have no greater validity than my own." In fact, as the judgment shows, his decision was not based simply on his aesthetic liking of the proposed window but on a careful evaluation of the evidence produced for and against it. This evidence consisted of the opinions of the Diocesan Advisory Committee and the Council for the Care of Churches which were against the proposal and a body of witnesses expert and of authority in the realms of stained glass and of Anglo-Saxon art and architecture. The Auditor found the arguments of the Diocesan Advisory Committee and the Council for the Care of Churches serious but not convincing and was persuaded by the evidence of the experts to grant the faculty.

E In the present case when the London Diocesan Advisory Committee formally considered the proposal for the Henry Moore altar and recorded a vote it was equally divided, there being seven votes in favour and seven against. The chairman then gave his casting vote against. There appears to be no record of any expression of opinion by the Council for the Care of Churches, though evidence was given against the proposal by Mr. J. A. Newman, a member of that council and chairman of its conservation committee and also a member of the Georgian Group. The chancellor clearly considered that the weightiest evidence against was that of Mr. Ashley Barker and I agree with the chancellor. I have studied carefully Mr. Barker's written submission and the chancellor's notes on his examination. His evidence was presented with care and modesty and with an obvious readiness to be convinced that the Moore altar would be right in St. Stephen's. He was not, however, so convinced. His argument is almost entirely concerned with the geometry of the church and the interference which in his view the proposed altar would cause to that geometry. I note, however, that at the end of his submission Mr. Barker says:

"I recognise that the considerations which I have attempted to set out are not the whole of the issue. . . . They are not offered, as is sometimes the case with such evidence, out of a passionate belief that they must at all costs prevail, but as matters of architectural opinion which deserve to be given due weight."

A

I note also that among those giving evidence against the petition there was a general recognition of the importance of Henry Moore's altar as a work of art and a desire that it should find a place in some church. The principal exception to this was Mr. Newman who alone among all the witnesses said that he regarded the Moore altar as a second-rate work.

B

When we turn to the evidence submitted on behalf of the petitioners we find a similar mixture of architectural experts and general practitioners, the latter including Sir Roy Strong and Sir Derman Christopherson who was until recently chairman of the Royal Fine Arts Commission. The principal witnesses whose evidence matches that of Mr. Ashley Barker were Mr. Robert Potter and Professor Kerry Downes. Mr. Potter has been responsible for the professional care of St. Stephen's Church since 1972 and in charge of the extensive restoration of the building which has been going on for many years and is now nearing completion. Professor Downes is a leading authority on Sir Christopher Wren. He has studied Wren and his school for 35 years and published a number of books on the subject including two on Wren himself. This adds special weight to the concluding paragraph of his evidence in which he says:

"The petition is for the introduction of a very special liturgical fitting into a very special church. It is for the placing of a beautiful object, of beautiful material, fashioned by the leading sculptor of his time and of 20th century Britain, in the position for which it was commissioned and which the sculptor took fully into consideration when he designed the altar. This proposal is not merely more imaginative, but simply better, than any addition to any Wren church during the last 40 years and perhaps a great deal longer."

It is a matter for some concern that in his judgment the chancellor only mentions Mr. Potter twice and not in the context of expert evidence and that he dismisses the evidence of Professor Downes in one sentence. Counsel for the petitioners suggested that the chancellor took a dislike to the Henry Moore altar at an early stage and to the witnesses who supported it. This received some support from the chancellor's notes supplied to this court. Counsel's further submission that the chancellor was unduly swayed by the geometrical evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker is borne out by the unbalanced nature of that part of the judgment which deals with the evidence of witnesses.

F

G

Our attention was directed to a recent judgment by Sir John Owen, Dean of the Arches, in an appeal from a judgment by Boydell Q.C., Ch. in In re St. Mary's, Banbury [1987] 3 W.L.R. 717. Towards the end of his judgment the Dean of the Arches laid down certain principles to act as guidelines for courts in relation to petitions for faculties to enable alterations to churches which are listed buildings. One of those guidelines is stated as follows, at p. 725H:

H

"(ii) When a church is listed as a building of special architectural or historic interest a faculty which would affect its character as such should only be granted in wholly exceptional circumstances, those circumstances clearly showing a necessity for such a change."

It has been pointed out to us that the Dean of the Arches has here gone

Bishop of Chichester

A further than is the case in the secular field: see Circular No. 23/77 issued by the Department of the Environment entitled "Historic Buildings and Conservation Areas—Policy and Procedure." Certainly this court is not bound by so strict a rule and, in my view, should not consider itself so bound.

B All the members of this court have visited St. Stephen's, Walbrook, where the Henry Moore altar is at present in place in accordance with a temporary permission granted by the chancellor. There are difficulties in the way of gaining an accurate impression of what the altar will look like when the restoration is complete. Altogether there are many things, including the seating, the lighting and the ornaments, which will affect the general appearance and require a further faculty petition or petitions. As regards the question immediately before us, however, the chancellor did, in my view, make an erroneous evaluation of the evidence submitted to him, and a faculty should be issued in accordance with the petition presented on 25 March 1985 by the Reverend Prebendary Edward Chad Varah and Mr. Peter Garth Palumbo.

C The court can consider and permit only the work specified in the petition. It is noted that the Royal Fine Arts Commission prefers Caen stone to travertine for the footpace and that is also the view of Mr. Potter. It will be necessary for application to be made for a further faculty to permit Caen stone and it is hoped that this application will not be opposed.

E SIR RALPH GIBSON. For the reasons given by the Lord Bishop of Chichester, I agree that there is no obstacle in law to the installation in St. Stephen's, Walbrook, of the Henry Moore altar. I agree also that on the evidence before him the chancellor went wrong in the exercise of his discretion in refusing to allow the introduction of the altar into this church. My reasons are as follows.

F The history of the case and a description of the facts appear from the judgment of the chancellor [1986] 3 W.L.R. 790. I shall not repeat them. The chancellor held that the root of the case was the question whether it was possible to justify the introduction into this church, which is a work of great geometrical precision, of an artefact which is very large absolutely and relatively to the building; which is in a "totally different idiom;" and which, with its footpace and circle of seats, would become the "dominant feature of the inside of the church."

G The chancellor directed himself that in law the onus lay on the petitioners to satisfy him that he ought to exercise discretion in their favour: see Peek v. Trower (1881) 7 P.D. 21 where Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, said, at p. 27, that the burden is cast on those who propose changes. He reviewed very briefly the witnesses called by the petitioners and concluded that the whole of that evidence, considering it "strictly," failed to satisfy him that the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker, a witness called by counsel for the archdeacon, who was opposed on "architectural" grounds to the introduction of the altar into this church, was "wrong." Therefore, "on the technical evidence" the petitioners had failed to make out their case and the petition must be dismissed. The conclusion of the chancellor was not in terms that he, as a matter of his aesthetic judgment, agreed with that of Mr. Ashley Barker, or found it more convincing; but that, since the petitioners had failed to show that the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker was wrong, and had failed to prove any separate grounds for the grant of the faculty which could override the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker, such as a need for the Henry Moore sculpture in historical grounds, the petitioners must fail since the burden of proof in law was on them.

It is necessary to set out the substance of the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker, which is the view of the Chancellor: the petitioners had failed to show to be wrong, and to set that evidence in the context of the other evidence. It is the case of a speech in a passage in his written proof part of which is set out in the judgment and which I shall set out in full:

It is my opinion that to place a circular altar in the centre of this space is to make a false resolution in favour of the centralised plan against the essential interpretation and so obscure Wren's intentions. The plan of the old weaving plans with the intersecting alleys under the dome we notice: (i) that there is a negative rather than a positive event at this point—i.e. two open alleys and open vistas crossing, thus allowing a continued view in each direction; and (ii) that there is no indication of the domed or circular form at this level. This begins only above the entablature of the Corinthian order. The essence of the lower space in which we stand is square.

The presence of the great solid form of the proposed altar under the domed centre would be to create an expectation of symmetry all about it by blocking the longitudinal and cross axes and establishing a false centre—reflecting each incident axis in turn—which, in my contention, cannot have been the architect's intention. My personal note made at the time of the Diocesan Advisory Committee discussions reads: 'It is open to question whether the return to a circular centre beneath the dome would not render Wren's interaction between cross-plan and domed-plan pointless by resolving drama in favour of the circular motif—so that the tension is released and the whole architectural drama rendered noise.' For this reason I take the view that the proposal does not comply with the test set down [in 1884] by the Grocer's Company which I made my starting point: that of respect for the intention of the great master.

In addition the Chancellor cited a passage from the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker in cross-examination to the following effect:

The numerical geometry is at the heart of [Sir Christopher Wren's design]. This balance is at the heart of classical architecture. What has made the building admired, even when the detail was inauspicious, is the underlying geometry. To Wren, the natural beauty of architecture was from geometry. Having now seen the altar, I think what I have said in [the written proof cited above] is right.

Apart from Mr. Ashley Barker the witnesses called for the archdeacon were Mr. Michael John Gillingham, F.S.A., and Mr. John Arthur Newman, who both testified in favour of installing the altar. The matter was considered by the Diocesan Advisory Committee and it was said in evidence that he had not changed his view. He had found the views of both sides—those for and those against—to be worthy of respect and he was in favour because of the historical interest and the architectural merits. He was concerned, however, that the alterations of installing the altar would in practice make it

3 W.L.R.

Sir Ralph Gibson

A impossible to remove it even if a change in liturgical fashion should make removal desirable to those using the church.

Mr. Gillingham had been for many years a member of the Diocesan Advisory Committee and was an expert dealer in Chinese works of art. His proof contained the statement:

B "The plan of St. Stephen's is intentionally to create a tension between the longitudinal, Latin-cross arrangement of the ground plan . . . and the central upward emphasis of the dome. This tension would be lost if the eye were to be captured by a central altar."

C Mr. Newman is a senior lecturer at the Courtauld Institute of Art where since 1967 he has taught the history of British architecture. He has been a member of the Historic Buildings Council from 1977 to 1985 and thereafter of the successor body, the Historic Buildings Advisory Committee of English Heritage. He is a member of the Council for the Care of Churches and of the Georgian Group. It was his opinion that the altar would cause an unacceptable visual and historical disruption of the interior of the church which is a uniquely important example of Wren's architecture. Using terms more emphatic than those of Mr. Ashley Barker he said that the altar would do "drastic violence" to the church and that the "fundamental geometry" of Wren's design would no longer "still be there." This witness alone expressed the view that the altar was in itself a second-rate work because, unlike other objects made by Henry Moore, it was "compromised by being designed for use."

E The chancellor reviewed some of the petitioners' witnesses to assess the weight of their evidence against that of Mr. Ashley Barker. I shall take them in turn, first stating the substance of the evidence given by each witness and then the comment on the evidence of that witness by the chancellor. The witnesses had praised the altar as a work of art. Mr. Palumbo, in particular, contended that, at the highest levels of excellence, styles from different ages can live together harmoniously. The chancellor commented that he would like to believe that proposition to be a universal law but "some limit" must be put to it and the answer must depend on congruity. The Revd. Peter Delaney, who had trained at the Royal College of Art as a graphic designer specialising in stained glass and was a member of the Diocesan Advisory Committee, gave evidence that

G "the placing of the circular altar directly under the dome will strengthen the feeling of space and engage those who visit and worship around it in Wren's original intention of a community under the dome. . . . the Moore altar will sit comfortably on specially constructed steps in proportion to both dome and altar. . . . the axis of the building is controlled by the dome and pillars and is centrally placed and the simplicity of the circular Moore altar relates directly in form and texture to the classical pillars and ceiling and yet retains a contrast in its bulk form to the detail of the rest of the building. By its very complementary nature it will emphasise the simplicity of form of the Wren interior."

H The chancellor's comment on his evidence was that it added nothing significant to that of Professor Kerry Downes. Mr. Delaney had also spoken of "creative embellishment." The chancellor's comment was that Mr. Ashley Baker had replied to the effect that "where there is the sort of creative order that there is in this building it is difficult to envisage 'creative embellishment' at all."

Sir Roy Strong, the director of the Victoria and Albert Museum since 1974, a member of the Cathedrals Advisory Council, and adviser to Westminster Abbey and to St. Paul's Cathedral, a member of the Arts Council and a churchwarden in Herefordshire, had given evidence that in his opinion the altar would "give the church what it had always needed—a central altar . . . The subtlety of line, the beauty of the marble and the care taken to relate it to the building in terms of both of the axes and the pillars make it an impressive focus of worship and an enhancement of Wren's building."

The chancellor acknowledged that this evidence was weighty, coming from so considerable an authority, but observed that in cross-examination Sir Roy Strong had agreed that he was not an authority on Wren, and the chancellor continued,

"I find it a little difficult to understand how the building can always have 'needed' a central altar when Sir Christopher Wren was designing it for the liturgical practice of his day and thought of it as an 'auditory,' so that the pulpit and not the altar needed the most important place."

The Revd. Canon David Bishop, A.R.I.B.A., a qualified architect and custos of Norwich Cathedral, fellow of the Royal Society of Arts, and chairman of the Norwich Diocesan Advisory Committee for the care of churches and art in churches, gave his opinion in evidence that the altar was "correct in scale and proportions in relation to the building. . . . in a sense contrasting with the classical orderliness . . . in its own way is every bit as disciplined as the church and speaks to us of a 20th century approach to worship."

He added that when the church

"is empty of worshippers, others will continue to come in, and will be fed by the visual and tactile impressions that they receive from this building and its contents. The new altar will say many things to them, not all of them by any means expressible in words, but to limit the understanding to the easily expressible is to limit understanding indeed."

The chancellor observed of this witness that in cross-examination he had said that he thought the altar to be of a "comely" size and "severely practical." The chancellor found it difficult to think that the altar, eight feet in diameter, was "severely practical" and he contrasted the view of Mr. Newman, a witness for the archdeacon, that the footpace and surrounding circles of chairs would be "a tremendously dominant ensemble."

It was, in the view of the chancellor, Professor Kerry Downes who, on behalf of the petitioners, dealt "most cogently," with the architectural issues. Professor Downes is professor of the history of art in the University of Reading. He has taught the history of European classical architecture for many years. The work of Sir Christopher Wren has been his special study for 35 years and he has published several books on that

A subject. In a written proof he considered the history of the church (by reference to the evidence of Mr. Robert Potter, the architect supervising the work of repair and restoration to the church) and the history of liturgy and architecture. There was attached to the proof an appendix of seven pages containing analyses of the design and geometry of St.
Stephen's by nine different writers starting with Godwin and Britton,
B The Churches of London (1839), including the passage from Nikolaus Pevsner, An Outline of European Architecture (1945) and ending with the passage from Margaret Whinney's book Wren (1971). His opinion was that, of the approximately 50 churches in London and Westminster designed by Wren, St. Stephen's is more consistently regular and more geometrical than any other. In form it is the nearest Wren came to the total symmetry of the Greek cross with a central dome. In his view:

C "Many factors contribute to the perceived beauty of the interior, including its simple lines, the proportions of its parts, the emphasis on right angles in plan and elevations, the distribution of lighting, the bilateral symmetry about the west-east axis, the shape of the dome, the detailing of the capitals, mouldings and the unusually rich plasterwork of the dome. One factor is indeed the ambiguity D between different readings of the interior, centralised or basilican, square based or circle based, axial or radial. The elements themselves are clearly seen and clearly located, but the ways in which they are related are complex and changeable."

E In his written evidence Professor Downes had defined the way in which he used the words "reading" and "ambiguity." He said that by "reading" he meant the understanding and interpretation by the intellect of the various perceptions that we accept and interpret as our experience of a building, both as a whole and as the sum of the parts. By "ambiguity" he meant

F "the possibility or even the inevitability of a particular group of components being readable in more than one way with differing senses. . . . An example of architectural ambiguity that will be known to many people is the plan of Hawksmoor's church at Spitalfields, with its side entrances reinstated. Here what at first sight may seem to be a long basilican church can also be read as a series of concentric rectangles set out around two axes, that of the portico and altar and that of the north and south doors."

H "St. Stephen's has long since lost the box pews which occupied the beholder's foreground and which Wren had in mind when he designed the high pedestals to his columns. This loss is the more significant because the division of the pews by aisles clearly marked the two axes intersecting under the centre of the dome. . . . The original reading is thus now a matter of imagination, and any interpretation we make of what we see must be different from the original. . . . But the proposed altar would not only be in accord with the geometry of Wren's design. The altar itself is an artefact of high quality of design, workmanship and material, rare in the City churches nowadays. Today as in the past the clergy make the justifiable claim that the Christian message is maintained and proclaimed not only through liturgy and teaching but also during all the hours that churches are open through the buildings themselves and their contents. It is not possible to quantify the results, but every churchman and indeed every committed layman must know of individual cases of persons who entered a church for the music or the works of art and came away with the germ of what religious writers call a conversion."

Professor Downes considered in his proof the evidence of Mr. Gillingham, mentioned above, to the effect that "tension" would be lost if the eye were to be captured by a central altar, and commented that tension is something quite different from ambiguity. He knew of no evidence that Wren intended to create a tension in this plan or any other, and he pointed to the fact that the idea is not to be found in any of the analyses set out in his appendix. All those analyses agree that the ground plan should not be read as merely "a longitudinal Latin cross arrangement." The reading of the dome as having "central upward emphasis" is simplistic because the dome also reads downwards and concentrically and the light proceeds downwards from the lantern and the surrounding windows. If the immediate impression of St. Stephen's is one of great simplicity and lucidity, the analyses appended nevertheless show the complexity of the means by which this impression is made. Finally, since the altar is only 3 feet 5 inches high it is hard to see how it can "capture" an adult eye to the exclusion of other things, even from a sitting position. Professor Downes concluded as follows:

There was also before the chancellor the evidence of Mr. Robert James Potter, F.R.I.B.A., F.S.A., the architect who has had the professional care of St. Stephen's since 1972, who devised and supervised the work of structural repair, and who has been concerned with the designs for the proposed installation of the Henry Moore altar in the church. Mr. Potter has been the surveyor to the fabric of Chichester Cathedral for the past 25 years and of St. Paul's Cathedral from 1978 to December 1984. His opinion was that the proposal would have commended itself to Wren and that "Wren's most beautiful dome [could] play its part as the canopy to the liturgical focus of the building without detriment to its architecture."

The chancellor made no reference to the substance of the evidence of Professor Downes nor did he carry out any express examination or assessment of it. He made no reference at all to the evidence of Mr. Potter. Of course the chancellor had all this evidence in mind in weighing the evidence as a whole. The consequence of the absence of any express discussion of the evidence of Professor Downes and Mr. Potter is that we do not know why it had, in the chancellor's judgment, either less or no more weight than that which he gave to the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker, or what it was in the evidence of Professor Downes which was "wrong" when compared with that of Mr. Ashley Barker, or in what sense the petitioners had failed to make out a case on "technical" evidence.

In re St. Stephen's (Ecc'l.Ct.)

Sir Ralph Gibson

A Before coming to the criticisms of the judgment of the chancellor put forward on behalf of the petitioners it is necessary to mention some other points, which were dealt with by the chancellor in his judgment, and which further explain his reasoning; in his view they all pointed in the same direction. I shall set them out in brief summary. (1) The chancellor paid "great attention" to the fact that Henry Moore had designed this altar for this place in this church but, like any artist, Mr.

B Moore must be influenced by the terms of his commission which was to produce a circular altar. The chancellor added, "It is its character as a circular altar about which Mr. Ashley Barker has expressed doubts." (2) The chancellor noted that the problem in the case was primarily architectural and Mr. Ashley Barker's evidence was a careful architectural analysis. If a central altar of the shape, size and character of the Henry

C Moore altar had "great pastoral merits to recommend it" the court could allow those merits to prevail but, in his view, no such pastoral case was made out. No thought had been given over some 20 years to any other form of Holy Table more conformable to current liturgical ideas. (3) The petitioners had failed to persuade the Diocesan Advisory Committee to recommend the proposal: the vote in that committee had been eight against and seven for the proposal. (4) The proposal of the petitioners

D had the unanimous support of the parochial church council and in most cases the consistory court tries to give effect to the views of the parishioners but "this is not an ordinary parish." Apart from the inhabitants of the Mansion House the rector knew only one resident. The rector had done over 30 years a great work, especially as founder of the Samaritans, but "the sacred edifice has a future as well as a past. It

E belongs not to any one generation . . ." (per Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, in Nickalls v. Briscoe [1892] P. 269, 283). (5) Lastly, if in later years it should be desired to remove the altar from the church then the difficulties in law and practice of effecting a sale pursuant to a faculty (see In re St. Gregory's, Tredington [1972] Fam. 236), and in making a hole in the wall of the church for physical removal of the altar, would be such that the arrangement proposed would "in practice be

F reversible only with great difficulty, trouble and expense." This consideration lent support to the chancellor's conclusion and "alone . . . might perhaps . . . have been decisive."

On behalf of the petitioners Mr. Boydell submitted that this case was an unusual and special case concerned with the purpose of the petitioners to install in a great City church, by means of the efforts and generosity of those having the immediate care of the church, a work of art made by

G an English artist universally recognised as a great artist. It must be right, he submitted, for the Church to encourage such efforts and generosity by accepting what is offered and for the law to allow that acceptance unless there is some sufficient reason to require rejection. Mr. Boydell invited this court to set aside the order of the chancellor, notwithstanding the fact that the order was made by him after he had heard the witnesses and in the exercise of his discretion on a matter of aesthetic judgment, on the ground that the chancellor had acted on an erroneous evaluation of the facts.

H

Mr. Boydell submitted that (1) the chancellor was demonstrably out of sympathy with the form of artistic expression typified by the altar and with the evidence of those who expressed their admiration for such form; (2) the chancellor was unduly swayed by the assertions of Mr.

Ashley Barker that the altar is not congruent with the architectural design of Wren and in particular with the "numerical geometry" of that design; (3) the chancellor failed to allow proper weight to the evidence of those who regard the altar as not only in accord with the geometry of Wren's design but as in itself a great piece of work by a great sculptor, in short, something of exceptional excellence; and (4) the evaluation of the evidence by the chancellor did not at any point depend on his having seen and heard the witnesses, who are all accepted as entirely sincere and credible; and, therefore, this court, being in as good a position as the chancellor to evaluate the evidence, should conclude that the petitioners had clearly made out their case for the grant of the faculty sought by them.

In reply Mr. Spencer Maurice disputed each of these points. The intrinsic beauty of the altar was, he said, nothing to the point. The chancellor was right to conclude that the Henry Moore altar would "interfere with" the architecture of Wren's church. On the issue of architectural congruity the only views which were of any significance were of those witnesses who had expert knowledge and understanding of Wren's architecture. Mr. Potter's view that the dome would make a "canopy to the liturgical focus of the building" was no more than a bald statement. Only Mr. Ashley Barker had explained in detail the basis of his opinion in architectural terms.

Mr. Lloyd-Davies, who followed Mr. Spencer Maurice on behalf of the archdeacon, pursued this last point in detail in support of the submission that, of the expert evidence, the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker was more considered, analytical and authenticated in describing what Wren had achieved in his design for St. Stephen's, the background geometry of that design and the impact on that design of the installing of the Henry Moore altar. He contended that in contrast the evidence of Professor Downes was generalised, lacking in explanation, without understanding of what Wren was doing, and adversely affected by a tendency to cloud the architectural issue with literary and philosophical concepts.

In conclusion it was submitted by Mr. Spencer Maurice that there was no ground on which this court could properly interfere with the decision of the chancellor who, it was said, had correctly identified the issues, properly weighed the evidence and concluded as he did because no liturgical need had been shown to justify interference with the architecture of this church.

Mr. Spencer Maurice relied also on a new point which does not appear in the chancellor's judgment and for which reliance is placed on a decision of Sir John Owen, as Dean of the Arches Court of Canterbury, in a case decided after the chancellor gave judgment in this case. The point is concerned with the effect of the listing of this church as a building of special architectural and historic interest. For reasons which I shall explain at the end of the judgment, I consider that this point has no separate force on the facts of this case.

The proper attitude of this court when asked to interfere with the exercise of a discretion by a diocesan chancellor in faculty proceedings was laid down by this court in In re St. Michael and All Angels, Great Torrington [1985] Fam. 81, 85-86, where Sir Hugh Forbes, giving the unanimous judgment of the court, adopted and applied the statement of the law by Sir Henry Willink Q.C., Dean of the Arches, in In re St. Edburga's, Abberton [1962] P. 10, 15:

3 W.L.R.

In re St. Stephen's (Ecc'l.Ct.)

Sir Ralph Gibson

A “Counsel were in agreement that the attitude of this court should correspond with that adopted by the Court of Appeal and I accept this as correct. What this attitude should be has been quite recently described with the highest authority by the House of Lords in B Benmax v. Austin Motor Co. Ltd. [1955] A.C. 370. It will differ according to the circumstances of the case. For example, it will be strongly affected in favour of upholding the judgment of the trial judge where his decision is based upon the credibility of witnesses whom he has seen. But in the circumstances of this appeal the proper attitude for the court is thus defined by Lord Reid [at
p. 376]: ‘. . . in cases where there is no question of the credibility or reliability of any witness, and in cases where the point in dispute is C the proper inference to be drawn from proved facts, an appeal court is generally in as good a position to evaluate the evidence as the trial judge, and ought not to shrink from that task, though it ought, of course, to give weight to his opinion.’ Elsewhere in the speeches in that case a distinction is drawn between the finding of primary facts and their evaluation when so found. A faculty case gives rise to the exercise of discretion, but if it appears to this court that the discretion of the chancellor has been based upon an erroneous D evaluation of the facts taken as a whole, it is within the jurisdiction of this court to allow an appeal.”

For reasons which are set out below, and with great respect to a most learned and experienced chancellor, I find that the main submission for the petitioners, namely, that the chancellor's decision was based on an erroneous evaluation of the facts, is made out.

E The decision of the chancellor rested, as I have said, on two main points: first, as a matter of law the onus lay on the petitioners to satisfy him that his discretion ought to be exercised in their favour; and, secondly, the evidence called on behalf of the petitioners taken as a whole was not such as to show that Mr. Ashley Barker was “wrong” in his opposition to the altar on architectural grounds. The chancellor F regarded that opposition as resting on technical evidence.

As to the first point, Mr. Boydell did not question the principle set out in the judgment of Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, in the Arches Court of Canterbury in Peek v. Trower, 7 P.D. 21, 27, cited by the chancellor. That case was also concerned with a Wren church in the City, that of St. Mary-at-Hill. The chancellor of London, Dr. Tristram, G had granted a faculty for making changes in the internal arrangements and furnishings of the church including the lowering of the pews and the refixing of the backs of the pews so as to make them more comfortable.
The faculty had been sought by the rector and churchwardens and the plans for the proposed alterations had been approved by the vestry. The granting of the faculty was opposed by Sir Henry Peek, a parishioner H who held the alternate patronage of the rectory, and, in his opposition, he was supported by a large number of ratepayers on grounds which included contentions that the alterations were wholly unnecessary having regard to the comfort and convenience of the parishioners and were not in harmony with the architectural design of the church which was restored by Wren. Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, stated the principle, at pp. 27–28:

“Two widely different principles present themselves. The court might say this: If some of the parishioners desire this change, and there is a fund out of which it may be made without placing a burden on others, then, unless those who oppose it can show that it will work mischief, that it will impair the capacity, the fitness, or the convenience of the church for the purposes of public worship, it ought to receive the sanction of the court. The objection to such a principle of decision is that it would open the door wide to all capricious changes—would give no heed to those feelings of attachment and regard with which tradition and long time are apt to invest old churches in the eyes of those whose families have sometimes worshipped for generations in the same spot, under the same roof, and with the same surroundings. There are in these matters, as in most others of the kind, two classes of people—those who are prone to believe that all changes must be improvements and those who love the things that be, and who regard all changes, though they may be improvements, with reluctance and the vigilance of a jealous eye. To give unlimited indulgence to the caprices or whims of the one class would be to wound without need the feelings of the other. And then come questions of architectural beauty and the endless controversies of taste, which, though always subordinate to utility, have a fair place in the controversy when utility is not in question. A principle of decision such as I am now discussing would make short work of all these. On the other hand, the court might say this: All presumption is to be made in favour of things as they stand. If you and others propose to alter them, the burden is cast upon you to show that you will make things better than they are—that the church will be more convenient, more fit for the accommodation of the parishioners who worship there, more suitable, more appropriate, or more adequate to its purposes than it was before; and if you cannot show this to the court, at least show the court that a majority of those for whose worship the church exists desires the alterations which you propose. And this is, I think, the language which in substance the court ought to hold. The burden of proof does, I think, properly devolve upon those who propose a change, and unless that proof is clear and manifest as to the benefits to be obtained by such change, the court ought to be satisfied that there is a general desire on the part of the parishioners, or at least of the actual worshippers being parishioners, that the change should be made. In the present case all proof of this general desire is not only wanting, but such proof as the court has before it is in the opposite direction.”

It seems to me that the principle there expressed is right and I am content to apply it to this case.

As to the second point, namely, that the petitioners had failed to show that the opinion of Mr. Ashley Barker was wrong, it seems to me that the chancellor was in error in his approach to the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker and as to the nature of the difference of opinion between him and Professor Downes. I have difficulty in understanding in what sense the opinion of Mr. Ashley Barker could have been shown to be “wrong,” or why the difference of opinion between him and Professor Downes was seen as “technical.” At the hearing it was not suggested that the witnesses on either side who were experts in architecture had gone wrong on any issue of ascertainable fact or that either side had left out of account any principle or factor by reference to which aesthetic judgment should be exercised in this context.

3 W.L.R.

In re St. Stephen's (Ecl.Ct.)

Sir Ralph Gibson

A I have considered the detailed note of the cross-examination of Professor Downes and of Mr. Ashley Barker having regard to the submission made by counsel for the archdeacon that the evidence of Mr.
Ashley Barker was in some sense more convincing in terms of expert argument. Professor Downes answered questions about the placing of a B central altar in St. Stephen's and the use of central altars in other particular churches; about the proper definition of a "classical" and "neo-classical" church; about the rightness of "creative embellishment" of a church such as St. Stephen's and the difference between embellishing a building which is used and embellishing a work of art such as a picture which is not in that sense used; about his use of the word "ambiguity" in the reading of a building such as St. Stephen's; as to why in his view the C Henry Moore altar in its place beneath the dome is not "overwhelming;" as to the need in this church for a "sense of the centre" which nevertheless did not require the centre to be empty; about "congruity" existing in the eye of the beholder who comes, however, with a whole range of expectations, enthusiasms and prejudices; and as to the absence of any difficulty in getting the market price for the Henry Moore altar so as to make practical the removing of the altar if there should be a D change of heart in the future about having it. There was no suggestion to Professor Downes that in forming and expressing his opinion that the altar was in accord with the geometry of Wren's design he had gone wrong in any technical sense whether by leaving out of account any matter of importance or by misapprehending the design or its geometry in any way. The question put to him was to this effect: "Would it not be E wrong aesthetically to depart so far from any plan which Wren could possibly have imagined?" His reply was:

"[Wren] made new solutions to new and old problems. St. Stephen's is a new solution to the problem of what Wren called an 'auditory.'
As a practising member of the Church of England, he would say they have changed it all round, but that is church-going and not architecture. The intention here is not merely to accommodate F liturgical change but to do something very remarkable for this building and for God. The chosen sculpture is on the same level as Wren. The intention is to do something artistic which accords with the spirit of Wren's building . . ."

G I have set out the nature of this cross-examination in some detail because it shows, in my view, that the contest between the opinion of Professor Downes and that of Mr. Ashley Barker was conducted and explored in terms of aesthetic judgment and not at any point on the basis that either was or could be shown to be right or wrong on any matter of technical analysis or understanding. The chancellor, however, appears to have regarded the issue of geometry as "essential" and "crucial:" he recorded these comments in his note against passages in H the evidence of Mr. Ashley Barker. It seems to me that Mr. Ashley Barker's references to the "numerical geometry" as being at the heart of Wren's design were explanations of his own informed understanding of and delight in Wren's work and of his respectful but firm dislike of the presence in Wren's church of Moore's altar. He acknowledged, of course, that the fundamental geometry of the church would be the same if the altar should remain but in his view the altar would bring little advantage to the church or the church to the altar. The answers in cross-examination of Mr. Ashley Barker were consistent, moderate and well reasoned but those answers, together with his evidence as a whole, provided no basis in my view for a judicial conclusion that the differences in aesthetic preference between Mr. Ashley Barker and Professor Downes were concerned with issues of technical rightness or wrongness or that the opinion of either on the issue of congruity could be shown to be right or wrong in any relevant sense.

It is my view that, on what the chancellor saw as primarily an architectural problem, the evidence of Professor Downes, of Mr. Potter and of Canon Bishop—the first an acknowledged expert in the work of Wren and the other two architects of long experience with reference to church buildings—was in all respects at least of equal weight and force to that of Mr. Ashley Barker, of Mr. Gillingham and of Mr. Newman. The differences between them were, as Mr. Ashley Barker acknowledged at one point in his evidence, matters of taste. I have considered the detailed submission of Mr. Lloyd-Davies to the effect that the evidence of Professor Downes was demonstrably inferior to that of Mr. Ashley Barker as “generalised” or “lacking in explanation,” etc., and I reject it. Professor Downes was in my view as careful in his architectural analysis and as mindful of and understanding of the geometry of Wren’s design as was Mr. Ashley Barker. The position on the evidence, with reference to congruity, therefore, was that there were two opposing views each carefully considered and argued as to the congruence in terms of aesthetic judgment of the Henry Moore altar with the architectural design of Wren’s church. I have referred to the evidence of Professor Downes, of Mr. Potter and of Canon Bishop being, in my view, of at least equal weight to the contrary opinion of Mr. Ashley Barker, of Mr. Gillingham and of Mr. Newman. I have formed, as I am sure have the other members of this court, my own opinion on the aesthetic merits of the opposing arguments. We all viewed the altar in its place in the church where the work of restoration is far from complete. The view of the altar in its relationship to the rest of the church was impaired by the presence of scaffolding. To me the altar, on the first view of it, seemed large and to an extent dominating. After some time spent in the church looking at the altar from different points of view that impression of a dominating effect was for me entirely gone. I do not think it necessary or useful to try to explain in detail my individual views of the merits of the arguments on aesthetic congruence. On the basis that the opinion of Professor Downes is of at least equal weight and validity to the contrary opinion of Mr. Ashley Barker on the issue of congruence the petitioners have, in my judgment, made out a clear case for the grant of the faculty which they seek. There are benefits to be obtained by the grant of the faculty which, in my view, greatly outweigh the fact that some who worship in the church and who visit it out of artistic or architectural interest will in the future share the aesthetic preference of Mr. Ashley Barker and wish that the Henry Moore altar was not there.

Mention must be made at this point of the relevance of expert understanding of Wren’s work. It was part of the submissions of counsel for the archdeacon on this appeal that the only views which were of significance were those of witnesses who had expert knowledge and understanding of Wren’s architecture. It seems to me that the chancellor in substance accepted that proposition. I have discussed already his reference to the technical evidence. In addition he appears to have

that he was not an authority on Wren. In my view, counsel's proposition is incomplete. In a case of this nature the evidence of those with expert knowledge of Wren's architecture was essential to enable the court and the other witnesses to understand the nature of the building in question and the subtlety and beauty of its design. The knowledge and training of B the experts enable them to see aspects of the proposals which may escape the observation of those who are not expert and to express their view with precision and with the help of historical allusion. Their learning and experience improve their ability to detect what in their own liking and disliking, or in that of others, may be attributable to fashion or personal preference rather than to the application of more enduring criteria of judgment. But when their expert knowledge has been C deployed and their separate and opposing aesthetic judgments explained it seems to me that the reasoned opinions of men and women of experience in matters of aesthetic judgment but of no special skill or authority on the architecture of the building are of value, provided that their opinions, and the reasons they give for holding them, withstand scrutiny in the light of the evidence of the experts. Most of those who will worship in this church or who will visit it out of aesthetic or artistic D interest will have no special expertise in the architecture of Wren.

In my judgment, the chancellor was in error in his assessment of the weight and importance of the evidence of those who, without being expert in the architecture of Wren, supported the installation of the Henry Moore altar in this church. Apart from the evidence of Sir Roy Strong, to which I have referred, I would mention the evidence of Sir Derman Christopherson F.R.S., and of Lady Morse. The chancellor did not refer to these witnesses and it is clear from his notes that, having formed the view that the main issue in this part of the case turned on technical evidence, he regarded their evidence as of no significance. Sir Derman Christopherson was the master of Magdalene College, Cambridge, from 1979 to 1985. Magdalene College is joint patron of St.
Stephen's with the Grocers Company. He is one of the churchwardens
E of the church. He was from 1979 to 1985 chairman of the Royal Fine Art Commission. His opinion was that the altar was appropriate to the size of the space in which it was to form the focus within the church; and that it would be appropriate for this work of Henry Moore to be placed in St. Stephen's in its resurrected form since Moore is the artist who will be seen by future generations as the recorder in his shelter drawings of the underground life of London during the blitz in the last war. Lady Morse has been a churchwarden at St. Stephen's since 1982.
She has no artistic qualification but is a registered tourist guide for the City of London and has an informed liking for and interest in the fine buildings of the City. In her written proof she gave her reasons for her opinion that the altar is suited to the church and, as representative of the parochial church council, she expressed the desire of all those who F are actively involved with St. Stephen's for the altar to remain in the church. The evidence of these witnesses is, in my view, of value and importance and their opinions are not shown to be ill-founded by reference to the evidence of those more expert.
G
H

It is convenient at this point to mention some additional evidence which was admitted in this court on the application of the petitioners.
Sir Derman Christopherson gave his evidence personally and not on behalf of the Royal Fine Art Commission of which he had been chairman. The additional evidence is that of the Right Honourable Norman St. John Stevas M.P. who was appointed chairman of the Royal Fine Art Commission in 1985. By the terms of its charter the commission is charged "to inquire into questions of public amenity and/or of artistic importance." For reasons which do not matter there was no opportunity for the commission to form an opinion concerning the placing of the Henry Moore altar in St. Stephen's prior to the hearing before the chancellor. At its meeting of 12 March 1986 the commission resolved to support the proposal and concluded that "the Henry Moore altar was a particularly fine piece of sculpture by one of our greatest contemporary sculptors, which complements the space created by Wren beneath the dome and is wholly congruent with the building."

I think it probable that if this evidence had been before the chancellor he would have been impressed by the cumulative weight of opinion in favour of the retention of the altar in this church from witnesses who, without special knowledge of Wren's architecture, are nevertheless experienced in and concerned about matters of aesthetic judgment. The whole of this evidence shows, in my view, that in all probability the presence of the Moore altar in St. Stephen's will cause very few indeed, whether worshippers in the church or visitors, to be unable to derive as much delight and inspiration from the beauty of Wren's church as they would get if the altar were not there.

I turn next to consider what benefit or positive good will on the evidence be achieved by keeping the Henry Moore altar in its place beneath Wren's dome in St. Stephen's. Mr. Boydell submitted, and I accept, that the chancellor appears to have failed to allow due weight to what I regard on the evidence as the undisputed and exceptional excellence of the altar as a work of art. I have noted the one piece of evidence, that of Mr. Newman, in which the altar was described as "a second-rate work." All the other evidence on both sides acknowledged its excellence. In his submission to the chancellor and before us Mr. Spencer Maurice expressly acknowledged that the altar is universally recognised as a great work of art. The chancellor said that he had paid great attention to the fact that Henry Moore had designed the altar for this place in this church. The court was told that Henry Moore saw a full-sized fibre glass model of the altar in its intended position. The chancellor said that he accepted without reservation that the altar was beautiful and that he need not further discuss that part of the evidence. His comment on the fact that this was a beautiful sculpture by a sculptor of outstanding eminence was that the altar was round because he had been commissioned to produce a round altar and it was its character as a round altar that had caused Mr. Ashley Barker to express his doubts about it. In my view, this is to allow too little weight to what Mr. Boydell rightly described as exceptional excellence. I see force in the points made by witnesses called for the petitioners to the effect that the presence in the church of such an artefact is likely to "say things" both to worshippers and to visitors to the church and that the Christian message may be proclaimed not only through liturgy and teaching but also through the buildings and their contents. It seems to me that the undisputed and exceptional excellence of the altar as a work of art is a factor of separate and substantial weight which should properly have disposed the chancellor to grant a faculty for its installation in the

A church unless there was some sufficient reason for rejecting it. I agree that if the evidence, when properly assessed, was found to support the view that the altar was damagingly incongruous to the design of the church, which had been designed by another artist of outstanding eminence, then sufficient reason would be made out for rejecting it. For the reasons set out above, however, the evidence on architectural congruity was at its highest no more than evenly balanced and it did not, in my view, constitute sufficient reason for rejecting the faculty.

I turn now to the chancellor's treatment of the wishes of the rector and of the parishioners. The chancellor formed the view that no case on pastoral grounds had been made out such as to outweigh the adverse view of Mr. Ashley Barker on architectural grounds; and, further, that the wishes of the parishioners, expressed by the unanimous support of the parochial church council for the application, could not prevail having regard to that adverse view. I have on this part of the case also reached a different conclusion.

The chancellor, of course, acknowledged the principle that in most cases the consistory court tries to give effect to the views of the parishioners. That principle was considered in the case mentioned by the chancellor, Nickalls v. Briscoe [1892] P. 269, where opponents to a faculty for the installation of a stained glass memorial window in the chancel of a church appealed against the grant of such a faculty by the Rochester Consistory Court. Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, in the Arches Court of Canterbury, in dismissing the appeal, said, at pp. 282-283:

"It is said that the majority in the parish object to the proposed alteration. I will assume that this was established by the evidence for the purpose of argument; but it constitutes no answer to the present application. The notion that the matter here in question should be decided by the wishes of the majority of the parishioners proceeds, in my opinion, upon an entirely mistaken view of the law. The appellants have put forward their attachment to the old church and its interesting connection with times gone by; but they seem to forget that the sacred edifice has a future as well as a past. It belongs not to any one generation, nor are its interests and condition the exclusive care of those who inhabit the parish at any one period of time. It is in entire conformity with this aspect of the parish church that the law has forbidden any structural alterations to be made to it, save those which are approved by a disinterested authority in the person of the Ordinary, whose deputed discretion and judgment we are here to exercise today. That the grant or refusal of a faculty is a matter which lies in the judicial discretion of the bishop, the learned counsel for the appellants do not deny; but if a majority of parishioners is to settle the question, what, it may be asked, becomes of this discretion? I am far from saying that the wishes of the parishioners have no place in that balance of opposing considerations which is involved in the exercise of a judicial discretion—but the weight to be given to them depends upon many and various circumstances. In the first place, the opinions of the parish, to be of much value, should be opinions formed in relation to the proposed alteration itself and its effect on the convenience or beauty of the church, and not, as in the present case, upon the motives or objects of those who propose it. A divided opinion, moreover, reduces its value very much. Is the proposed alteration an improvement? Does it render the edifice more commodious or more fit for its purposes? Or, if not this, does it add to its architectural beauty or suitable decoration? If the proposed alteration cannot be supported upon any of these grounds, those who propose it should at least be able to assert that it is supported by a very general desire on the part of the parishioners."

The chancellor, as noted above, with reference to the views of the parishioners as expressed by the unanimous support of the parochial church council said that he must bear in mind that this is "not an ordinary parish" because there is only one resident and the parish is a "very limited constituency" which depended greatly on the present rector, Prebendary Chad Varah. In my view, the chancellor gave too little weight to the purpose and wishes of the rector and of those who as non-resident parishioners are directly concerned with and responsible for this great church of Sir Christopher Wren. The principle which accords importance to the views of the parishioners is not, in my view, limited in its application to the familiar parish, where most of those who worship in and accept responsibility for the care of a church live within the parish boundaries, but is to be applied also to those who care for and worship in a City church such as St. Stephen's. The principle, as it seems to me, recognises the importance of the commitment of parishioners to their church and the value to the church of encouraging and supporting that commitment by giving a positive response to their pastoral work and efforts when such a response is justifiable. Prebendary Chad Varah has been rector for over 30 years and is much loved. He has, as the chancellor acknowledged, done a great work especially as founder of the Samaritans. He has been supported throughout in his desire to install this altar in the church by members of the parochial church council who have supported also his aim of creating a special pastoral role in the City for this church when fully restored. I see nothing in the evidence to require or to justify the setting aside of the wishes of the rector and parishioners of St. Stephen's that the Henry Moore altar be permitted to remain in their church. No physical change will be made to the fabric designed by Wren which is now close to full restoration. If hereafter those who worship in the church should wish to remove the altar for some good reasons, the removal will in probability be possible by the means of selling the altar in the market as a work of art by an artist of world-wide reputation. The altar itself is a work of exceptional artistic excellence. Opinions will differ as to the aesthetic congruence of the altar with Wren's design. Those who will find the altar congruent will find delight in the church and in the altar together. For those who will find the altar incongruous in the church there will remain delight in Wren's design and I see little reason to think that for them their delight need be much reduced.

I turn now to the new point raised by Mr. Spencer Maurice with reference to the status of the church as a listed building. The argument is based on the judgment of Sir John Owen, as Dean of the Arches Court of Canterbury, in In re St. Mary's, Banbury [1987] 3 W.L.R. 717, given on 4 October 1986. In that case Mr. Boydell, as chancellor of the Oxford Consistory Court, had refused a faculty for the removal of the main block of pews in the nave of the church, for the provision of a circular carpeted area in the nave beneath the dome, and for the provision of a mobile altar and platform in the nave. St. Mary's Church is listed as a building Grade A. By section 55(1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 if a person executes or causes to be executed any works for the demolition of a

A listed building or for its alteration or extension in any manner which would affect its character as a building of special architectural or historical interest, and the works are not authorised under Part IV of that Act, he is guilty of a criminal offence. Works for demolition of a listed building or for its alteration or extension are authorised under the Act only if the local planning authority or the Secretary of State for the Environment have granted written consent. By section 56(3) [as amended by the Local

B Government Planning and Land Act 1980, Schedule 15, paragraph 8] in considering whether to grant permission for development which affects a listed building or its setting, and in considering whether to grant listed building consent for any works, the local planning authority or the Secretary of State is required to have special regard to the desirability of preserving the building or its setting or any features of special architectural

C or historic interest which it possesses.

Those special provisions, however, relating to works to a listed building, by reason of the ecclesiastical exemption contained in section 56(1) of the Act, do not apply to an ecclesiastical building which is for the time being used for ecclesiastical purposes. Sir John Owen, Dean of the Arches, expressed his view of those provisions in the context of the faculty jurisdiction, at p. 720A-D:

D “[The church] is now listed as a building Grade A. If it were not for the ecclesiastical exemption in section 56(1)(a) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 the effect of this listing would be to make it a criminal offence under section 55 to execute any works to the building which would affect its character as a building of special architectural or historic interest. By section 54(9) of the Act of 1971 ‘any object or structure fixed to a building . . . shall be treated as part of the building.’ An argument based solely on this consideration was

E not developed at the hearing of the appeal and it is sufficient to state that, although the exemption is necessary so that in such cases the dead hand of the past shall not prevent the proper use of a building consecrated to the worship of God, a listing does indicate that a faculty which might affect the special nature of the architectural or historic interest—and certainly the removal of all the pews from this church would do this—should only be allowed in cases of clearly

F proved necessity. The faculty jurisdiction must and does treat churches such as St. Mary’s, Banbury, as treasures not only for the people of the parish, whether churchgoing or not, not only for the Anglican church, but also for the country at large.”

G Later in his judgment, in dealing with the principles applicable when a conflict arises between the interests of worship and the interests of conservation, Sir John Owen, Dean of the Arches, said, with reference to the status of the church as a listed building, at p. 725H:

H “When a church is listed . . . a faculty which would affect its character as such should only be granted in wholly exceptional circumstances, those circumstances clearly showing a necessity for such a change.”

Mr. Spencer Maurice invited this court to follow and to apply the principles there stated by Sir John Owen, Dean of the Arches. St. Stephen’s, Walbrook, is also listed as a building Grade A. The retention of the Henry Moore altar would, he submitted, by reason of its size and of the great difficulty in removing it amount to works for the alteration of the church in a manner which would affect its character as a building of special architectural or historic interest. Even if the evidence for the petitioners should be accepted in full there would be no evidence of "proved necessity" for the installation and retention of the altar and on this ground alone the appeal should be dismissed. When asked what meaning was to be given to the concept of "necessity" in this context beyond work required for the preservation of the building within the limits of financial capacity Mr. Spencer Maurice submitted that it could extend to liturgical necessity, i.e. to works necessary to permit the use of the church in the manner lawfully desired by the rector and parishioners. He drew attention to the fact that, as the chancellor had observed, the celebration of Holy Communion in the midst of the congregation at the central point beneath the dome could be carried out by means of a movable altar which could be taken away after the service so as to leave the appearance of the interior of the church unimpaired.

I do not accept this submission. The ecclesiastical exemption contained in section 55 of the Act of 1971 could have imposed on the courts exercising the faculty jurisdiction a restriction in the form stated by Sir John Owen, Dean of the Arches, but Parliament did not do so and I see no reason to impose it by judicial decision. I respectfully agree with the approach to the matter of listed ecclesiastical buildings which I understand to have been adopted by the Dean of the Arches in his judgment, namely, that in exempting ecclesiastical buildings from the provisions of the Act of 1971 Parliament relied on the care and responsibility of the ecclesiastical authorities, including those exercising the faculty jurisdiction, to ensure that churches of special architectural or historic interest are as fully protected in the interest of the general public as are secular buildings in the secular context. The principles applied in the faculty jurisdiction have, as the citations from decided cases set out in this judgment make clear, long recognised the obligation to protect for the whole community and for future generations churches of special architectural or historic interest against irreversible and inappropriate changes at the hands of those having the immediate care of the building. The extent of that obligation, however, is not, in my view, rightly defined by the concept of "proved necessity." The statute does not impose a limitation in such terms on the local planning authority or the Secretary of State in the exercise of the power to grant written consent for the execution of works of demolition or alteration, etc. to listed buildings (see section 56(3)); and I see no reason why the extent of the discretion to permit alterations to listed ecclesiastical buildings should be more limited than in the case of listed secular buildings.

The right approach, in my view, is to exercise the discretion as I think Parliament intended that it should be exercised, namely, in accordance with established principles; and that includes, of course, having full regard to all the circumstances including the interest of the community as a whole in the special architectural or historic attributes of the building and to the desirability of preserving the building and any features of special architectural or historic interest which it possesses. The discretion, however, is to be exercised in the context that the building is used for the purposes of the Church, that is to say in the service of God, as the Church, doing its best, perceives how that service is to be rendered; and the weight to be given to the various aspects of the particular case is to be determined accordingly. I doubt very much whether Sir John Owen, Dean of the Arches, intended to lay down any other principle. The point was not fully argued before him and the precise limits of any effect on the exercise of the chancellor's discretion by reason of the fact that a church is a listed building were not decisive of the appeal.

The faculty sought by the petitioners should, in my judgment, be granted.

B

SIR ANTHONY LLOYD. I agree with the judgments delivered by the Bishop of Chichester and Sir Ralph Gibson. I add a judgment of my own only because we are differing from the chancellor on both grounds of his decision.

C

The chancellor describes the distinction between an altar and a table, when those words are correctly used, as being "essential and deeply founded." This is a quotation from the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Westerton v. Liddell (1857) Moo. Special Rep. 133, 176-177, to which the chancellor referred. It is worth quoting the passage in full:

"The appellants, in their pleadings, term these tables, 'Altars, or Communion Tables;' and in the argument they have referred to two recent statutes, in which the word 'Altar' is used to signify the 'Communion Table.' When the same thing is signified, it may not be of much importance by what name it is called; but the distinction between an 'Altar' and a 'Communion Table' is in itself essential and deeply founded, in the most important difference in matters of faith between Protestants and Romanists; namely, in the different notions of the nature of the Lord's Supper which prevailed in the Roman Catholic Church at the time of the Reformation, and those which were introduced by the Reformers. By the former it was considered as a sacrifice of the body and blood of the Saviour. The Altar was the place on which the sacrifice was to be made; the elements were to be consecrated, and, being so consecrated, were treated as the actual body and blood of the victim. The Reformers, on the other hand, considered the Holy Communion not as a sacrifice but as a feast, to be celebrated at the Lord's Table; though as to the consecration of the elements, and the effect of this consecration, and several other points, they differed greatly among themselves."

F

G

For the reasons given by the Bishop of Chichester, I would respectfully doubt whether the distinction between an altar and a table is as "essential and deeply founded" as was thought 130 years ago. The chancellor was, of course, bound by Westerton v. Liddell, so it is not surprising that he followed the same approach. But we are not so bound. We are free to construe Canon F2 as it stands, without regard to the doctrinal disputes of past centuries. I do not enter into those disputes now. It is sufficient to record that I do not accept Mr. Spencer Maurice's argument that to admit the Henry Moore altar would be, in his words, "to stand the Reformation on its head."

H

So I would not accept the chancellor's approach to the question whether the Henry Moore altar is capable of being the Holy Table. Nor would I accept his conclusion. The chancellor was clearly much influenced by the reasoning of Lord Penzance, Dean of the Arches, in Faulkner v. Litchfield and Stearn, 1 Rob.Eccl. 184. Again it would be sufficient for us to say that we are not bound by that decision. But I would go further. I doubt whether the chancellor was himself bound by that decision, despite its approval in Westerton v. Liddell, Moo. Special Rep. 133. The essence of the decision in Faulkner v. Litchfield and Stearn, as appears from the passages which the chancellor quotes, is that "a stone structure of amazing weight and dimensions immovably fixed" would not normally be regarded as a table. But that decision has now to be read in the light of the Holy Table Measure 1964 which provided by section 1:

"The Holy Table used at the celebration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion . . . may be either movable or immovable and may be made of wood, stone or other material suitable for the purpose for which the Table is to be used."

One could be forgiven for thinking that the whole object of the Holy Table Measure 1964 was to reverse the decision in Faulkner v. Litchfield and Stearn, 1 Rob.Eccl. 184. The chancellor accepted that the repeal of the Holy Table Measure 1964 by section 6(3) of the Church of England (Worship and Doctrine) Measure 1974 did not reinstate the previous law. Yet he held that he was bound by the reasoning in the passages which he quoted. I find that hard to follow.

Mr. Spencer Maurice expressly conceded that the Holy Table need not have legs. He further expressly conceded that it need not resemble an ordinary domestic table. Yet he submitted that it must still have what he called "the quality of tableness." At this point the argument begins to remind one of Plato's Republic. If I put out of my mind the idea of a domestic table, I find it hard to say in what "the quality of tableness" consists, unless it be in a flat surface to put things on. This comes near Dr. Johnson's definition in Johnson's Dictionary, 2nd ed., vol. iii (1827), referred to in Faulkner v. Litchfield and Stearn, 1 Rob.Eccl. 184, 253-254, "(1) Any flat or level surface (2) A horizontal surface raised above the ground, used for meals and other purposes." As an example of the second meaning, Dr. Johnson quotes "If there is nothing else to discourage us, we may safely come to the Lord's Table and expect to be kindly entertained by Him when we do." Applying Dr. Johnson's definition, I have no doubt that the Moore altar, while not resembling a domestic table in any way, is, nevertheless, a table. It was not suggested that, if it is a table, it is not convenient and decent. It follows that it is capable of being the Holy Table within the meaning the Canon F2, by which alone we are bound. I would, therefore, respectfully disagree with the chancellor's conclusion to the contrary. I would only add that in answering the question whether the Moore altar is capable of being the Holy Table, I do not find it of much assistance to be told what it was that Mr. Henry Moore himself had in mind when designing the altar.

Having held that the Moore altar was not capable of being the Holy Table in law, the chancellor very naturally did not go on to consider whether, if he were wrong, the altar should nevertheless be excluded as a matter of discretion. I am not here referring to the discretion to exclude on aesthetic grounds, to which I shall come in a moment, but on the ground that the significance of the altar might be misunderstood, or that it might cause offence or become an object of superstition. In those circumstances it falls to us to exercise our own discretion. I do not doubt that we should exercise that discretion in favour of the petitioners.

I turn next to the second main point in the case. Was the chancellor right to exercise his discretion against the petitioners on aesthetic grounds? If not, are we entitled to intervene in the matter? In In re St. Michael and All Angels, Great Torrington [1985] Fam. 81 this court held that it would intervene in the exercise of a discretion if it could be shown that the consistory court had acted on an erroneous estimate of the facts. In so holding this court was following and adopting the language of Sir Henry

3 W.L.R.

In re St. Stephen's (EccI.Ct.)

Sir Anthony Lloyd

A Willink Q.C., Dean of the Arches, in In re St. Edburga's, Abberton [1962] P. 10, 15. How does that test compare with the test applied in the Court of Appeal? Mr. Boydell argued that the Arches Court and the Court of Ecclesiastical Causes Reserved are more relaxed than the Court of Appeal in reviewing the discretion of a court below. I do not find any support for that proposition, either in In re St. Michael and All Angels, Great Torrington or in In re St. Edburga's, Abberton. Indeed in the latter case

B the Dean of the Arches clearly thought that the tests should be the same. I also notice that Mr. J. F. E. Stephenson conceded in the course of his argument, at pp. 11–12, that in a matter of aesthetic judgment, it would require a wholly exceptional case for an appellate court to intervene:

C “If this were an aesthetic question, as so many faculty questions primarily are, whatever might be the position in law, an appellate court would be extremely reluctant to overrule the exercise of the chancellor’s discretion, and would need very strong evidence, pointing to something like reckless disregard of generally accepted views—some misconduct, almost, on the part of a consistory court—before doing so.”

D In my view, Mr. Stephenson’s argument goes too far. On the other hand I am not, as at present advised, prepared to go the whole way with Mr. Boydell. Fortunately, it is unnecessary to decide. For even on the strictest view of the circumstances in which an appellate court will intervene, I am satisfied that this appeal must be allowed.

E One starts with the fact that this particular altar was designed for this particular church by one of the world’s great sculptors. It may be that Mr. Henry Moore was not an expert in Wren architecture. But there is no suggestion that he ever had second thoughts about the size or shape of the altar he had designed. With the exception of Mr. Newman, there is universal agreement that the altar is a work of superb quality.

F Secondly, we have the evidence of Professor Kerry Downes, professor of the history of art at Reading University. He has spent 35 years in the study of Sir Christopher Wren and his school, and is the author of a number of books on the subject, including two on Wren himself. Professor Downes must therefore be regarded as an expert on the subject of Wren architecture. Mr. Spencer Maurice did his best to diminish the force of Professor Downes’s evidence. But so far as I was concerned he failed. Even if Mr. Spencer Maurice’s points had had superficial validity, I should have had some hesitation in accepting them, since they were never put in cross-examination. In his written submission, Professor Downes deals

G authoritatively and, to my mind, effectively with certain objections put forward in a paper dated 5 June 1985 on behalf of those members of the Diocesan Advisory Committee who opposed the petition. In Professor Downes’s opinion, the Henry Moore altar would not only be in accord with Wren’s design, but would positively enhance the essential geometry. It is worth quoting his concluding paragraph in full:

H “The petition is for the introduction of a very special liturgical fitting into a very special church. It is for the placing of a beautiful object, of beautiful material, fashioned by the leading sculptor of his time and of 20th century Britain, in the position for which it was commissioned and which the sculptor took fully into consideration when he designed the altar. This proposal is not merely more imaginative, but simply better, than any addition to any Wren church during the last 40 years and perhaps a great deal longer.”

That conclusion, coming as it does from an expert in this very field, is entitled to great weight.

Thirdly, there is the evidence of Sir Roy Strong and the Royal Fine Art Commission. Sir Roy Strong did not claim to be an authority on Wren. But he said:

"It seems to me to give the church what it has always needed—a central altar, something out of the question at the time when it was built, but fully consonant with modern liturgical developments. The subtlety of line, the beauty of the marble and the care taken to relate it to the building in terms both of the axes and the pillars make it an impressive focus of worship and an enhancement of Wren's building."

In cross-examination Sir Roy Strong said that the altar greatly enhanced the architecture. He said: "This proposal is something excellent. There has been nothing like it as long as I can remember."

The evidence of the Royal Fine Art Commission was not obtained until after the hearing before the consistory court. We decided to admit the evidence, in the form of an affidavit from Mr. Norman St. John Stevas, chairman of the commission, on the usual grounds. Since it was not subject to cross-examination, we approach the evidence with caution. Nevertheless, the views of such an eminent body are clearly entitled to great weight. It is sufficient to quote one paragraph:

"After discussion it was resolved that the commission should support the proposal. The commission concluded that the Henry Moore altar was a particularly fine piece of sculpture by one of our greatest contemporary sculptors, which complements the space created by Wren beneath the dome and is wholly congruent with the building. In reaching this conclusion the members were aware of the architectural importance of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, as one of Sir Christopher Wren's greatest masterpieces, and of the view expressed by the chancellor of the diocese that the altar was not congruent with the building."

If I omit the other distinguished witnesses, such as Canon David Bishop and Sir Derman Christopherson, who gave evidence in favour of the petitioners, it is not that I do not attach importance to their views. But it is time to turn to the evidence on the other side.

The principal witness was Mr. Ashley Barker, a distinguished architect, and long standing member of the Diocesan Advisory Committee. The substance of his evidence is set out in Sir Ralph Gibson's judgment. I do not repeat it here. It is sufficient to say that Mr. Ashley Barker laid much emphasis on the geometric qualities of Wren's design and the tension created by the circular dome and the square space beneath. A circular altar would, he thought, not only destroy the tension by "resolving the drama in favour of the circular motif," but also create a false centre in direct conflict with Wren's intentions. However, in cross-examination he made clear that he was not against a central altar as such. "On balance," he said, "but not without reservation there is no objection to a central altar." A little later he said, "the fundamental geometry of the church would be the same." His objection was not so much to the position of the Henry Moore altar beneath the dome, but to its size and shape. In this he was supported by Mr. Gillingham, who also gave evidence on behalf of those members of the Diocesan Advisory Committee who voted against the proposal, and by Mr. Newman. Again I would adopt, if I may, Sir Ralph Gibson's account of their evidence and qualifications.

In re St. Stephen's (Ecl.Ct.)

Sir Anthony Lloyd

A How then does the chancellor deal with all this evidence? His judgment focuses on Mr. Ashley Barker's evidence. He finds that the petitioners failed to satisfy him that Mr. Ashley Barker was wrong. I agree with Sir Ralph Gibson that this was not the right approach. The chancellor was asking himself a question which had no real meaning. For there are hardly ever any rights or wrongs in matters of aesthetics. There are differences of opinion; quot homines tot sententiae. The correct approach in a case such as the present is to weigh the expert evidence on both sides as carefully as possible, without being over influenced by our own personal views. Sir Ralph Gibson has assessed the expert evidence in favour of the petitioners as being at least of equal weight with that of Mr. Ashley Barker, Mr. Gillingham and Mr. Newman. I would myself go further. The balance of expert opinion at the hearing was, to my mind, clearly and heavily in favour of the petitioners; and is still more so, now that we have the views of the Royal Fine Art Commission. When I add to the expert evidence the views of the late Archdeacon of London, the rector, the churchwardens and the unanimous wishes of the parochial church council, I find the case in favour of the petitioners overwhelming.

D So I would agree with Sir Ralph Gibson when he says that the chancellor asked himself the wrong question. This justifies our intervention. I would agree too with the Bishop of Chichester when he says that there is a certain lack of balance in the way the chancellor deals with the evidence. This also justifies our intervention. I find it strange that Professor Downes and Sir Roy Strong are each dismissed in a sentence or two. I appreciate that the chancellor had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses, which we have not. But I cannot believe that the manner in which they gave their evidence was such as to deprive their opinions of the weight to which they would otherwise be entitled. Even on the strictest views of an appellate court's function in these cases, I would hold that we are entitled to intervene.

G That leaves only Mr. Spencer Maurice's respondent's notice, by which he seeks to support the chancellor's judgment on the novel ground that, St. Stephen's being a listed building, a faculty should only be granted if the introduction of the Henry Moore altar can be shown to be a matter of necessity. For that proposition he relies on the judgment of Sir John Owen, Dean of the Arches, in In re St. Mary's, Banbury [1987] 3 W.L.R. 717. It is true that in that case the Dean of the Arches says that in the case of a listed building, a faculty which might affect the special nature of the architectural or historic interest should only be allowed in cases of "clearly proved necessity." A little later he proposes the following principle as a guideline, at p. 725H:

H "When a church is listed as a building of special architectural or historic interest a faculty which would affect its character as such should only be granted in wholly exceptional circumstances, those circumstances clearly showing a necessity for such a change."

The ecclesiastical exemption from planning procedures is, of course, of great importance to the Church of England. But I can find nothing in the relevant legislation to justify an approach as strict as that laid down in In re St. Mary's, Banbury, nor does the Dean of the Arches cite any authority in support of that approach. Listed building consent is given every day in ordinary cases which fall short of "clearly proved necessity." I see no reason why a different standard should prevail in the case of ecclesiastical buildings. It appears that the point was not argued before the Dean of the Arches, and his views, though obviously entitled to great respect, were obiter. The fact that an ecclesiastical building is listed is a relevant consideration in deciding whether or not to grant a faculty. But I would respectfully, but firmly, disagree with the view that a faculty should only be granted in cases of clearly proved necessity.

Having held that we are justified in reviewing the chancellor's discretion, I am in no doubt that we should allow this appeal. I do not underestimate the strength of Mr. Ashley Barker's evidence or the evidence of those who share his views. But the evidence the other way is, as I have held, overwhelming. In my judgment, the petitioners are entitled to their faculty.

I am glad to have reached that conclusion, because I agree with Sir Roy Strong when he said that patronage should be given every encouragement, not least by the Church. The commission was first conceived by Mr. Palumbo in 1967, nearly 20 years ago, and the altar was completed as long ago as 1972. To deny the petitioners the faculty they seek after all these years would indeed be a harsh reward for their generosity.

Finally, I should like to express the court's gratitude to Mr. Spencer Maurice and those instructing him. As he pointed out, there was no party opponent in the strict sense. But the case was one of sufficient importance to justify the court in asking the archdeacon to be represented at the hearing of the appeal in this court, as in the court below. I am happy to record that, at the conclusion of the hearing before us, the petitioners offered to pay the archdeacon's costs of the appeal, whatever the outcome.

BISHOP OF ROCHESTER. I have read in draft the judgments to be handed down by the Bishop of Chichester, Sir Ralph Gibson and Sir Anthony Lloyd. I agree that for the reasons which they give the appeal should be allowed and a faculty granted as prayed.

RT. REV. K. J. WOOLLCOMBE. I have read in draft the judgments to be handed down by the Bishop of Chichester, Sir Ralph Gibson and Sir Anthony Lloyd. I agree that for the reasons which they give the appeal should be allowed and a faculty granted as prayed.

Minor—Custody—Access—Putative father's application for custody and interim access to children—Local authority having assumed parental rights—Whether court having jurisdiction to grant and hear application for access—Guardianship of Minors Act 1971 (c. 3), s. 9(1)

The putative father of two children, aged six and eight years old, stopped cohabiting with their mother in 1980. Early in 1982 the father went abroad. In July 1982, while he was still abroad, the mother placed the two children in the care of the local authority and subsequently refused to have them back. The children remained in care. In November 1983 the local authority passed a resolution under section 3 of the Child Care Act 1980 and in the absence of any objections by the mother, vested in themselves the parental rights and duties in respect of the children. In 1984, when the local authority were considering fostering the children with a view to adoption, the father returned from abroad and visited the children. In 1986 he applied pursuant to section 9 of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971¹ for their custody and for interim access. The local authority opposed the application but the judge granted the father access to the children pending the determination of the issue of custody.

On appeal by the local authority:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the court had jurisdiction to hear a putative father's application under section 9 of the Act of 1971 for interim access to children, but that where the local authority had statutory powers in respect of the children, the court could not interfere with the exercise of those powers in matters concerning the children and had no alternative but to refuse the application; and that, accordingly, since the local authority had assumed parental rights and duties under the Act of 1980, the judge had erred in allowing the application (post, pp. 765D–E, 766H–767B, E–H, 768D–E).

APPEAL from Mr. Assistant Recorder Harrington sitting at Cardiff County Court.

B

On 3 November 1983 the local authority, South Glamorgan County Council, passed a resolution under section 3 of the Child Care Act 1980, vesting in themselves the parental rights and duties in respect of two children, M. and H. In the absence of any counter-notice the resolution took effect.

By application dated 4 September 1986, the putative father of the two children sought legal custody and access pursuant to section 9 of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971. On 20 March 1987 Mr. Assistant Recorder Harrington granted the father interim access to the two children.

C

The local authority appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order for access, and alternatively, that if the court had jurisdiction to make the order, it ought to have declined to exercise the jurisdiction in view of the local authority's assumption of parental rights pursuant to section 3 of the Child Care Act 1980.

D

The children's mother took no part in the proceedings.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Glidewell L.J.

Malcolm Bishop for the local authority.

Philip Davies for the putative father.

GLIDEWELL L.J. This is an appeal by the South Glamorgan County Council against an order made by Mr. Assistant Recorder Harrington, sitting at Cardiff County Court on 20 March 1987 when he granted interim access to the applicant, the putative father, of two children, M. and H., pending the final determination of his application for custody of those children.

F

The facts are a little complicated, but thanks to Mr. Bishop's most helpful chronology they can be recited reasonably shortly. The father comes from the Yemen. He came to live in Cardiff in the 1970s. For some years in that decade he lived as man and wife with the mother, the first respondent to this application, who is respondent in name only because she has taken no part in the proceedings at all.

G

As a result of that association she bore three children of whom the applicant claims, and the mother accepts and the assistant recorder found, that he is the father. The oldest of those three children R., is now nearly 11 years of age. In this court no issue as to him arises. The two younger children, M. and H., are a boy aged nearly eight and a girl aged just over six years.

H

Until about 1980 father, mother and the two boys lived together as a family. But when the mother was pregnant with the little girl, the relationship between her and the father deteriorated. There seems, according to one of his affidavits, to have been a period when he spent some time with her and some time with his parents, who were also in

3 W.L.R.

In re M. and H. (Minors) (C.A.)

Glidewell L.J.

A Cardiff. But that relationship was terminated when on 16 December 1980 the mother married another man. When the younger child, H., was born she therefore took the mother's husband's surname, though it was accepted she was not his child. That marriage seems to have lasted a very short time, perhaps only a matter of months.

B In 1982 the father went back to the Yemen for a time. On 29 July 1982 the mother put all three of her children into the care of the local authority voluntarily, initially for a period of a month. But at the end of the month she refused to have them back and, despite the efforts of the officers of the local authority, the children remained in care. However in December 1982 she took back the oldest child, R., but she left the other two in care.

C In October 1983 the mother had a fourth child by another man and indeed, jumping forward in time a bit, she had a fifth child in December 1985.

D Going back to 1983, as a result of the mother's failure to take the children back out of care, on 3 November 1983 the local authority, by a resolution made under the powers of section 3 of the Child Care Act 1980, assumed parental rights over the two children, M. and H., the subject of this appeal. However they gave the mother a further opportunity to restore the relationship between her and her children, but she showed little or no interest in doing so, and eventually the local authority terminated her right to access to the two children in September 1984. She has not in fact seen the children since May 1984, and the evidence shows that, apart from sending them birthday and Christmas cards, there is now no contact between mother and children. So the mother really disappears from the scene. Meanwhile the two children have been living in a Roman Catholic children's home. I should say that the father is a devout Muslim.

E Some time before May 1984 the father returned to Cardiff. He did visit the two children at the home, on the last occasion when the mother visited them: in other words he accompanied her. Then he tried to visit them again a week later, but he turned up without appointment, failed to explain who he was and was not allowed to see them on that occasion.

F On 11 March 1985 the father himself married and he and his wife now have a child of their own and they are the tenants of a four-bedroomed council house.

G Some time after the marriage, in July 1985, the mother transferred R., the eldest child to the father and his new wife, and that child has lived with them since. So the family there consists of R., his father and his father's wife and the baby.

H In 1984 and 1985 the local authority were considering fostering M. and H. with a view to eventual adoption. However while they were considering this, the father made it clear that he wished to apply for custody of them. Eventually he made a formal application for custody of the two children on 4 September 1986. Pending the determination of that application the question of fostering them for eventual adoption has remained in abeyance and the children have stayed in the home.

Knowing of the father's desire to have custody of the children, in May 1985 the local authority assessed the father's and his wife's suitability and they arranged for them to have access to the two children on some nine occasions in the autumn and winter of 1985-86. On most of those occasions the access was at the children's home. On two occasions it was at the home of the father and his wife. According to the local authority the access was by no means harmonious or successful, but that is in dispute, and we are not here concerned with the merits of the matter. However as a result of that the local authority in January 1986 refused to agree any further access for the father to these two children, and decided to oppose his application for custody. They also decided to continue with their plans for fostering and adoption.

The custody application has not yet been heard, but pending its hearing the father made the application, which leads him to this court, for interim access, and the assistant recorder on 20 March made an order for interim access, the details of which do not matter, because the operation of that order has been stayed pending the hearing of this appeal. In practical terms that means that the children have not seen their father since the early part of 1986.

Mr. Bishop for the local authority argued two alternative points before us. First he argued that the assistant recorder had no jurisdiction to make an order that the father should have access, and secondly, and alternatively, the assistant recorder erred in principle, because even if there is jurisdiction it is one which the court should normally not exercise in favour of granting an order for access.

It is right to say at once that neither of these arguments was advanced in the court below. So the assistant recorder did not have the benefit of any of the authorities to which we have been referred nor any of the arguments which we have heard. If he had, he might very well have come to a different conclusion. It is no discredit to him that he did not deal with the matters that are before us.

There was a question as to whether we should hear argument about jurisdiction, since the points were not taken in the court below, particularly the argument as to whether the assistant recorder had erred in principle. But Mr. Davies for the father very sensibly and properly, in my view, accepted that it will be futile for this court, being seized of the matter, not to pronounce upon the arguments that we have heard.

The origin of the jurisdiction, as I have already said, is to be found in section 3 of the Child Care Act 1980. Subsection (1), so far as material, provides:

“Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, if it appears to a local authority in relation to any child who is in their care under section 2 of this Act— . . . (b) that a parent of his— . . . (iv) is of such habits or mode of life as to be unfit to have the care of the child, or (v) has so consistently failed without reasonable cause to discharge the obligations of a parent as to be unfit to have the care of the child . . . the local authority may resolve that there shall vest in them the parental rights and duties with respect to that child . . .”

It is under that provision that the local authority has assumed the parental rights and duties in relation to these two children.

If a local authority passes such a resolution, then under section 3(2) of the Act of 1980 they must serve notice in writing of the passing of the resolution on the person whose parental rights and duties have vested in them, and give to that person notice that he or she has a right to object to the resolution, which right is to be exercised within a month. If there is no objection, or if an objection is subsequently overruled, then the

A resolution comes into force. The mother here received notice, but did not object, and thus the resolution came into force.

“Parent” is defined in section 87(1) of the Act of 1980 in terms which expressly excluded a father of an illegitimate child. So it follows that the father in the present case was not a person upon whom it was necessary for the local authority to serve notice of their resolution and was not a person who had any right to object to the local authority assuming the parental rights and duties with regard to the two children.

The other statutory provisions that are relevant here are those contained in the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971. Section 9 provides:

“(1) The court may, on the application of the mother or father of a minor (who may apply without next friend), make such order regarding—(a) the custody of the minor; and (b) the right of access to the minor of his mother or father, as the court thinks fit having regard to the welfare of the minor and to the conduct and wishes of the mother and father.”

By section 14(1) of the Act of 1971, the word “father” is defined as including the father of an illegitimate child.

So on the face of it, although the father being in that position was not entitled and had no power to object to the action of the local authority in resolving to take over the parental rights and duties, he is a person who prima facie was entitled to make an application under section 9 of the Act of 1971. It was of course under that section that he made the application for custody and then the application for an order of interim access.

We have been referred to a number of authorities, but those which deal with the points at issue are not binding upon us, as I shall explain. The first in point of time is the decision of a Divisional Court of the Family Division, In re H. (K. and M.) (Infants) [1972] 3 All E.R. 769. That was a case in which a local authority had made an order under the predecessor of section 3 of the Act of 1980, which was formerly section 2 of the Children Act 1948, vesting in themselves the rights and duties of the mother in respect of her two illegitimate children. As here, the putative father made an application under section 9 of the Act of 1971 for an order granting him access to the children. Justices granted him access. The local authority appealed contending that while they had no objection to the father having access, the discretion to grant access was theirs and not that of the court. According to the headnote of the report:

“Held—While H, as the putative father, had a right under sections 9(1) and 14(1) of the Act of 1971 to make an application to the justices for an order granting access, the fact that at the material time the local authority had already assumed parental rights by virtue of an order under section 2(1)(b) of the Children Act 1948, left the justices no alternative but to decline the application and leave the discretion with regard to access to the local authority; accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the order of the justices rescinded.”

The main judgment was given by Payne J., Latey J. agreeing with him. Payne J., having set out sections 9(1) and 14(1) of the Act of 1971, said, at p. 771:

“That clearly gives in appropriate circumstances to the father of an illegitimate child the right to apply to the court for custody and/or access, and that has to be reconciled with the statutory powers of the local authority under the Children Act 1948. It so happens that this kind of conflict has received the consideration of the courts in a number of different circumstances and over a number of years; the authority to which we have been referred this morning is In re M. (an Infant) [1961] Ch. 328.”

He then sets out the facts in that case, which can be summarised as follows. An illegitimate child was taken into care by a local authority, and they passed a resolution that the rights and powers of the mother should be vested in them. She later made an application for the child to become a ward of the court. Payne J. said, at p. 772:

“That brought before the Court of Appeal in due course a problem similar to the one before us; what should the court do where on the one hand there is an order under the Children Act 1948, and on the other hand, in In re M.’s case [1961] Ch. 328, a wardship order in Chancery, in this case, an application to the justices under the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971. The conflict is resolved in this way. Lord Evershed M.R., said at p. 341: ‘What then is the effect of this statute to which I have made such references as occur to me to be necessary? I think that the effect may be stated in two propositions. First, the enactment is such that in a case like the present there is in the Act a clear and comprehensive scheme laid down, (what Lord Sumner called a modus operandi in Attorney-General v. De Keyser’s Royal Hotel Ltd. [1921] A.C. 508, 561) involving positive duties imposed by Parliament on the local authority and a precise formulation of the way in which the consequent powers are to be exercised, and, secondly, that as regards these duties and powers the discretion is conferred on the authority by the words—“appears to them”—which have occurred in the citations that I have made . . . On those premises, that is to say in the absence of any challenge as to the propriety of what the local authority or its officers have done as distinct from their wisdom, I feel compelled, by the clear indication of the language to which I have alluded in the statute, to conclude that this matter of judging the present best interests of the child in the circumstances of this case has been placed by Parliament in the exclusive jurisdiction of the local authority.’

“Speaking for myself, that is the way in which I would approach the present case. There is no challenge to the propriety of what the local authority have done. Their resolution was passed under section 2 with the concurrence of the mother and, although the father of the illegitimate child has the right given him by the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971 to apply to the court for an order for custody or access, the court must then apply section 9 under which it may, on the application of the father or mother, make such order as the court thinks fit. Bearing in mind the existence of the order under section 2 of the Children Act 1948, it seems to me that the justices in the circumstances of this case had no alternative but to decline the application of the father and to leave the discretion with regard to access to the local authority.”

That was applied in relation to custody in a case in the Divisional Court of the Queen’s Bench Division in Reg. v. Oxford Justices, Ex

3 W.L.R.

In re M. and H. (Minors) (C.A.)

Glidewell L.J.

A parte H. [1975] Q.B. 1, in which Bagnall J. giving the judgment, with which Lord Widgery C.J. and Bridge J. agreed, cited a part of the judgment of Payne J. which I have just read, and then said, at p. 7:

B “It is to be observed that the attitude which the justices in the present case had taken is to answer what Payne J. called the second limb of the argument in the affirmative. But in that case itself it seems to me to be clear that the Divisional Court held that there was jurisdiction but that the jurisdiction had to be exercised in the light of the statutory scheme contained in the Act of 1948, and that when Payne J. observed that the justices had no alternative but to decline the application in front of them, his reference to no alternative existing in the circumstances of that case was consistent only with a view that the justices had jurisdiction to determine the case but had to take all circumstances, including the statute, into account.”

C That was also applied by Waite J. in Reg. v. Oxford Justices, Ex parte D. [1987] Q.B. 199 where he granted an order of mandamus requiring the justices to issue a summons on the application of a father.

D There are possible difficulties as to the extent of the order made by Waite J. I do not find it necessary to comment about that. But so far as the earlier authorities are concerned, while of course they are not binding upon us, I must regard them with respect as both correctly decided and as establishing the principles which we should apply.

E The first principle they do establish is that there is jurisdiction, that is to say the father was entitled to make his application for interim access under the Act of 1971. So one comes to the second point argued by Mr. Bishop that in the circumstances, where the rights and duties of the parents are vested in the local authority, a court faced with such an application really has no alternative, in Payne J.’s words, but to refuse the application.

F The same point but in a somewhat different form was the subject of a decision of the House of Lords in A. v. Liverpool City Council [1982] A.C. 363. In that case the local authority had a care order under section 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969. The mother, who was originally allowed weekly access, was told that her access was going to be much restricted because the county council took the view it was not in the child’s best interests. In order to challenge that decision she commenced wardship proceedings seeking an order for defined access to the child and care and control of him. Balcombe J. held that while strictly there was a right for the application for wardship to be made, it should not be continued while the care order was enforced. On direct appeal to the House of Lords the appeal was dismissed. Lord Wilberforce said, at pp. 372–373:

H “It was suggested that, as the local authority is put effectively in the position of the natural parent (see section 24(2) of the Act of 1969), the High Court must have the same power, in the interest of the infant, to review and control its actions, as it undoubtedly has over those of the natural parent. But I can see no parallel between the responsibilities of a natural parent and those entrusted by Parliament by statute to a public authority possessed of the necessary administrative apparatus to form and carry out, if necessary against the wishes of the natural parent, its discretionary decisions. In my opinion Parliament has marked out an area in which, subject to the enacted limitations and safeguards, decisions for the child's welfare are removed from the parents and from supervision by the courts. This is not to say that the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court is taken away. Any child, whether under care or not, can be made a ward of court by the procedure of section 9(2) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1949. In cases (and the present is an example) where the court perceives that the action sought of it is within the sphere of discretion of the local authority, it will make no order and the wardship will lapse. But in some instances, there may be an area of concern to which the powers of the local authority, limited as they are by statute, do not extend. Sometimes the local authority itself may invite the supplementary assistance of the court. Then the wardship may be continued with a view to action by the court. The court's general inherent power is always available to fill gaps or to supplement the powers of the local authority: what it will not do (except by way of judicial review where appropriate) is to supervise the exercise of discretion within the field committed by statute to the local authority."

Then he referred to In re M. (An Infant) [1961] Ch. 328 and In re W. (Minors) (Wardship: Jurisdiction) [1980] Fam. 60, and concluded that they were correctly decided. Lord Roskill said, at p. 377:

"I am of the clear opinion that, while the prerogative jurisdiction of the court in wardship cases remains, the exercise of that jurisdiction has been and must continue to be treated as circumscribed by the existence of the far-ranging statutory code which entrusts the care and control of deprived children to local authorities. It follows that the undoubted wardship jurisdiction must not be exercised so as to interfere with the day-to-day administration by local authorities of that statutory control."

That general principle was repeated by their Lordships' House in In re W. (A Minor) (Wardship: Jurisdiction) [1985] A.C. 791, to which we were referred, and from which I do not find it necessary to cite.

Mr. Davies argues with force that if the principle of A. v. Liverpool City Council [1982] A.C. 363 is applied to a case such as this where there is jurisdiction, that is to say there is the right for the father to make an application under the Act of 1971, but having made his application he must inevitably, or almost inevitably, fail because of the parental rights and duties being vested in the local authority under section 3 of the Act of 1980, that, says Mr. Davies, produces a nonsensical situation. It cannot be assumed that Parliament meant such a situation to arise out of these statutory provisions. And he suggests that the proper application of the principles of A. v. Liverpool City Council in relation to the present facts is that if the local authority had been willing to allow access, the court would have no power—and certainly should not exercise a power—to alter the terms of conditions of that access. But if what is in issue is the basic question whether there should be any access at all, then, since the statute clearly gives jurisdiction for an application to be made for access, the court must have power to determine that question and to determine it on the merits.

For my part it seems to me that in his judgment in In re H. (K. and M.) (Infants) [1972] 3 All E.R. 769 Payne J. correctly analysed the

Glidewell L.J.

A position and really anticipated the decision of the House of Lords in A. v. Liverpool City Council [1982] A.C. 363. It seems to me that the basic fundamental proposition enunciated in the passages from the speeches of their Lordships to which I have referred apply equally in the circumstances of this case.

B For that reason, in my judgment, the assistant recorder could only properly exercise the power vested in him by refusing the application for access made by the father. For those reasons I would allow the appeal and quash the order for access that he made.

C BALCOMBE L.J. I agree. This case concerns two children who are in the care of the local authority under a parental rights resolution made under section 3 of the Child Care Act 1980. The applicant, the respondent to this appeal, is their father, but they are not his legitimate children. For the purposes of this appeal the local authority accepted that this father can apply for custody of these children under section 9(1) of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971, a concession which depends, in part at any rate, upon the decision, to which Glidewell L.J. has referred, of Reg. v. Oxford Justices, Ex parte H. [1975] Q.B. 1.
D Certainly for the purposes of this appeal, that concession having been made, I am prepared to accept that he has such a right, and indeed that the application, namely the application for custody, must be determined on its merits and that, if it is successful, these children will cease to be in the care of the local authority. I say "for the purposes of this appeal" because, as I understand it, there is a possibility that the local authority will wish to raise the question of jurisdiction on the custody application.

E Similarly, section 9(1) of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971 confers the right on this father to apply for access to these children.
However In re H. (K. and M.) (Infants) [1972] 3 All E.R. 769, to which Glidewell L.J. has already referred, if correctly decided—as Glidewell
L.J. has said it is a decision not binding on this court—is to the effect that, although there is jurisdiction for the court to receive such an application, it must, as a matter of course, refuse to exercise that F jurisdiction, because, as Payne J. put it in the passage, at p. 272, to which Glidewell L.J. has referred, it must not interfere with the exercise by a local authority of its statutory powers in relation to children who are in the care of that local authority.

G It is to be noted that Payne J. followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re M. (An Infant) [1961] Ch. 328, and did it on the basis of a point of principle, and In re H. (K. and M.) (Infants) [1972] 3 All E.R. 769 is not, as Mr. Davies suggested to us, distinguishable on its facts, in that, so he submitted, what was there in issue was not the principle of access but the quantum of access. As I read that decision, it is clear that both Payne J. and Latey J. took the view that although there might well be jurisdiction, it was not a jurisdiction which should be exercised where it would impinge on the statutory powers entrusted H by Parliament to the local authority.

That approach is entirely consistent with the approach which has since been adopted by the House of Lords in the two well known cases of A. v. Liverpool City Council [1982] A.C. 363 and In re W. (A Minor) (Wardship: Jurisdiction) [1985] A.C. 791. I do not need to refer to those cases. Glidewell L.J. has referred to A. v. Liverpool City Council. Both are so well known that they probably need no further reference or citation on my part.

Finally I should mention the decision of Waite J. in Reg. v. Oxford Justices, Ex parte D. [1987] Q.B. 199. That case again concerned the father of an illegitimate child. He had applied for summonses, again under section 9 of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971, seeking custody of, and access to, the child. The justices issued the summons for custody, but refused to issue a summons for access on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to order access to a child in the care of a local authority. The father then applied for judicial review. Waite J. granted judicial review, ordering mandamus directed to the clerk to the justices to issue a summons to hear the father's application for access.

For my part I am not certain that I would have come to the same decision in that case. Indeed I suspect I would not. As the judge said, undoubtedly there was jurisdiction. But if the decision of In re H. (K. and M.) (Infants) [1972] 3 All E.R. 769 was right—and in my judgment it clearly was right—then the issue of the summons was pointless, because when it came before the justices, they would have been bound to have said: "We cannot exercise this jurisdiction." Where Waite J. said, at p. 205:

"Those merits"—that is the merits of the father's access application—"will in due course have to be considered, for whatever strength or weakness they may have, by the justices when they hear the evidence and investigate all the circumstances of the case in detail."

in my respectful view he was wrong. The application should never have been heard on its merits. In those circumstances it may well be that as a matter of discretion he should have refused judicial review. It does not seem to me to be a useful way of exercising the jurisdiction to order judicial review to require the clerk to the justices to issue a summons, when the application must inevitably be refused.

I therefore agree that this appeal must be allowed and the order for interim access which the assistant recorder made be discharged, but adding, as I do, and concurring with Glidewell L.J., that the assistant recorder can hardly be criticised for making the order which he did when none of these points was taken before him and he did not have the assistance which we have had of both reference to the authorities and full argument from counsel.

Appeal allowed.

No order as to costs.

Legal aid taxation of applicant's costs.

Leave to appeal refused.

Dentist—Discipline—“Serious professional misconduct”—Failure to carry out treatment with reasonable skill and care—No allegation of dishonesty—Whether serious professional misconduct—Dentists Act 1984 (c. 24), s. 27(1)(b)

D

A dentist was charged before the Professional Conduct Committee of the General Dental Council under section 27(1) of the Dentists Act 1984¹ with serious professional misconduct in (1) that he failed to retain the radiographs of 19 National Health Service patients for a reasonable period after completion of treatment and failed to submit them to the Dental Estimates Board when required to do so; (2) that he provided six patients with dental treatment in the course of which he failed to exercise a proper degree of skill and attention; and (3) that he provided four patients with dental treatment in the course of which he failed satisfactorily to complete the treatment required by the patient. The legal assessor advised the committee that in considering charge 3 they could take into account treatment which was not required as well as that which was not satisfactorily completed. The committee found the undisputed facts alleged in charge 1 proved, charge 2 proved with regard to five patients and charge 3 with regard to three patients. They judged the dentist to have been guilty of serious professional misconduct in relation to the facts proved against him in each charge, and directed that his name should be erased from the dentists' register.

E

On the dentist's appeal to the Judicial Committee:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, (1) that “serious professional misconduct” in section 27(1)(b) of the Dentists Act 1984 was not to be construed so that it had the same meaning as the repealed charge of “infamous or disgraceful conduct in a professional respect” within section 25(1)(b) of the Dentists Act 1957; that serious professional misconduct was a wide expression that was not restricted to dishonesty or moral turpitude but included all professional conduct, whether by acts of omission or commission, by which a dentist had seriously failed to attain the standards of conduct which members of the dental profession expected (post, p. 774D–H).

APPEAL (No. 15 of 1987) by Alexander Robert Doughty, a registered dentist, from a determination made by the Professional Conduct Committee of the General Dental Council on 12 March 1987, whereby the committee found that he had been guilty of serious professional misconduct in relation to three charges and directed that his name should be erased from the dentists' register.

The facts are stated in the judgment of their Lordships.

Kuldip Singh for the dentist.

E. J. Bevan for the General Dental Council.

Cur. adv. vult.

29 July. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN.

This is an appeal from a decision of the Professional Conduct Committee of the General Dental Council on 12 March 1987 that the appellant dentist had been guilty of serious professional misconduct in relation to three charges and that his name should be erased from the dentists' register. The three charges in question were:

"That being a registered dentist: 1. Between 10 January and 26 October 1984 you accepted 19 patients, whose names and addresses are shown on list 'A' (which is attached to the charge) for dental treatment as National Health Service patients, and thereafter provided them with dental treatment in the course of which, having

3 W.L.R.

Doughty v. General Dental Council (P.C.)

A obtained radiographs of these patients, you: (a) failed to retain those radiographs for a reasonable period of time after completion of the treatment; (b) failed to submit those radiographs to the Dental Estimates Board when required to do so by a letter from the board dated 27 November 1984. 2. Between 5 June and 16 November 1984 you accepted six patients, whose names and addresses are shown on list 'B' (which is attached to the charge) for dental treatment as National Health Service patients and thereafter provided them with dental treatment in the course of which you failed to exercise a proper degree of skill and attention. 3. Between 21 August and 5 October 1984 you accepted four patients, whose names and addresses are shown on list 'C' (which is attached to the charge) for dental treatment as National Health Service patients, and thereafter provided them with dental treatment in the course of which you failed satisfactorily to complete the treatment required by the patient. . . . And that in relation to the facts alleged in each of the above charges you have been guilty of serious professional misconduct."

D At the close of the case for the General Dental Council submissions were made on behalf of the dentist. These were successful in relation to charge 4 which their Lordships have not narrated and with which this appeal is accordingly not concerned and also in relation to one of the patients mentioned in charge 2. At the conclusion of the evidence relating to the facts alleged the President announced the decision in the following terms:

E "the committee has decided, that the facts alleged against you in charge 1, which you have admitted, in charge 2, in relation to each of the five remaining patients and in charge 3 with the exception of those in relation to the patient Mr. Goldberger, have been proved to the satisfaction of the committee. In relation to the facts alleged against you in respect of Mr. Goldberger, you have not been guilty of serious professional misconduct."

F Thereafter the committee went on to hear evidence led on behalf of the dentist directed to whether the facts found proved constituted serious professional misconduct and heard counsel on that matter. The committee announced their decision in the following terms:

G "In relation to the facts alleged in head 1 of the charge which have been admitted, the committee finds that you have been guilty of serious professional misconduct. In relation to the facts alleged against you in charge 2 in respect of the five remaining patients and in charge 3 in respect of the three remaining patients, the committee finds that you have been guilty of serious professional misconduct."

H The committee directed that the dentist's name be erased from the dentists' register.

As the committee decision records, the facts alleged in charge 1 were admitted on behalf of the dentist. The facts alleged in charge 2 in respect of two of the named patients were admitted on behalf of the dentist. On charge 2 evidence was led from the remaining patients and from Mr. Taylor, a qualified dentist who was a member of the Dental Estimates Board and had been in general practice from 1958 until he took up his position with the Dental Estimates Board in August 1978. He gave evidence criticising root canal treatment that had been given by the dentist to the three remaining patients in respect of whom the facts alleged in the charge were found proved. The criticism was offered under two heads, first, that the root canal treatments were not necessary and second, that the root canal treatments were not properly carried out. In respect of one of the patients criticism was offered under both heads and in respect of the remaining patients under one head for each. In relation to charge 3, evidence was given by the three patients in respect of whom the facts alleged in the charge were found proved and also by Mrs. Baker, an officer of the dental staff of the Department of Health and Social Security who qualified as a dentist in 1970 and took a diploma in orthodontics in 1977. She gave evidence in respect of two of these patients and evidence in respect of the third was given by Mr. Davidson, a registered dental practitioner qualified in 1950 now employed as an officer of the dental staff of the Department of Health and Social Security. Again criticism was offered under the same two heads: under both heads in respect of two of the patients and under the second head in respect of the third.

At the hearing of this appeal counsel for the dentist in his very clear and forceful submissions first pointed to the distinction in wording between charges 2 and 3. He submitted that charge 3 was not concerned with whether or not the treatment in question was necessary but only with whether it was satisfactorily completed. This question had been discussed at the hearing before the committee at the stage when counsel then appearing for the dentist was making submissions at the close of the evidence for the General Dental Council. After discussion the legal assessor to the committee gave his view as follows:

“The word ‘required’ is a simple English word which should be given a simple English meaning. It is wide enough to cover this aspect of the matter, namely, the provision of treatment which was not in fact necessary to be completed at all, although the patient may have agreed that it was; so that it is possible for you, under charge 3, to look at, as a head of the charge, the provision of root canal treatment which was not necessary as well as that which was poorly executed.”

Counsel for the General Dental Council submitted that the wording of charge 3 was wide enough to cover allegations that the treatment criticised was unnecessary.

Their Lordships cannot accept the General Dental Council’s submission. An allegation of failure “satisfactorily to complete the treatment required by the patient” cannot, by any stretch of language be read as including an allegation of having administered treatment which was not necessary. It follows that the legal assessor’s direction was erroneous but not necessarily that the committee’s decision was thereby invalidated. In Sivarajah v. General Medical Council [1964] 1 W.L.R. 112, 117, Lord Guest said:

“Thus what might amount to a misdirection in law by a judge to a jury at a criminal trial does not necessarily invalidate the committee’s decision. The question is whether it can ‘fairly be thought to have been of sufficient significance to the result to invalidate the committee’s decision.’”

3 W.L.R.

A

This was followed in McEniff v. General Dental Council [1980] 1 W.L.R. 328, 332. In the present case there is not and could not have been any suggestion that the evidence given in relation to charge 2 was not covered by the words of that charge and it is difficult to see why the wording of charge 3 is different, since the evidence given criticising the dentist's treatment was broadly similar under both charges. No objection was taken to the evidence as it was being led and the dentist had full opportunity to meet it in his own evidence. In the whole circumstances of this appeal their Lordships are satisfied that the misdirection contained in the legal assessor's observations which have been quoted neither prejudiced the dentist nor caused any miscarriage of justice. It did not therefore invalidate the committee's decision.

The next point taken by counsel for the dentist was that in order to prove charges 2 and 3 it was necessary to show that the opinion held by the dentist in relation to the treatment was not honestly held by him and could not honestly be held by a dentist. This submission was founded principally on the observations of Lord Jenkins giving the judgment of this Board in Felix v. General Dental Council [1960] A.C. 704. His Lordship said, at p. 721:

"With respect to the treatment alleged to have been unnecessary, the evidence (as their Lordships have already observed) showed that according to the appellant, he honestly believed it to be necessary (or likely to be found necessary), while the dentists who disagreed with him did not claim that the opinion expressed by the appellant was one which no dentist could honestly hold. In this state of the evidence their Lordships think it would be wrong to impute to the Disciplinary Committee an implied finding to the effect that the appellant did not honestly hold that opinion. An honestly held opinion, even if wrong, in their Lordships' view plainly cannot amount to infamous or disgraceful conduct."

F

Counsel for the General Dental Council submitted that the evidence was sufficient to entitle the committee both to hold the facts alleged in charges 2 and 3 proved so far as they had done so and also to hold that those facts constituted serious professional misconduct.

G

In considering the applicability of Lord Jenkins' observations to the circumstances of the present appeal, it has to be noted that Lord Jenkins was speaking of a case in which dishonesty was very much the issue and in the context of the statutory provision which was the basis of the proceedings in Felix v. General Dental Council namely, section 25 of the Dentists Act 1957. So far as relevant it was in these terms:

"(1) A registered dentist who either before or after registration . . .
(b) has been guilty of any infamous or disgraceful conduct in a professional respect, shall be liable to have his name erased from the register."

H

At that time this was the only penalty available in respect of such conduct. Section 15(1) of the Dentists Act 1983 provided:

"For section 25(1) of the principal Act [the Dentists Act 1957] (erasure from register for crime or infamous conduct) there shall be substituted—(1) A registered dentist who (whether before or after registration) . . . (b) has been guilty of serious professional misconduct, shall be liable to have his name erased from the register, or to have his registration in it suspended, in accordance with section 26(3) of this Act; . . ."

The suspension referred to is suspension for such period not exceeding 12 months as may be specified in the committee's determination. Counsel for the dentist suggests that this change in language was not intended to effect a change in substance. In Rex v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration of the United Kingdom [1930] 1 K.B. 562, 569, referring to the statutory provision there applicable, namely "infamous conduct in any professional respect," Scrutton L.J. said:

"It is a great pity that the word 'infamous' is used to describe the conduct of a medical practitioner who advertises. As in the case of the Bar so in the medical profession advertising is serious misconduct in a professional respect and that is all that is meant by the phrase 'infamous conduct'; it means no more than serious misconduct judged according to the rules written or unwritten governing the profession."

In the General Medical Council's booklet entitled Professional Conduct and Discipline: Fitness to Practise (April 1985), p. 3, the General Medical Council stated:

"In proposing the substitution of the expression 'serious professional misconduct' for the phrase 'infamous conduct in a professional respect' the Council intended that the phrases should have the same significance."

Their Lordships readily accept that what was infamous or disgraceful conduct in a professional respect would also constitute serious professional misconduct but they consider that it would not be right to require the General Dental Council to establish now that the conduct complained of was infamous or disgraceful and therefore not right to apply the criteria which Lord Jenkins derived from the dictionary definitions of these words which he quoted in Felix v. General Dental Council [1960] A.C. 704, 719. Their Lordships consider it relevant, in reaching a conclusion upon whether Parliament intended by the change of wording to make a change of substance, to notice that in addition to this change and in close conjunction with it the additional and much less severe penalty of suspension for a period not exceeding 12 months was provided. Further, in terms of section 1(2) of the Dentists Act 1984 which is the statute presently applicable:

"It shall be the general concern of the Council to promote high standards of dental education at all its stages and high standards of professional conduct among dentists. . ."

In the light of these considerations in their Lordships' view what is now required is that the General Dental Council should establish conduct connected with his profession in which the dentist concerned has fallen short, by omission or commission, of the standards of conduct expected among dentists and that such falling short as is established should be serious. On an appeal to this Board, the Board has the responsibility of deciding whether the committee were entitled to take the view that the evidence established that there had been a falling short of these standards and also entitled to take the view that such falling short as was established was serious.

In the present case the three charges of serious professional misconduct of which the dentist has been found guilty do not impute any

3 W.L.R.

Doughty v. General Dental Council (P.C.)

A dishonesty on his part. It was not suggested that he was carrying out unnecessary treatments for the purpose of enhancing his remuneration. What was suggested was that, judged by proper professional standards in the light of the objective facts about the individual patients that were presented in evidence to the committee, the dental treatments criticised as unnecessary would be treatments that no dentist of reasonable skill exercising reasonable care would carry out. It was for the committee with their expertise in this matter to judge as between the witnesses called by the General Dental Council and the dentist, who had every opportunity to give his own reasons and explanations for what he did, and to judge whether the allegation was made out subject to the matter already dealt with in relation to charge 3. The point taken by counsel for the dentist at this stage of his submission was pressed primarily in relation to the criticisms of the dentist's treatment as unnecessary. With regard to the other criticisms it appears to their Lordships that the failures admitted in relation to charge 1 and admitted in part and proved to a further extent in relation to charge 2 and proved in relation to charge 3 amounted to professional misconduct. Whether the misconduct was serious depended on a number of factors, for example in relation to charge 1 on the number of patients in respect of whom the failure occurred and the importance of preserving the record for the well being of the patient and as a basis for decision on future treatment of the patient. In relation to charges 2 and 3 the seriousness of the conduct depended on the appreciation of such factors as the number of patients involved, the number of treatments criticised in relation to each patient and particularly in relation to unsatisfactory treatments, the nature and extent of the failure to complete the treatment properly. On all of these matters the committee were particularly well qualified to reach a view and their Lordships see no reason to disagree with their findings.

Counsel for the dentist stated that the dentist had ceased practising in the middle of 1986 and that he had no present intention to return to practice but he was prosecuting this appeal in order to clear his name. Their Lordships are happy to make clear that in their judgment the findings against the dentist do not import any moral stigma. All the failures found proved related only to work which the dentist carried out as a dentist but in their Lordships' opinion these were failures of a kind which the committee were entitled to hold rendered it right for them to direct erasure of the dentist's name from the register of dentists. This is a matter very much for the professional judgment of the committee with which their Lordships see no cause to interfere.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The dentist must pay the General Dental Council's costs before this Board.

Negligence—Duty of care to whom?—Commissioner of Deposit-taking Companies—Statutory protection in Hong Kong for depositors—Commissioner registering company—Company's affairs allegedly conducted fraudulently, speculatively and to detriment of depositors—Whether commissioner in discharge of statutory powers owing duty of care to potential depositors—Deposit-taking Companies Ordinance (Laws of Hong Kong, 1983 rev., c. 328), ss. 10(1)(2)(e), 14(1)(d)

The Commissioner of Deposit-taking Companies registered a company as a deposit-taking company pursuant to section 10 of the Deposit-taking Companies Ordinance.¹ The company subsequently went into liquidation. The plaintiffs, who lost the moneys they had deposited with the company, brought an action for damages for negligence against the Attorney-General of Hong Kong, representing the commissioner, alleging that they had made the deposits in reliance upon the company's registration and that the commissioner knew or ought to have known had he taken reasonable care that the company's affairs were being conducted fraudulently, speculatively and to the detriment of its depositors, that he should have ensured the company's compliance with the Ordinance, and that he ought not to have registered the company or that he should have revoked its registration, under section 14(1) of the Ordinance before the plaintiffs made their deposits.* On an application by the Attorney-General to the High Court of Hong Kong under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19, the judge ordered the plaintiffs' statement of claim to be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. The Court of Appeal of Hong Kong affirmed that decision.

On the plaintiffs' appeal to the Judicial Committee:—

liability in tort for negligence could arise, and in determining that question all the circumstances had to be taken into consideration including the reasonable contemplation of harm being caused to the plaintiff by the defendant's failure to take reasonable care, although foreseeability of injury by itself was insufficient to create a duty of care; that although, on the plaintiffs' allegations, information about the company giving rise to the suspicion that its business was being conducted to the detriment of its depositors was available to the commissioner but not to members of the public, the commissioner had no power under the Deposit-taking Companies Ordinance to control the management of deposit-taking companies, and there was no special relationship between the commissioner and the company and its managers which placed the commissioner under a duty to take reasonable care to prevent the company and its managers causing financial loss to future depositors with the company; and that, therefore, in all the circumstances the relations between the commissioner and the plaintiffs were insufficiently close and direct for him to owe them, as members of an unascertained class of potential depositors with deposit-taking companies in Hong Kong, a duty in performing his functions under the Ordinance to take reasonable care to prevent them suffering financial loss by reason of the fraudulent and improvident conduct of the company's affairs (post, pp. 783C-D, 785G-786B, G-787B, B-D).

Dictum of Lord Wilberforce in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, 751-752, H.L.(E.) considered.

(2) That the commissioner was under no liability to the plaintiffs for negligent misrepresentation since the Ordinance merely placed him under a duty to supervise deposit-taking companies in the public interest and imposed no special responsibility on him towards individual potential depositors, and that by registering the company and allowing it to remain registered the commissioner was in fact making no representation as to the creditworthiness of the company on which the plaintiffs were entitled to rely; and that, accordingly, the plaintiffs' statement of claim had properly been struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action (post, pp. 787H-788A, B-C, 789F-G).

Per curiam. For the future it should be recognised that the two-stage test in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, 751-752, is not to be regarded as in all circumstances a suitable guide to the existence of a duty of care (post, p. 785F-G).

3 W.L.R.

Yuen Kun Yeu v. A.-G. of Hong Kong (P.C.)

A 10 June. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD KEITH OF KINKEL.

B This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal of Hong Kong made on 7 March 1986, whereby that court dismissed an appeal by the plaintiffs (the present appellants) against an order dated 9 July 1985 of Jones J. in the High Court of Hong Kong directing that the plaintiffs' statement of claim be struck out under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19, as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. The appeal is brought with leave of the Court of Appeal.

C The plaintiffs are four residents in Hong Kong who between August and December 1982 made substantial deposits with a registered deposit-taking company called American and Panama Finance Co. Ltd. The company went into liquidation on 25 February 1983 and as a result the plaintiffs have lost all the money which they deposited with it. The respondent is the Attorney-General of Hong Kong as representing the Commissioner of Deposit-taking Companies. The plaintiffs' claim against him is for damages on the ground of negligence in the discharge of the commissioner's functions under the Deposit-taking Companies Ordinance. An alternative ground of breach of statutory duty was not argued. The damages claimed are quantified by reference to the amount of the plaintiffs' lost deposits with interest at the rates contracted for.

D The Ordinance was originally enacted in 1976 and has since been amended on a number of occasions. The preamble reads:

E "To regulate the taking of money on deposit and to make provision for the protection of persons who deposit money and for the regulation of deposit-taking business for monetary policy purposes."

F By section 3A of the Ordinance the Commissioner of Banking (appointed under section 4 of the Banking Ordinance) is appointed to be Commissioner of Deposit-taking Companies. Part III of the Ordinance places a number of restrictions on the taking of deposits, and these are fortified by criminal sanctions. In particular, section 6(1) prohibits the carrying on of the business of taking deposits except by a company which is either a registered deposit-taking company or a licensed deposit-taking company. Part IV deals with the registration of deposit-taking companies, requiring by section 9 that applications for registration should be accompanied by various documents relating to the company's business. Section 10(1) provides for the registration by the commissioner of a company as a deposit-taking company on receipt of an application satisfying section 9, but section 10(2) requires him to refuse registration in a number of circumstances including, by paragraph (e), if "it appears to the commissioner that, by reason of any circumstances whatsoever, the company is not a fit and proper body to be registered." Under section 12 the commissioner is to maintain a register of deposit-taking companies. The register is to be open to inspection by members of the public, along with documents lodged by the company on application for registration or annually under section 17, which covers such matters as profit and loss accounts and balance sheets, with auditor's reports. Section 13 requires the commissioner to publish in the "Gazette" at least once a year the names of all registered deposit-taking companies. Under section 14 the commissioner may, subject to giving the company an opportunity of making representations, revoke the registration of a deposit-taking company in certain specified events. These include, by section 14(1)(d), "[i]f it appears to him that— (1) the company is not a fit and proper body to remain registered."

Part V contains detailed provisions in regard to the obligations of deposit-taking companies, fenced with criminal sanctions. These include section 17: to lodge accounts annually with the commissioner; section 18: to exhibit accounts at each place of business; section 19: to notify the commissioner of certain changes by the company in its business; section 19A: to report to the commissioner if the company is likely to be unable to meet its obligations or if it is about to suspend payment; section 20: to submit monthly returns to the commissioner showing its assets and liabilities together with such further information as the commissioner may require, including auditor's certificates; section 20A: to inform the commissioner, if so required, of shareholdings in any company exceeding 20 per cent. of the share capital; section 21: to refrain from representing that the company has been in any respect approved by the government, the Financial Secretary or the commissioner, subject to the proviso that this prohibition is not contravened by reason only that a statement is made to the effect that a company is registered or licensed under the Ordinance; section 21A: to maintain certain reserves; section 21B: to restrict the payment of dividends if certain financial criteria are not satisfied; section 21C: to refrain from making advances against the security of the company's own shares; section 22: to refrain from making to any one person or group of companies advances exceeding a certain proportion of the deposit-taking company's paid up capital and reserves; section 22A: to refrain, when so required by the commissioner, from making advances to a foreign bank; section 23: to limit the amount of advances made to a director of the company and certain other persons; section 23A: to limit the amount of advances made to any one of the company's employees; section 23B: to limit the holding of shares in any other company or companies so as not to exceed in value 25 per cent. of the paid-up share capital and reserves of the deposit-taking company; section 23C: to limit the holding of any interests in land so as not to exceed in aggregate value 25 per cent. of the paid-up share capital and reserves of the deposit-taking company; section 24A: to maintain at all times a minimum holding of certain specified liquid assets.

Part VI of the Ordinance, headed "Miscellaneous," deals with a variety of matters, including secrecy (section 25), criminal liability for false or negligent misrepresentation (section 28), liability in tort for such misrepresentation (section 29), criminal liability of directors and other officers (section 31), examination by the commissioner of the affairs of a deposit-taking company (section 31A), rights of appeal to the Governor in Council against refusal to register and revocation or suspension of registration (section 34), and investigation of a deposit-taking company by a person appointed by the Financial Secretary (section 38). It is to be observed that by amendment introduced in 1983, after the events giving rise to the present litigation, it is provided (section 41) that no liability shall be incurred by the Financial Secretary or the commissioner as a result of anything done or omitted to be done by him in the bona fide exercise of any functions under the Ordinance.

Part VII of the Ordinance contains a number of provisions concerned with the revocation and suspension of the registration of a deposit-taking company. Under section 45 the commissioner may suspend the

A registration of a deposit-taking company for up to 14 days in circumstances of urgency, and under section 46 he may in other cases and subject to section 47 suspend registration for a period not exceeding six months. Section 47 requires an opportunity of being heard to be afforded to a company before its registration is revoked or suspended. Section 49 provides for publication in the "Gazette" of notice of revocation or suspension.

B In their amended statement of claim, the averments in which must for present purposes be taken to be true, the plaintiffs say that they made their respective deposits with the American and Panama Finance Co. Ltd.:

C "in reliance upon: (a) the fact that the company was registered by the commissioner under the Ordinance and that: (i) it was therefore a fit and proper body to be registered; (ii) it was the subject of 'prudential supervision' by the commissioner; (iii) and that such 'prudential supervision' would be continuing and did so continue;"

D and also in reliance upon certain statements by the Financial Secretary and the commissioner which led the plaintiffs to believe in the financial probity of deposit-taking companies (including the company) and in the commissioner's powers actually to control and regulate them.

The statement of claim goes on to detail a large number of matters connected with the affairs of the company between 1980 (when it was registered by the commissioner) and the end of 1982 which are alleged to indicate that these affairs were being conducted fraudulently, speculatively and to the detriment of depositors with it.

E The allegations of fault against the commissioner are, in substance, that he knew or ought to have known, had he taken reasonable care, that the affairs of the company were being conducted fraudulently, speculatively and to the detriment of its depositors; that he failed to exercise his powers under the Ordinance so as to secure that the company complied with the obligations and restrictions thereby imposed upon it (a considerable number of which are alleged to have been breached); and that he should either never have registered the company as a deposit-taking company or have revoked its registration before the plaintiffs made their respective deposits with it, so as to save them from losing their money when the company eventually went into liquidation.

F The issues in the appeal raise important issues of principle, having far-reaching implications as regards the potential liability in negligence of a wide variety of regulatory agencies carried on under the aegis of central or local government and also to some extent by non-governmental bodies. Such agencies are in modern times becoming an increasingly familiar feature of the financial, commercial, industrial and social scene.

G The foremost question of principle is whether in the present case the commissioner owed to members of the public who might be minded to deposit their money with deposit-taking companies in Hong Kong a duty, in the discharge of his supervisory powers under the Ordinance, to exercise reasonable care to see that such members of the public did not suffer loss through the affairs of such companies being carried on by their managers in fraudulent or improvident fashion. That question is one of law, which is capable of being answered upon the averments assumed to be true, contained in the plaintiffs' pleadings. If it is answered in the negative, the plaintiffs have no reasonable cause of action, and their statement of claim was rightly struck out.

The argument for the plaintiffs in favour of an affirmative answer to the question started from the familiar passage in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Ann v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, 751–752:

“Through the trilogy of cases in this House—Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562, Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] A.C. 465, and Dorset Yacht Co. Ltd. v. Home Office [1970] A.C. 1004, the position has now been reached that in order to establish that a duty of care arises in a particular situation, it is not necessary to bring the facts of that situation within those of previous situations in which a duty of care has been held to exist. Rather the question has to be approached in two stages. First one has to ask whether, as between the alleged wrongdoer and the person who has suffered damage there is a sufficient relationship of proximity or neighbourhood such that, in the reasonable contemplation of the former, carelessness on his part may be likely to cause damage to the latter—in which case a prima facie duty of care arises. Secondly, if the first question is answered affirmatively, it is necessary to consider whether there are any considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed or the damages to which a breach of it may give rise: . . .”

This passage has been treated with some reservation in subsequent cases in the House of Lords, in particular by Lord Keith of Kinkel in Governors of the Peabody Donation Fund v. Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co. Ltd. [1985] A.C. 210, 240, by Lord Brandon of Oakbrook in Leigh and Silavan Ltd. v. Aliakmon Shipping Co. Ltd. [1986] A.C. 785, 815, and by Lord Bridge of Harwich in Curran v. Northern Ireland Co-ownership Housing Association Ltd. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1043, 1049. The speeches containing these reservations were concurred in by all the other members of the House who were party to the decisions. In Council of the Shire of Sutherland v. Heyman (1985) 59 A.L.J.R. 564 Brennan J., in the High Court of Australia, indicated his disagreement with the nature of the approach indicated by Lord Wilberforce, saying, at p. 588:

“Of course, if foreseeability of injury to another were the exhaustive criterion of a prima facie duty to act to prevent the occurrence of that injury, it would be essential to introduce some kind of restrictive qualification—perhaps a qualification of the kind stated in the second stage of the general proposition in Ann. I am unable to accept that approach. It is preferable, in my view, that the law should develop novel categories of negligence incrementally and by analogy with established categories, rather than by a massive extension of a prima facie duty of care restrained only by indefinable ‘considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed.’ The proper role of the ‘second stage,’ as I attempted to explain in Juensch v. Coffey [(1984) 58 A.L.J.R. 426, 437, 438], embraces no more than ‘those further elements [in addition to the neighbour principle] which are appropriate to the particular category of negligence and which confine the duty of care within narrower limits than those which would be defined by an unqualified application of the neighbour principle.’”

Yuen Kun Yeu v. A.-G. of Hong Kong (P.C.)

A Their Lordships venture to think that the two stage test formulated by Lord Wilberforce for determining the existence of a duty of care in negligence has been elevated to a degree of importance greater than it merits, and greater perhaps than its author intended. Further, the expression of the first stage of the test carries with it a risk of misinterpretation. As Gibbs C.J. pointed out in Council of the Shire of Sutherland v. Heyman, 59 A.L.J.R. 564, 570, there are two possible views of what Lord Wilberforce meant. The first view, favoured in a number of cases mentioned by Gibbs C.J., is that he meant to test the sufficiency of proximity simply by the reasonable contemplation of likely harm. The second view, favoured by Gibbs C.J. himself, is that Lord Wilberforce meant the expression "proximity or neighbourhood" to be a composite one, importing the whole concept of necessary relationship between plaintiff and defendant described by Lord Atkin in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562, 580. In their Lordships' opinion the second view is the correct one. As Lord Wilberforce himself observed in McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410, 420, it is clear that foreseeability does not of itself, and automatically, lead to a duty of care. There are many other statements to the same effect. The truth is that the trilogy of cases referred to by Lord Wilberforce in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, 751, each demonstrate particular sets of circumstances, differing in character, which were adjudged to have the effect of bringing into being a relationship apt to give rise to a duty of care. Foreseeability of harm is a necessary ingredient of such a relationship, but it is not the only one. Otherwise there would be liability in negligence on the part of one who sees another about to walk over a cliff with his head in the air, and forbears to shout a warning.

Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562 established that the manufacturer of a consumable product who carried on business in such a way that the product reached the consumer in the shape in which it left the manufacturer, without any prospect of intermediate examination, owed the consumer a duty to take reasonable care that the product was free from defect likely to cause injury to health. The speech of Lord Atkin stressed not only the requirement of foreseeability of harm but also that of a close and direct relationship of proximity. The relevant passages are at pp. 580, 581 and 582:

F

"Who, then, in law is my neighbour? The answer seems to be—persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question."

G

"I think that this sufficiently states the truth if proximity be not confined to mere physical proximity, but be used, as I think it was intended, to extend to such close and direct relations that the act complained of directly affects a person whom the person alleged to be bound to take care would know would be directly affected by his careless act."

H

"There will no doubt arise cases where it will be difficult to determine whether the contemplated relationship is so close that the duty arises."

Lord Atkin clearly had in contemplation that all the circumstances of the case, not only the foreseeability of harm, were appropriate to be taken into account in determining whether a duty of care arose. Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] A.C. 465 was concerned with the assumption of responsibility. On the facts of the case no liability was held to exist because responsibility for the advice given had been disclaimed, but there was established the principle that a duty of care arises where a party is asked for and gives gratuitous advice upon a matter within his particular skill or knowledge and knows or ought to have known that the person asking for the advice will rely upon it and act accordingly. In such a case the directness and closeness of the relationship between the parties are very apparent. Dorset Yacht Co. Ltd. v. Home Office [1970] A.C. 1004 was an example of the kind of situation where a special relationship between a defendant and a third party gives rise to a duty on the part of the defendant to take reasonable care to control the third party so as to prevent him causing damage to the plaintiff. Some Borstal boys, under the supervision of prison officers, were encamped on an island off which yachts were moored. Some of the boys, in an attempt to escape from the island, boarded a yacht and manœuvred it so as to damage another. This was the very thing that might reasonably be foreseen as likely to happen if the prison officers did not take reasonable care to control the activities of the boys. The relationship of the officers to the boys was analogous to that between parent and children, a relationship described by Dixon J. in Smith v. Leurs (1945) 70 C.L.R. 256, 261–262, as capable of giving rise to a duty of control, saying:

“apart from vicarious responsibility, one man may be responsible to another for the harm done to the latter by a third person; he may be responsible on the ground that the act of the third person could not have taken place but for his own fault or breach of duty. There is more than one description of duty the breach of which may produce this consequence. For instance, it may be a duty of care in reference to things involving special danger. It may even be a duty of care with reference to the control of actions or conduct of the third person. It is, however, exceptional to find in the law a duty to control another’s actions to prevent harm to strangers. The general rule is that one man is under no duty of controlling another man to prevent his doing damage to a third. There are, however, special relations which are the source of a duty of this nature. It appears now to be recognised that it is incumbent upon a parent who maintains control over a young child to take reasonable care so to exercise that control as to avoid conduct on his part exposing the person or property of others to unreasonable danger. Parental control, where it exists, must be exercised with due care to prevent the child inflicting intentional damage on others or causing damage by conduct involving unreasonable risk of injury to others.”

It is true that in the Dorset Yacht case [1970] A.C. 1004 a question arose as to whether the decision of the Home Office to give Borstal boys a measure of freedom in order to assist in their rehabilitation fell within the ambit of a discretionary power the exercise of which was not capable of being called in question. But that question did not reach into the conduct of the officers who were in charge of the boys in the circumstances prevailing on the island. Having regard to these circumstances, it was not difficult to arrive, as a matter of judgment, at the conclusion that a close and direct relationship of proximity existed

3 W.L.R.

Yuen Kun Yeu v. A.-G. of Hong Kong (P.C.)

A between the officers and the owners of the yachts, sufficient to require the former, as a matter of law, to take reasonable care to prevent the boys from interfering with the yachts and damaging them.

The second stage of Lord Wilberforce's test in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, 752, is one which will rarely have to be applied. It can arise only in a limited category of cases where, notwithstanding that a case of negligence is made out on the proximity basis, public policy requires that there should be no liability. One of the rare cases where that has been held to be so is Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 A.C. 191, dealing with the liability of a barrister for negligence in the conduct of proceedings in court. Such a policy consideration was invoked in Hill v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1126. In that case the mother of the last victim of a notorious murderer of young women, who was not apprehended until after he had perpetrated 13 murders and eight attempted murders, sued the chief constable of the area on the ground of the negligence of his force in failing to apprehend the murderer before the death of her daughter. The Court of Appeal struck out the statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action, upon the principal ground that no relationship of proximity had existed between the police and the deceased girl. Glidewell L.J., however, in a judgment concurred in by Sir Roualeyn Cumming-Bruce, said, at p. 1140:

"If the police were liable to be sued for negligence in the investigation of crime which has allowed the criminal to commit further crimes, it must be expected that actions in this field would not be uncommon. Investigative police work is a matter of judgment, often no doubt dictated by experience or instinct. The threat that a decision which, in the end, proved to be wrong might result in an action for damages would be likely to have an inhibiting effect on the exercise of that judgment. The trial of such actions would very often involve the retrial of matters which had already been tried at the Crown Court. While no doubt many such actions would fail, preparing for and taking part in the trial of such an action would inevitably involve considerable work and time for a police force, and thus either reduce the manpower available to detect crime or increase expenditure on police services. In short, the reasons for holding that the police are immune from an action of this kind are similar to those for holding that a barrister may not be sued for negligence in his conduct of proceedings in court: Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 A.C. 191."

In view of the direction in which the law has since been developing, their Lordships consider that for the future it should be recognised that the two-stage test in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, 751-752, is not to be regarded as in all circumstances a suitable guide to the existence of a duty of care.

H The primary and all-important matter for consideration, then, is whether in all the circumstances of this case there existed between the commissioner and would-be depositors with the company such close and direct relations as to place the commissioner, in the exercise of his functions under the Ordinance, under a duty of care towards would-be depositors. Among the circumstances of the case to be taken into account is that one of the purposes of the Ordinance (though not the only one) was to make provision for the protection of persons who deposit money. The restrictions and obligations placed on registered deposit taking companies, fenced by criminal sanctions, in themselves went a long way to secure that object. But the discretion given to the commissioner to register or deregister such companies, so as effectively to confer or remove the right to do business, was also an important part of the protection afforded. No doubt it was reasonably foreseeable by the commissioner that if an uncreditworthy company were placed on or allowed to remain on the register, persons who might in the future deposit money with it would be at risk of losing that money. But mere foreseeability of harm does not create a duty, and future would-be depositors cannot be regarded as the only persons whom the commissioner should properly have in contemplation. In considering the question of removal from the register, the immediate and probably disastrous effect on existing depositors would be a very relevant factor. It might be a very delicate choice whether the best course was to deregister a company forthwith or to allow it to continue in business with some hope that, after appropriate measures by the management, its financial position would improve. It must not be overlooked that the power to refuse registration, and to revoke or suspend it, is quasi judicial in character, as is demonstrated by the right of appeal to the Governor in Council conferred upon companies by section 34 of the Ordinance, and the right to be heard by the commissioner conferred by section 47. The commissioner did not have any power to control the day to day management of any company, and such a task would require immense resources. His power was limited to putting it out of business or allowing it to continue. No doubt recognition by the company that the commissioner had power to put it out of business would be a powerful incentive unpelling the company to carry on its affairs in a responsible manner, but if those in charge were determined upon fraud it is doubtful if any supervision could be close enough to prevent it in time to forestall loss to depositors. In these circumstances their Lordships are unable to discern any intention on the part of the legislature that in considering whether to register or deregister a company the commissioner should owe any statutory duty to potential depositors. It would be strange that a common law duty of care should be superimposed upon such a statutory framework.

On the plaintiffs' case as pleaded the immediate cause of the loss suffered by the plaintiffs in this case was the conduct of the managers of the company in carrying on its business fraudulently, improvidently and in breach of many of the provisions of the Ordinance. Another cause was the action of the plaintiffs in depositing their money with a company which in the event turned out to be uncreditworthy. Considerable information about the company was available from the documents required by the Ordinance to be open to public inspection, and no doubt advice could have been readily obtained from investment advisers in Hong Kong. Before the plaintiffs deposited their money with the company there was no relationship of any kind between them and the commissioner. They were simply a few among the many inhabitants of Hong Kong who might choose to deposit their money with that or any other deposit taking company. The class to whom the commissioner's duty is alleged to have been owed must include all such inhabitants. It is true, however, that according to the plaintiffs' averments there had been available to him information about the company's affairs which was not available to the public and which raised serious doubts, to say the least of it, about the company's stability. That raises the question whether there existed between the commissioner and the company and its managers a special relationship of the nature described by Dixon J.

Yuen Kun Yeu v. A.-G. of Hong Kong (P.C.)

A in Smith v. Leurs, 70 C.L.R. 256, 261–262, and such as was held to exist between the prison officers and the Borstal boys in Dorset Yacht Co. Ltd. v. Home Office [1970] A.C. 1004, so as to give rise to a duty on the commissioner to take reasonable care to prevent the company and its managers from causing financial loss to persons who might subsequently deposit money with it.

B In contradistinction to the position in the Dorset Yacht case, the commissioner had no power to control the day-to-day activities of those who caused the loss and damage. As has been mentioned, the commissioner had power only to stop the company carrying on business, and the decision whether or not to do so was clearly well within the discretionary sphere of his functions. In their Lordships' opinion the circumstance that the commissioner had, on the plaintiffs' averments, cogent reason to suspect
C that the company's business was being carried on fraudulently and improvidently did not create a special relationship between the commissioner and the company of the nature described in the authorities. They are also of opinion that no special relationship existed between the commissioner and those unascertained members of the public who might in future become exposed to the risk of financial loss through depositing money with the company. Accordingly their Lordships do not consider that the D commissioner owed to the plaintiffs any duty of care on the principle which formed the ratio of the Dorset Yacht case. To hark back to Lord Atkin's words in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562, 581, there were not such close and direct relations between the commissioner and the plaintiffs as to give rise to the duty of care desiderated.

E The plaintiffs, however, advanced an argument based upon their averment of having relied upon the registration of the company when they deposited their money with it. It was said that registration amounted to a seal of approval of the company, and that by registering the company and allowing the registration to stand, the commissioner made a continuing representation that the company was creditworthy. In the light of the information in the commissioner's possession that representation was made negligently and led to the plaintiffs' loss.

F In Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] A.C. 465 the House of Lords held that a negligent misrepresentation about a customer's creditworthiness, given in answer to an inquiry, might give rise to a claim for damages at the instance of the party making the inquiry who had foreseeably relied on the representation and suffered financial loss thereby. Likewise in Junior Books Ltd. v. Veitchi Co. Ltd. [1983] 1 A.C. 520 it was held that a nominated specialist sub-contractor might be liable
G for economic loss caused to the building owner by negligent performance of the sub-contracted work, in circumstances where the building owner had, to the sub-contractor's knowledge, relied on his skill and experience. These decisions turned on the voluntary assumption of responsibility towards a particular party, giving rise to a special relationship. Lord Devlin in the Hedley Byrne case [1964] A.C. 465, 530, proceeded upon the H proposition that wherever there is a relationship equivalent to a contract, there is a duty of care. In the present case there was clearly no voluntary assumption by the commissioner of any responsibility towards the plaintiffs, in relation to the affairs of the company. It was argued, however, that the effect of the Ordinance was to place such a responsibility upon him. Their Lordships consider that the Ordinance placed a duty on the commissioner to supervise deposit-taking companies in the general public interest, but no special responsibility towards individual members of the public. His position is analogous to that of a police force, which in Hill v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1126 was held to owe no duty towards individual potential victims of crime. The Ordinance was designed to give added protection to the public against unscrupulous or improvident managers of deposit-taking companies, but it cannot reasonably be regarded, nor should it have been by any investor, as having instituted such a far-reaching and stringent system of supervision as to warrant an assumption that all deposit-taking companies were sound and fully creditworthy. While the investing public might reasonably feel some confidence that the provisions of the Ordinance as a whole went a long way to protect their interests, reliance on the fact of registration as a guarantee of the soundness of a particular company would be neither reasonable nor justifiable, nor should the commissioner reasonably be expected to know of such reliance, if it existed. Accordingly their Lordships are unable to accept the plaintiffs' arguments about reliance as apt, in all the circumstances, to establish a special relationship between them and the commissioner such as to give rise to a duty of care.

Consideration is due to two cases in different jurisdiction which were founded on by the plaintiffs. The earlier in date is States of Guernsey v. Firth (unreported), 14 May 1981, Court of Appeal of Guernsey (Civil Division) (Appeal No. 10 Civil), a decision of the Court of Appeal of Guernsey upon the defendants' application to strike out the plaintiff's statement of claim as not disclosing any cause of action. The Protection of Depositors (Bailiwick of Guernsey) Ordinance 1971 made it an offence to carry on the business of accepting money on deposit unless the person carrying on such business was registered by the States Advisory and Finance Committee. Section 13 of the Ordinance required the committee from time to time to publish the names and addresses of all registered persons. According to the statement of claim a certain company was registered in 1972 and continued to be so until 31 December 1976. The committee did not renew the company's registration for 1977, but did not at any time between 1 January 1977 and 31 December 1978 publish a list of registered persons. In the meantime the company continued to carry on business illegally and the plaintiff deposited money with it, which she lost when the company went into liquidation in December 1978. She sued the committee for damages in respect of the loss on the ground of the latter's breach of their duty under section 13 of the Ordinance in failing to publish any list of registered persons during the two years in question. The Court of Appeal (Sir Godfray Le Quesne Q.C. (President), J. J. Clyde Q.C. and L. H. Hoffmann Q.C.) decided that on a proper construction of section 13 the Committee was under a mandatory duty to publish lists of registered persons as often as might be necessary to keep the public reasonably informed, and further, applying Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium [1949] A.C. 398, that the section gave a right of action to any depositor who might suffer loss through its breach. Accordingly the plaintiff had a cause of action against the committee. The decision was concerned with the construction of an enactment imposing a specific statutory duty which was alleged to have been breached. Their Lordships therefore do not consider it to be in point for the purposes of the present appeal, which is concerned with the existence of a common law duty of care, and do not think it appropriate to express any opinion as to its correctness.

The second case is Baird v. The Queen (1983) 148 D.L.R. (3d) 1, a decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Canada. That case too was concerned with the question whether the plaintiffs' pleadings should be

A duty of care, and do not think it appropriate to express any opinion as to its correctness.

The second case is Baird v. The Queen (1983) 148 D.L.R. (3d) 1, a decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Canada. That case too was concerned with the question whether the plaintiffs' pleadings should be struck out as not disclosing a reasonable cause of action. The question was answered in the negative, on the ground that it was not "plain and obvious beyond doubt" that the plaintiffs could not succeed. In that case also the plaintiffs had lost money which they had deposited with a company subject to licensing, inspection and regulation under statute, the Trust Companies Act 1970. That Act placed various duties and conferred certain functions in relation to companies within its scope upon the Minister of Finance and the Superintendent of Insurance. It was alleged that both these functionaries had failed to perform or negligently performed their statutory duties in a number of respects as regards the company in question. A number of issues of principle were discussed in the judgment of Le Dain J., but he preferred to leave the final decision upon them until after trial on the merits. In these circumstances, and considering that the relevant legislation there was different in important respects from the Hong Kong Ordinance, their Lordships have not derived material assistance from the case.

The final matter for consideration is the argument for the Attorney-General of Hong Kong that it would be contrary to public policy to admit the plaintiffs' claim, upon grounds similar to those indicated in relation to police forces by Glidewell L.J. in Hill v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1126, 1140. It was maintained that if the Commissioner were to be held to owe actual or potential depositors a duty of care in negligence, there would be reason to apprehend that the prospect of claims would have a seriously inhibiting effect on the work of his department. A sound judgment would be less likely to be exercised if the commissioner were to be constantly looking over his shoulder at the prospect of claims against him, and his activities would be likely to be conducted in a detrimentally defensive frame of mind. In the result, the effectiveness of his functions would be at risk of diminution. Consciousness of potential liability could lead to distortions of judgment. In addition, the principles leading to his liability would surely be equally applicable to a wide range of regulatory agencies, not only in the financial field, but also, for example, to the factory inspectorate and social workers, to name only a few. If such liability were to be desirable upon any policy grounds, it would be much better that the liability were to be introduced by the legislature, which is better suited than the judiciary to weigh up competing policy considerations.

Their Lordships are of opinion that there is much force in these arguments, but as they are satisfied that the plaintiffs' statement of claim does not disclose a cause of action against the commissioner in negligence they prefer to rest their decision upon that rather than upon the public policy argument.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed.

Evidence—Documentary—Bankers' books—Right to inspect and take copies as evidence—Cheques and credit slips—Whether "other records"—Whether order of inspection to be made—Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 11), s. 9(2) (as amended by Banking Act 1979 (c. 37), s. 51(1), Sch. 6, para. 1(1))¹

The wife sought ancillary financial relief in matrimonial proceedings against her husband and was also a defendant in proceedings for possession of the matrimonial home brought by the trustees of an unregistered charity of which the husband was chairman. The actions were consolidated. In the course of the action the wife sought an ex parte order under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879 for inspection of, inter alia, paid cheques and credit slips relating to specified accounts with a named bank. It was the bank's practice for cheques to be returned to the paying branch where they were either returned to customers, if they so requested, or collected together in unsorted bundles, according to the day of receipt. Credit slips were retained in similar bundles. The county court registrar granted the order. On appeal by the bank the judge varied the order by substituting an order which did not include cheques and credit slips.

On appeal by the wife:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that adding a cheque or credit slip to the bundles of such documents retained by a bank could not be regarded as making an entry in the records of the bank within the meaning of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879; that on the true construction of section 9, as amended, "other records" had to be construed ejusdem generis with "ledgers, day books, cash books and account books"; and that, accordingly, cheques and credit slips were not "other records" within the meaning of the Act (post, pp. 795D–F, 796E–F).

Williams v. Williams (C.A.)

A Louise Hamilton and Kathleen Palmer, the trustees of an unregistered charity known as the Hospital Aids Donation Society, sought possession of the matrimonial home at 102, St. Andrews Road, St. Annes-on-Sea, against the applicant and her husband, Sidney Richard Williams. On 24 February 1987 in the Blackpool County Court the applicant obtained an ex parte order pursuant to section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879, as amended, that her solicitors be at liberty to inspect and copy entries in the books of Barclays Bank Plc., Orpington, relating to specified accounts. On 10 March the applicant obtained a further ex parte order that her solicitors be at liberty to inspect and copy, inter alia, all paid cheques and credit slips relating to the accounts. The bank appealed against the order of 10 March, and on 3 April Judge Holt allowed the appeal and varied the order by substituting an order which did not, in terms, include credit slips or cheques.

B The applicant appealed on the grounds that (1) the judge erred in law in holding that cheques and credit slips issued upon or relating to accounts held at branches of Barclays Bank Plc. and thereafter retained at such branches did not constitute bankers' books for the purpose of an order for inspection thereof pursuant to section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879; (2) the judge erred in law in holding that the cheques retained by the bank constituted in themselves transactions conducted by the bank and accordingly were not or could not constitute records of such transactions; (3) there was no sufficient evidence on which the judge could find that, by reason of being kept in daily bundles in random order, cheques and credit slips retained by the bank were not records, that is, were not kept for reference or remembrance.

D The facts are stated in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R.

E Timothy Ryder for the applicant.

John Jarvis for the bank.

Cur. adv. vult.

F 10 July. The following judgments were handed down.

G SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. This appeal raises a short, but important, point under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879 as amended by the Banking Act 1979, section 51(1) and Schedule 6, paragraph 1. The point is whether the Act extends to paying-in slips and paid cheques retained by banks after the conclusion of the transactions to which they relate.

H The applicant has sought disclosure by the bank of copies of those documents for use as evidence in two different proceedings. In the first, in which she petitions for judicial separation from her husband, she also seeks ancillary financial orders. This involves ascertaining the income and capital resources of her husband, who is loath to assist and has ignored all orders for discovery. The applicant's case is that her husband has secret bank and building society accounts and, in addition, has used his position as chairman or director of an unincorporated and unregistered "charitable" organisation to conceal the extent of his own wealth by mixing his own moneys with those of the "charity" in its accounts with the Orpington branch of Barclays Bank. In the second, the trustees of the "charity" are seeking an order against both Mr. and Mrs. Williams for possession of the matrimonial home at St. Anne's-on-Sea alleging that it is owned by the "charity." The applicant's defence is that although it was bought with money drawn from the account of that organisation, the money used was that of her husband and that he is the beneficial owner of the house.

Clearly if justice is to be done, the applicant must be able to find out what payments have been made into and out of these charitable accounts and her husband's accounts and by and to whom such payments were made. The question is how this is to be achieved. As the bank concedes, she could obtain a subpoena duces tecum addressed to the appropriate officer of the bank requiring him to attend at the hearing with all documentation in the hands of the bank relating to the accounts of the "charity" and of her husband. However, this would probably, if not inevitably, lead to adjournments in both proceedings in order that the documents could be studied and further inquiries made. If, on the other hand, the applicant and her advisers could have this information in advance of the hearings, the financial and other costs of an adjournment would be avoided and indeed the chances of getting at the truth would be improved.

With these considerations in mind, on 24 February 1987 the applicant applied ex parte in the Blackpool County Court and obtained an order from Mr. Deputy Registrar Pickup requiring the bank to allow her and her solicitors

"to inspect and take copies of all entries in the books of Barclays Bank Plc., Orpington, Kent relating to [Mr. Williams's] account therewith and also the accounts of [the 'charity']."

On 10 March 1987 upon a further ex parte application the applicant obtained an extended order by Mr. Registrar Jeffreys in the following terms:

"1. further to the provisions of the order of Mr. Deputy Registrar Pickup, the solicitors for [the applicant] be at liberty to inspect and take copies of all entries in all of the records used and kept in the ordinary course of their business by Barclays Bank Plc., Orpington concerning and relating to the banking account or accounts of [Mr. Williams] and also of [the 'charity'] between 1 January 1978 and the date hereof (whether such records be written, or as microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval system) and in particular that they be at liberty to inspect and take copies of: (1) all paid cheques issued on any of the said accounts and all such other documentary or other records used by the said bank and identifying the recipient of any cheque paid on the said accounts; (2) all documentary or other records of payment into the said accounts, including credit slips, paying-in slips or counterfoils; (3) all documents of transfer recording or authorising payments from one of the said accounts to another thereof; (4) all standing orders or direct debit instructions as ordered in relation to the said accounts."

Upon being served with this later order, the bank appealed and Judge Holt varied it by substituting an order in the following terms:

"It is ordered that further to the provisions of the order of Mr. Deputy Registrar Pickup dated 24 day of February 1987 the solicitors for [the applicant] be at liberty to inspect and take copies of all entries in all of the records used and kept in the ordinary

3 W.L.R.

Williams v. Williams (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

- A course of their business by Barclays Bank Plc., Orpington concerning and relating to the banking account or accounts of [Mr. Williams] and also of [the 'charity'] between 1 January 1978 and the date hereof (whether such records be written, or as microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval system) and in particular that they be at liberty to inspect and take copies of all documents of transfer recording or authorising payments from one of the said accounts to another thereof."
- B

The applicant appeals seeking the restoration of the registrar's order of 10 March 1987.

- C We are told that the parties will have no difficulty in agreeing upon a schedule indicating the types of documents which fall to be disclosed under the registrar's or, as the case may be, the judge's orders and, for the purposes of the argument, it was assumed that the difference lay in the fact that under the registrar's order cheques drawn upon and paid out of the accounts of the named charity and of Mr. Williams together with paying-in slips relating to payments to the credit of those accounts would be disclosable, whereas under the judge's order they would not.

- D The first Bankers' Books Evidence Act was enacted in 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 48). Its purpose was set out in the long title:

- E "Whereas serious inconvenience has been occasioned to bankers and also to the public by reason of the ledgers and other account books having been removed from the banks for the purpose of being produced in legal proceedings: And whereas it is expedient to facilitate the proof of the transactions recorded in such ledgers and account books: Be it therefore enacted . . ."

The way this was achieved was by providing that entries in the bank's books should be admissible as prima facie evidence of the "matters, transactions and accounts recorded therein," subject to verification by the bank's officers and that copies of all such entries should be admissible in evidence without production of the originals.

- F The current Act, that of 1879, was described as, and was, an amending Act, but it took the form of repealing the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1876 and re-enacting it in a simpler and clearer form. Would that the legislature would adopt the same methods today.

The relevant provisions of the Act of 1879, as originally enacted, were:

- G "3. Subject to the provisions of this Act, a copy of any entry in a banker's book shall in all legal proceedings be received as prima facie evidence of such entry, and of the matters, transactions, and accounts therein recorded.

- H "4. A copy of an entry in a banker's book shall not be received in evidence under this Act unless it be first proved that the book was at the time of the making of the entry one of the ordinary books of the bank, and that the entry was made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that the book is in the custody or control of the bank. Such proof may be given by a partner or officer of the bank, and may be given orally or by an affidavit sworn before any commissioner or person authorised to take affidavits. . . .

"6. A banker or officer of a bank shall not, in any legal proceeding to which the bank is not a party, be compellable to produce any banker's book the contents of which can be proved under this Act, or to appear as a witness to prove the matters, transactions, and accounts therein recorded, unless by order of a judge made for special cause.

"7. On the application of any party to a legal proceeding a court or judge may order that such party be at liberty to inspect and take copies of any entries in a banker's book for any of the purposes of such proceedings. An order under this section may be made either with or without summoning the bank or any other party, and shall be served on the bank three clear days before the same is to be obeyed, unless the court or judge otherwise directs. . . .

The Act in this form clearly contemplated that the banks had a series of books of various kinds which, in the course of the ordinary business of the bank, were in everyday use in that clerks made entries, that is to say wrote, in them. The transfer of any of these books to the court, with a consequent inability to make such entries, and indeed to consult the books, would have been a very considerable inconvenience. Hence the power to provide certified copies, not of the books, but of the relevant entries in the books. However there was no need for this power to extend, and it did not extend, to papers (including cheques and paying-in slips) which were retained in the bank's possession, but did not constitute an "entry in a banker's book."

In 1979 Parliament recognised that banks had replaced "books" with more sophisticated forms of "entry" recording "matters, transactions and accounts" and, by section 51(1) of, and paragraph 1 of Schedule 6 to, the Banking Act 1979, it amended the Act of 1879 by substituting a new definition of "bankers' books" in the following terms:

"9 (2) Expressions in this Act relating to 'bankers' books' include ledgers, day books, cash books, account books and other records used in the ordinary business of the bank, whether those records are in written form or are kept on microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval mechanism."

However, and this is highly significant, Parliament did not amend sections 3, 4 and 5 of the Act of 1879 which continued to refer to "a copy of an entry in a banker's book." The Parliamentary intention was, therefore, that section 3, incorporating the new definition, should read: ". . . a copy of any entry in a ledger, day book, cash book, account book or other record used in the ordinary business of the bank, whether those records are in written form or are kept on microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval mechanism shall in all legal proceedings be received as prima facie evidence of such entry, and of the matters, transactions and accounts therein recorded."

Sections 4 and 5 fall to be construed similarly.

For the purposes of this appeal it is not, I think, necessary to refer in detail to the evidence of how Barclays' cheques are collected, presented and paid. Suffice it to say that it is done by inter-bank and inter-branch credits and debits, which identify the cheques and the accounts upon which they are drawn by their numbers, but do not identify the payee by name. That information is only obtainable by looking at the cheque

3 W.L.R.

Williams v. Williams (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A itself. This is returned to the paying branch and, unless the customer asks for it to be returned to him, is retained by that branch. Furthermore, surprising though it may seem, if it is returned to the customer, no copy is made of the cheque. The only exception to this general statement of the position is that if an electronic reader-sorter is unable to read the magnetic numbers on a cheque, that cheque is rejected and is then B microfilmed and dealt with manually. The bank were minded to concede on the authority of Barker v. Wilson [1980] 1 W.L.R. 884 that the reel or sheet of microfilm might be regarded as a “banker’s book” within the new definition and that each photograph of a cheque might be regarded as an “entry.” Even if this is right, it would not help the applicant because only 3·5 to 4 per cent. of cheques are rejected by the bank’s reader-sorter and are photographed. Furthermore, the selection of which C cheques are dealt with in this way is entirely fortuitous, at least if the magnetic print has not been erased deliberately.

Cheques and paying-in slips retained by branches are not sorted in any way, all those received on a particular day being bundled up together in any order. A day’s bundle can contain 2,000 to 2,500 individual items. They are only referred to if a query arises and in that event, assuming that the relevant day can be identified, someone has to D sort through the whole of that day’s bundle.

In this situation Mr. Ryder, appearing for the applicant, has to submit, and does submit, that the bundles of cheques and paying-in slips constitute bankers’ books within the modern definition and that adding each cheque or paying-in slip to the bundle constitutes making an entry in those books. Whilst I would be prepared to accept that the cheques constitute part of the bank’s records used in the ordinary business of the E bank (Reg. v. Jones (Benjamin) [1978] 1 W.L.R. 195, a case concerned with a bill of lading put in evidence under the Criminal Evidence Act 1965), I am quite unable to accept that adding an individual cheque or paying-in slip can be regarded as making an “entry” in those records.
Putting the matter in another way, “other records” in the new definition has, I think, to be construed ejusdem generis with “ledgers, day books, F cash books and account books” and unsorted bundles of cheques and paying-in slips are not “other records” within the meaning of the Act.

For these reasons, which are substantially the same as those of Judge Holt, I would hold that the applicant is not entitled to the extended order which she sought. I do so with considerable regret, because in a proper case, of which this seems to be one, it should be possible to obtain disclosure of cheques and paying-in slips before the hearing. This G is something which I hope can be looked at by the relevant Rule Committees.

The bank have resisted this appeal for two reasons. First they say that they must preserve the confidentiality of the banker–customer relationship, unless this is over-ridden by an order of the court and they were not satisfied that, on the true construction of the Bankers’ Books Evidence Act 1879, the court had power to do so. These sentiments are H unexceptionable. Their second reason is less attractive. They point out that identifying particular paid cheques and paying-in slips is a very time-consuming, and therefore expensive, process bearing in mind their system of retaining such documents in an unsorted state. Understandably they are reluctant to undertake it even if they are reimbursed the cost involved. They are not therefore averse to a situation in which the only means by which such documents can be the subject of a court order for production is by subpoena duces tecum, since their experience is that few litigants will go to this length. Of course they put it more attractively, saying that in practice discovery of records, such as statements of account, under the Act normally provides the litigant with all that he needs and that if the Act were to extend to cheques and paying-in slips, courts would be liable to order their production automatically and without a proper regard for whether this was necessary in the interests of justice. All that may be correct, but I am not attracted by reliance upon procedural difficulties as a means of restricting orders for discovery, regardless of whether such discovery is necessary in the interests of justice.

On the facts of this case, it is not clear to me why, if this has not already been done, the court should not make a specific order requiring Mr. Williams to obtain the cheques and paying in slips relating to his account or accounts with the bank and to disclose them to the applicant and her solicitor. If, as seems likely, Mr. Williams failed to comply with this order, he could be committed for disobedience of the court order and the bank, as his agent holding these documents on his behalf, could then be required to disclose them. That does not, however, solve the problem of the cheques and paying in slips relating to the "charity" accounts. Mr. Williams would deny that they were in his possession, power or control. However I do not understand why the trustees of the "charity" should not be ordered to give discovery of them in the possession action. If, however, they are only discoverable by means of a subpoena duces tecum calling upon the appropriate officer of the bank to attend the hearing, I see no reason why the court should not order that the hearing should begin on a specified day and, so far as that day is concerned, be confined to receiving the documents, the remainder of the hearing standing adjourned to a date to be fixed.

I would dismiss the appeal.

Trinidad and Tobago—Town planning—Development—Refusal of planning permission for development of land as limestone quarry—Landowner claiming compensation in respect of refusal of permission—Whether proposed development material change in “use” of land—Whether compensation payable—Town and Country Planning Act (Laws of Trinidad and Tobago, 1980 ed., vol. 7, c. 35:01), ss. 2, 8(2), 26(1), 27(1)(a)

Section 2 of the Town and Country Planning Act provides: “‘use’ in relation to land, does not include the use of land by the carrying out of any building or other operations thereon.”
Section 8 provides:

E

“(1) . . . permission shall be required . . . for any development of land . . . (2) In this Act . . . ‘development’ means the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under any land, the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land . . .”

F

Section 26 makes provision for the payment of compensation if planning permission is refused but by section 27(1):

“Compensation . . . shall not be payable—(a) in respect of the refusal of permission for any development that consists of or includes the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land; . . .”

G

The plaintiff applied for permission to develop part of its land as a limestone quarry, but the Minister of Finance refused permission. Having unsuccessfully sought compensation in respect of that refusal from the minister under section 26(1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, the plaintiff commenced proceedings in the High Court of Trinidad and Tobago against the Attorney-General claiming, inter alia, a declaration that the refusal of permission was a nullity or that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation under the Act. The judge granted a declaration that compensation was payable, but he also held, although no declaration to that effect was made, that the minister’s decision was a nullity having been made in breach of the rules of natural justice. The Court of Appeal of Trinidad and Tobago allowed the Attorney-General’s appeal and set aside the declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation on the ground that since the minister’s decision was a nullity there was no refusal of permission with regard to which a claim for compensation could be made. The court remitted the plaintiff’s application to the minister for due consideration according to law.

On the plaintiff’s appeal to the Judicial Committee:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the application related to development of the land by carrying out mining operations for the winning and working of limestone; that by section 2 such mining operations were outside the statutory definition of "use" in relation to land, and so the proposed development would cause no material change in the use of the land, and that accordingly the exemption from payment of compensation afforded by section 27(1)(a) would be inapplicable to the refusal of permission for that development; that compensation would be payable to the plaintiff in respect of refusal of permission under section 26(1), being an amount equivalent to the difference between the value of the land with permission for quarrying limestone granted subject to the conditions which might reasonably and properly have been imposed, and its value without permission; and that, therefore, the Court of Appeal's order would be varied by the addition of a declaration that, if the application was refused, the plaintiff would be entitled to compensation under and subject to the provisions of Part IV of the Act (post, pp. 801G, 802A, B, F—G, H—803A).

Cur. adv. vult.

29 July. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH.

The appellant plaintiff owns some 200 acres of land in the Lopinot Valley of the Northern Range in the island of Trinidad. This litigation is concerned with a parcel of 22 acres now disused, but formerly a cocoa plantation ("the site"). The relevant law to which it will be necessary to refer in this judgment is found in the Town and Country Planning Act

3 W.L.R.

Lopinot Ltd. v. Attorney-General (P.C.)

A ("the Act") and the Town and Country Planning (General Development) Order ("the Order") of Trinidad and Tobago.

On 14 December 1978 the plaintiff applied to the minister pursuant to section 11 of the Act and clause 6 of the Order for permission to develop the site as a limestone quarry. Under section 11(1) of the Act, which in many respects mirrors the parallel United Kingdom legislation, the minister is empowered to grant permission either unconditionally or subject to such conditions as he thinks fit, or to refuse permission. By clause 6(6)(b) of the Order he was required to give notice to the plaintiff of the determination of the application within two months or such extended time as might be agreed in writing between them. No such agreement was made. By letter dated 28 May 1980 the minister notified the plaintiff that the permission sought was refused.

C The plaintiff wrote to the minister on 12 June 1980 claiming compensation under Part IV of the Act in respect of the refusal of permission, but, getting no satisfaction, instituted the present proceedings in the High Court of Justice of Trinidad and Tobago on 10 July 1980. The remedies sought included a number of declarations in the alternative. For present purposes it is sufficient to note that the plaintiff claimed: D (1) a declaration that the purported refusal of the application for planning permission was a nullity; (2) alternatively a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation in respect of the refusal under Part IV of the Act.

Logically the issues raised by these two alternative claims fell for determination in the order indicated, i.e. first the nullity issue, second the compensation issue. But at the trial before Lennox Deyalsingh J. the judge was invited and agreed to determine the compensation issue first. He held that the refusal attracted compensation and so declared. But counsel for the plaintiff was understandably anxious, lest the case should go further on the compensation issue, to have the benefit of the judge's findings of fact bearing on the nullity issue. The judge proceeded to make findings of fact leading to the conclusion that the decision to refuse planning permission was made in breach of the rules of natural justice and was a nullity. But at the request of counsel for the plaintiff he refrained from making any declaration to that effect.

The Attorney-General appealed to the Court of Appeal of Trinidad and Tobago on a wide variety of grounds. He failed on all of them save one. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on the narrow ground, put shortly, that, as the judge had rightly held the minister's decision to be a nullity, there was no refusal of planning permission and therefore no basis for a claim for compensation. They expressed no opinion as to whether or not a valid refusal of the plaintiff's application for planning permission in this case would, on the true construction of the Act, attract compensation under Part IV. They set aside the judge's order and ordered that the plaintiff's application for planning permission be remitted to the minister for due consideration according to law. The plaintiff appeals to the Board by leave of the Court of Appeal of Trinidad and Tobago.

H It appeared to their Lordships at the outset that it would be most unfortunate that this lengthy, tortuous and no doubt expensive litigation should terminate without a decision of the question whether, in the event of a refusal of planning permission by the minister when he reconsiders the plaintiff's application, the plaintiff will be entitled to compensation. They put this view to counsel. Dr. Ramsahoye, for the plaintiff, was content to accept that, if this question could be resolved by an appropriate declaration, he need not challenge the Court of Appeal's order remitting the plaintiff's planning application to the minister. Mr. Anthony Lester, for the Attorney-General, realistically and helpfully accepted that it would be appropriate for the Board in this way to determine the compensation issue which, though presently still hypothetical, is certainly not academic. The issue was accordingly fully argued and now falls for decision.

Permission is required by section 8(1) of the Act for any development of land and "development", as defined by section 8(2), includes "the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under any land" and "the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land." By definition in section 2 "'use' in relation to land, does not include the use of land by the carrying out of any building or other operations thereon." Section 26(1) of the Act provides:

"If on a claim made to the minister in the manner prescribed by regulations made under this Act, it is shown that, as a result of a planning decision involving a refusal of permission or a grant thereof subject to conditions, the value of the interest of any person in the land to which the planning decision relates is less than it would have been if the permission had been granted or had been granted unconditionally, then the minister shall, subject to the provisions of this Part, pay to that person compensation (to be assessed in accordance with the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act), of an amount equal to the difference."

Their Lordships were informed that no regulations for the purposes of this subsection have been made. Section 27(1) of the Act, so far as material, provides:

"Compensation under this Part shall not be payable—(a) in respect of the refusal of permission for any development that consists of or includes the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land; . . . (d) in respect of the imposition, on the granting of permission to develop land, of any condition relating to—(i) the number or disposition of buildings on any land; (ii) the dimensions, design, structure or external appearance of any building, or the materials to be used in its construction; (iii) the manner in which any land is to be laid out for the purposes of the development, including the provision of facilities for the parking, loading, unloading or fuelling of vehicles on the land; (iv) the use of any buildings or other land; or (v) the location or design of any means of access to a highway, or the materials to be used in the construction thereof; (e) in respect of any condition subject to which permission is granted for the winning and working of minerals; . . ."

The submission for the Attorney-General is that compensation is excluded in respect of a refusal of planning permission for development consisting in the quarrying of limestone by section 27(1)(a) in that such

3 W.L.R.

Lopinot Ltd. v. Attorney-General (P.C.)

A development consists of or includes the making of a material change in the use of land. In In re Claim of Viscount Securities Ltd. (unreported), 21 December 1976, High Court of the Republic of Eire, Transcript No. 1976/229 S.S., Finlay P. had to consider a similar submission in relation to parallel provisions of Irish planning legislation. There, as here, a general entitlement to compensation for refusal of planning permission (section 55 of the Irish Local Government (Planning and Development) Act 1963) was qualified by an exclusion of compensation in the case of refusal of planning permission for development consisting of or including the making of a material change in the use of land (section 56(1)(a) of the Irish Act) and "use" in relation to land was defined in terms to the like effect as those used in the Act under consideration. It was argued for the planning authority that no compensation was payable in respect of a refusal of permission to build dwelling houses on agricultural land because such development included the making of a material change in the use of the land. Finlay P. rejected the argument. He pointed out that to accept it would attenuate the general right to compensation almost to vanishing point. The definition of "use" in relation to land, by giving the word an artificial meaning narrower than its meaning in ordinary parlance, had the effect of dividing development into two broad categories. In terms of section 8(2) of the Act which their Lordships have to consider, the broad categories are on the one hand "the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under any land" and on the other hand "the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land." Finlay P. concluded:

E "If one accepts these two broad divisions of development not necessarily always exclusive and sometimes inevitably overlapping it is reasonable and consistent with the general provisions of the Act to construe section 56(1)(a) as excluding from the right to compensation an owner of land whose development has been refused permission in respect of the second category namely in the artificial sense the material change of user in the land or structures. The practical effect of such a construction would be that the general right to compensation contained in section 55 would not be nullified or attenuated to a minimal extent as would arise if the narrower construction of section 56(1)(a) were made. . . . I am, accordingly, satisfied that it is the proper construction to apply to this subsection and that the true meaning of it is that it excludes only from compensation a development consisting of or including a material change in the use of a structure or land other than the carrying out of works on this land."

H Their Lordships find this reasoning convincing and applicable to the Act which they have to construe. Mr. Lester did not seriously challenge this view, but sought to distinguish building operations on the one hand and mining operations on the other, at all events where the latter consist of working a quarry. Erecting a building, he submitted, is a once and for all operation. Working a quarry, on the other hand, although involving a series of mining operations, is a continuing activity involving a use of land in ordinary language which the definition of "use" in section 2 of the Act is not effective to exclude. Their Lordships cannot accept the validity of this distinction. The winning and working of minerals from a quarry is no more than a series of mining operations, as the minerals are progressively excavated, to which the activities carried on for the purpose of working the quarry are merely incidental. For present purposes there can be no distinction in principle, based on the difference in time scale, between such mining operations and building operations, to which the activities of builders carrying out the operations are likewise incidental. Like building operations, mining operations are "other operations" excluded by the definition from the statutory meaning of "use" in relation to land.

But, independently of all these considerations, the issue, in their Lordships' judgment, is put beyond doubt by section 27(1)(e) of the Act. It is inconceivable that the legislature should have relied on the generality of the language of section 27(1)(a) to express an intention to exclude compensation in respect of the outright refusal of planning permission for the winning and working of minerals when they thought it necessary, by section 27(1)(e), to provide clearly and specifically for the much less draconian exclusion of compensation in the case of a grant of such a permission subject to conditions.

That is sufficient to resolve the compensation issue, but it may be of assistance to the parties and reduce the scope for disputes in this matter in the future if their Lordships add some supplementary observations.

Reading the documents which constitute the application for planning permission dated 14 December 1978, which include a quarry survey report, as a whole, it appears that the permission sought is to win and work the limestone on the site by blasting, crushing, screening and washing; outline permission is sought for the erection of certain ancillary buildings such as an office, storeroom and rest room. It is proposed to work the quarry in stages, taking three acres at a time, and then, as each three acre portion is exhausted, to reclaim the land for agricultural use. If, on reconsideration, the minister decides to grant permission, all these matters will no doubt require to be regulated by carefully defined conditions, which can properly be imposed without attracting liability to pay compensation by virtue of section 27(1)(e) of the Act. The conditions which may be imposed must not, of course, be so restrictive as to frustrate the working of the quarry. That would amount in effect to a refusal of permission disguised as a conditional grant.

If, on the other hand, the remission of the application for reconsideration by the minister leads to a refusal, the resulting claim for compensation under section 26(1) will fall to be quantified, in the light of section 27(1)(e), by comparing the value of the site without permission for quarrying with its value if permission had been granted subject to such conditions as might reasonably and properly have been imposed.

It is common ground that the planning application must now be determined with all reasonable expedition and to that end the plaintiff has undertaken to submit to the minister any such further evidence and representations as it wishes the minister to consider within three months of the Board's order and the Attorney-General has undertaken on behalf of the minister that he will (whether or not any further evidence or representations are submitted to him) give notice to the plaintiff of the determination of the application within six months of the Board's order. Upon those undertakings their Lordships affirm the order of the

3 W.L.R.

Lopinot Ltd. v. Attorney-General (P.C.)

A Court of Appeal that the plaintiff's application for planning permission be remitted to the minister for due consideration according to law. But their Lordships vary the order of the Court of Appeal by the addition of a declaration that, if the application is refused, the plaintiff will be entitled to compensation under and subject to the provisions of Part IV of the Act. To that extent the appeal is allowed.

B In the light of this outcome, it is very properly conceded on behalf of the Attorney-General that he should pay the plaintiff's costs of the proceedings before the judge of first instance and of the appeal from the Court of Appeal to the Board and their Lordships so order. As regards the costs of the proceedings before the Court of Appeal their Lordships can find no sufficient reason to depart from the view of the Court of Appeal that each party should be left to bear its own costs. Accordingly

C there will be no order in respect of the costs incurred in the Court of Appeal.

Crime—Forgery—False instrument—Computer—Unauthorised access into Prestel computer network—Entry of number and password causing electronic impulses to affect computer's user segment momentarily—Whether electronic impulses "device"—Whether user segment "false instrument"—Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 (c. 45), ss. 1, 8(1)

G

The appellants, by means of a dishonest trick, gained unauthorised access into and used a computer network, by entering a number and password on a keyboard, thus causing electronic impulses to affect a part of the computer known as the user segment, which cleared itself on the number and password being checked automatically by the computer, the overall time involved being momentary. The appellants were indicted on specimen counts of forgery, contrary to section 1 of the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981.¹ At the close of the case for the prosecution the appellants submitted that there was no case to answer. The submission was rejected and the appellants were convicted.

¹ Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981, s. 1: see post, p. 806F–G. S. 8(1): see post, p. 806G–H.

On appeal against conviction, on the questions whether the electronic impulses were a "device" within section 8(1)(d) and whether the user segment was a "false instrument" within section 1:—

Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that, since the electronic impulses were not ejusdem generis with disc, tape or sound track and were not the device on which information was recorded or stored, they could not be a device within section 8(1)(d) (post, p. 808E-F).

(2) That, since forgery involved both a message about the document itself and a message in its words that was to be accepted and acted upon and since the user segment did not carry such messages, the user segment was not brought within the ambit of forgery; and that, therefore, the submission of no case to answer should have been upheld and the convictions would be quashed (post, pp. 809B-C, E, H, 810B).

Per curiam. The Act of 1981 does not seek to deal with information that is held for a moment while automatic checking takes place and is then expunged. The process is not one to which the words "recorded or stored" can properly be applied, suggesting as they do a degree of continuance (post, p. 809E-F).

No cases are referred to in the judgment or were cited in argument.

APPEALS against conviction.

The appellants, Stephen William Gold and Robert Jonathan Schifreen, were tried in the Crown Court at Southwark (Judge Butler Q.C.) on an indictment containing nine counts charging forgery against section 1 of the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 in that (except for details comprising the date of commission and a particular computer within the network of the Prestel computer) the particulars were that the named appellant

"made a false instrument, namely, a device on or in which information is recorded or stored by electronic means with the intention of using it to induce the Prestel computer to accept it as genuine and by reason of so accepting it to do an act to the prejudice of British Telecommunications Plc."

At the close of evidence for the prosecution, counsel for the appellants submitted that there was no case to answer, on the basis that the prosecution had failed to prove that the appellants had made a false instrument within the meaning of the Act of 1981. The submission was rejected, the appellants called but did not give evidence and on 24 April 1986, after a trial lasting nine days, the appellant Gold was convicted of four counts and the appellant Schifreen of five counts. The appellant Gold was fined £150 on each count, with 14 days' imprisonment consecutive on each in default and was ordered to pay £1,000 towards the costs of prosecution. The appellant Schifreen, who was convicted on five counts, was similarly fined with similar orders respecting default and costs. They appealed against conviction on the grounds, inter alia, that the judge erred in not acceding to the submission of no case to answer, in that the prosecution had failed to establish that the appellants had made a device or an instrument by transmitting electronic impulses.

B Cur. adv. vult.

17 July. LORD LANE C.J. read the following judgment of the court. On 24 April 1986 in the Crown Court at Southwark, the appellants were convicted of contravening the provisions of the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981. They were sentenced as follows: Gold, who was convicted on four counts, was fined £150 on each with 14 days' imprisonment on each in default, and ordered to pay £1,000 towards the prosecution costs; C Schifreen, who was convicted on five counts, was fined £150 on each with the same term in default, and the same order with regard to costs. They now appeal against both conviction and sentence.

The case involved the unauthorised access gained into the British Telecom Prestel Computer Network between October 1974 and January 1985 by the appellants who were what is known as computer "hackers." D This is said to be the first occasion on which this kind of activity has been made the subject of charges under the Act.

The nine counts in the indictment were specimens. Save for the date and the particular computer involved, each count was similar, alleging, as it did, that the appellant in question:

E "made a false instrument, namely, a device on or in which information is recorded or stored by electronic means with the intention of using it to induce the Prestel Computer to accept it as genuine and by reason of so accepting it to do an act to the prejudice of British Telecommunications Plc."

F There is little, if any, dispute about the factual background to the case. Some description of it is necessary in order to understand the way in which the appellants went about their activities.

Prestel is an information system which allows people who have the necessary micro-computers to call up a computer database and to receive information therefrom. Access to the Prestel computer is by way of the British Telecom telephone system. When the computer's number is G dialled, the telephone system connects the dialler to the appropriate Prestel Centre.

In order legitimately to obtain information from the Prestel database, it is necessary to register as a user by filling in an application form and paying a rental charge. Once that is done, the user is allocated an identity number consisting of ten numerals and also a password.

H The user has, as part of his equipment, a television screen and a keyboard. After he has become connected to the particular Prestel computer which he has dialled, a picture will appear on his television screen inviting him to "log on." He then types in his customer identification number ("C.I.N."). That is verified by the computer. Next the user types out his password, which is also verified by the computer. If the computer has been able to match up the C.I.N. and the password with the user information which it has in its memory, the user is then admitted to those parts of Prestel database which he has been authorised to use. He can then type out his request for information on his keyboard.

In order to understand the nature of the charges, it is necessary to examine in a little more detail the procedure whereby the computer verifies the C.I.N. and the password. When the user telephones the computer, the call is answered by a device called a "port." A port is analogous to a doorway into the system. There is one port for each telephone line. The port tells the computer that a new call has been made and that the user needs to be shown the logging frame. The logging frame is then shown to the user on his television screen. The user then types out his C.I.N. This passes down the telephone line as a series of electronic impulses. There is a part of each computer which is reserved for dealing with the input and output and the control of each port.

The C.I.N. is received in a particular area reserved for that port alone. That area is called a user segment. Each user segment has three areas: (1) the input buffer, (2) the control area and (3) the output buffer. The word "buffer" in this context is used to describe an area in a computer which is used to receive information from or to transmit information to the outside world. When the user keys in his C.I.N., that is received in the input buffer and is then immediately moved in the control area and retained there for the duration of the logging procedure. This may be a very brief time indeed.

In order to verify the customer's identity and the password, the user's details must be accessed from the data base to determine whether he is a valid user or not. It is the function of the logging procedure to compare the C.I.N. with the information already contained in the user file. If there is no C.I.N. on the user file which matches that which has been typed in by the user, then the user is given up to three attempts to repeat his C.I.N. The same procedure is then adopted with the password. If those two checks are completed successfully, the user is then allowed into the Prestel computer.

After these operations are over, the areas in the user segment that were used for the C.I.N. and the password are cleared. Thereafter the input buffer is used to receive the instructions being keyed in by the user and the output buffer is used to show the information which has been requested upon the user's terminal.

The relevant provisions in the Act are as follows. Section 1:

"A person is guilty of forgery if he makes a false instrument, with the intention that he or another shall use it to induce somebody to accept it as genuine, by reason of so accepting it to do or not to do some act to his own or any other person's prejudice."

Section 8(1):

"in this Part of this Act 'instrument' means— . . . (d) any disc, tape sound track or other device on or in which information is recorded or stored by mechanical, electronic or other means . . ."

Section 9:

"(1) An instrument is false for the purposes of this Part of this Act—(a) if it purports to have been made in the form in which it is made by a person who did not in fact make it in that form; or (b) if it purports to have been made in the form in which it is made on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise its making in

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Gold (C.A.)

A that form . . . (2) A person is to be treated for the purposes of this Part of this Act as making a false instrument if he alters an instrument so as to make it false in any respect (whether or not it is false in some other respect apart from that alteration)."

Section 10:

B "(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (4) below, for the purposes of this Part of this Act an act or omission intended to be induced is to a person's prejudice if, and only if, it is one which, if it occurs— . . . (c) will be the result of his having accepted a false instrument as genuine . . . in connection with his performance of any duty . . . (3) In this Part of this Act references to inducing somebody to accept a false instrument as genuine . . . include references to inducing a machine to respond to the instrument . . . as if it were a genuine instrument . . .

C (4) Where subsection (3) above applies, the act or omission intended to be induced by the machine responding to the instrument . . . shall be treated as an act or omission to a person's prejudice."

D On any view this, if it was forgery at all, was a very unusual form of it. The appellants did not dispute that they had gained access to the relevant Prestel data bank by means of a dishonest trick. Their object was not so much to gain any profit for themselves as to demonstrate their skill as "hackers." Although they no doubt appreciated that they were in a "grey area of the law," as one of them said to the police, there is no evidence or likelihood that they suspected that they might be contravening the provisions of the Act.

E At the root of the whole case was the question: what was the false instrument which the appellants had made? Or (to expand the question by importing the definition in section 8(1)), what was the device (ejusdem generis with disc, tape and sound track) on or in which information was recorded or stored by electronic means?

F Surprisingly, no firm answer to that question appeared until much of the trial was over. No particulars were requested. The first positive inquiry came from the judge, who asked prosecuting counsel during submissions at the close of the prosecution case: "If I were to say to you, 'what is the instrument?', what would you reply?" Counsel: "The answer I would have to give would be the user segment." That is an answer which does not exude great confidence. In his ruling on the submissions, the judge had this to say:

G "the defendant here made a series of electrical impulses which arrive at, affect and operate on what is called a user segment. These impulses are . . . recorded or stored, albeit for a limited period only. No doubt nothing can be touched, but that is always inherent in the recording process, and, quite apart from that, by section 9(2) an alteration to an instrument is sufficient and here there was, as I see it, an alteration to a user segment."

H So there the judge is saying that the appellants made a false instrument by altering the user segment by means of the impulses which they keyed into the system.

In his direction to the jury the judge put the matter in this way:

"If you are a member and you put in your own details, of course there is no problem, but, say the prosecution, if you input somebody else's number and password, you have made . . . a false instrument.

They liken it to making . . . a false visiting card . . . Now during the log-on process these electronic impulses have to be held albeit for a very short time indeed in . . . the input buffer which is in the user segment and checked for veracity . . . by the computer with the information it is already holding . . . No doubt it all takes a fraction of second. So there is made by the caller, say the prosecution, an instrument. By this process, they say, there has been created a device on or in which information is stored by electronic means. Now it is argued on behalf of the defendants such a construction is wholly artificial and unwarranted. Electronic impulses, they say, cannot be a device on or in which information is stored."

Our sympathies are with the judge, faced as he was with the formidable, if not almost impossible, task of putting before the jury fairly, accurately and intelligibly a concept which comes near to defying description. It is scarcely surprising if some confusion is detectable in the passages we have cited between the user segment itself and the electronic impulses which are put into it by the caller, legitimate or otherwise.

What we have to decide is whether the words of the Act are apt to cover what the appellants admittedly did.

The first and all-important matter which the prosecution had to prove was that the appellants made a false instrument. As already indicated, there were two possible candidates for that role, the electronic impulses and the user segment. Mr. Kalisher for the prosecution concedes that the judge, albeit understandably, did not make this aspect of the case altogether clear, but submits that since the facts were scarcely in dispute, no harm was done thereby.

If the device was the electronic impulses then, say the appellants, that cannot found a charge of forgery. First, they are not of the same genus as disc, tape or sound track. Secondly, they are no more than electronic translations of the C.I.N. and password and are part of the process of transmission; they are the information which may be recorded or stored; they are not the device on which information is recorded or stored. With those submissions we agree. Mr. Kalisher does not, as we understand it, dissent.

The other possibility is the user segment. Before us the prosecution based their case upon this as being the device which was falsified. Their argument runs as follows. The user segment of the relevant Prestel computer receives the information keyed into it by the caller, and, having received it (i.e., the C.I.N. and password), it retains or stores that information on semi-conductor chips or magnetic cords for the moment of time which is required to verify it against the user files which the computer has in its memory. The falsity, goes the argument, is that specified in section 9(1)(a) or 9(1)(b) in that the instrument purports to have been made in that form by someone who did not make it or authorise its making. Once the check is successfully completed, the user segment is cleared. For that brief moment during which the user segment records or stores the false information it becomes a false instrument or device. It was made by the appellant who keyed in the CIN and password. Thus the first and vital ingredient in the offence is, on the prosecution's argument, established.

The fact that the false instrument only exists for a moment is immaterial, submits Mr. Kalisher. It makes no difference whether its life

Reg. v. Gold (C.A.)

A is a second or ten years, it has come into existence and that is all that the Act requires.

Although the simplicity of that submission is attractive, it requires closer examination before being accepted.

B Mr. Nicholls for the appellant Gold drew our attention to The Law Commission (Law. Com. No. 55) Criminal Law Report on Forgery and Counterfeit Currency of 1973 in order to demonstrate the mischief which the Act sought to remedy, and in particular what the words in section 1 as interpreted in section 8 were intended to cure.

C The report, in paragraph 22, points out that in the straightforward case of forgery, a document contains messages of two distinct kinds, first a message about the document itself (e.g., that it is a cheque), and secondly, a message to be found in the words of the document that is to be accepted and acted upon (e.g., that a banker is to pay £x). It is only documents which contain both types of message that require protection by the law of forgery.

D In paragraph 24 the report turns to the desirability of extending this protection to electronic devices. No difficulty arose over computerised printing of, e.g., false dividend warrants which would have been forgery without any necessity of amendment to the law. "The problem is related to the production of false recordings or information or instructions, whether on tape or other material which are stored for further use." The report then goes on to suggest words to bring such material within the Act, and they are almost identical with the words now found in section 8.

E The mischief sought to be remedied was the possibility of forgery by electronic means rather than by the hand-held pen. The basic concept of forgery did not require alteration. It only required adapting to electronic methods of creating false information or instructions which are recorded or stored for further use.

F In our judgment the user segment in the instant case does not carry the necessary two types of message to bring it within the ambit of forgery at all. Moreover, neither the report nor the Act, so it seems to us, seeks to deal with information that is held for a moment whilst automatic checking takes place and is then expunged. That process is not one to which the words "recorded or stored" can properly be applied, suggesting as they do a degree of continuance.

G There is a further difficulty. The prosecution had to prove that the appellants intended that someone should accept as genuine the false instrument which they had made. The suggestion here is that it was a machine (under section 10(3)) which the appellants intended to induce to respond to the false instrument. But the machine (i.e., the user segment) which was intended, so it was said, to be induced seems to be the very thing which was said to be the false instrument (i.e., the user segment) which was inducing the belief. If that is a correct analysis, the prosecution case is reduced to an absurdity.

H We have accordingly come to the conclusion that the language of the Act was not intended to apply to the situation which was shown to exist in this case. The submissions at the close of the prosecution case should have succeeded.

It is a conclusion which we reach without regret. The Procrustean attempt to force these facts into the language of an Act not designed to fit them produced grave difficulties for both judge and jury which we would not wish to see repeated.

The appellants' conduct amounted in essence, as already stated, to dishonestly gaining access to the relevant Prestel data bank by a trick. That is not a criminal offence. If it is thought desirable to make it so, that is a matter for the legislature rather than the courts. We express no view on the matter.

Our decision on this aspect of the case makes it unnecessary to determine the other issues raised by the appellants, in particular the submission that they should be found guilty of forgery when there was no evidence that either of them had any inkling that what they were doing might amount to a contravention of the Act.

*Appeals allowed.

20 July. The following order was made: (1) under section 16(4) of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 payment out of central funds of appellants' taxed costs in Court of Appeal, Crown Court and magistrates' court excepting costs incurred on 17 and 20 July; (2) under section 8(5) of the Legal Aid Act 1982 repayment of legal aid contributions of (a) appellant Gold of £208, and (b) of appellant Schifreen of £4,332; (3) taxation of £100 costs incurred by appellant Gold before legal aid; (4) under section 17(1)(a) of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 payment out of central funds of Crown's costs of appeal except for costs incurred on 17 and 20 July. An application for a certificate under section 33(2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 was adjourned.

31 July. The court certified that a point of law of general public importance was involved in the decision, namely, "(1) Whether, on a true construction of sections 1, 8, 9 and 10 of the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981, a false instrument is made in the following circumstances—(a) a person keys into a part of a computer (the user segment), a customer identification number and password of another, without the authority of that other, (b) with the intention of causing the same computer, to allow unauthorised access to its database, and (c) the user segment, upon receiving such information (in the form of electronic impulses), stores or records it for a very brief period whilst it checks it against similar information held in the user file of the database of the same computer. (2) Whether, in order to constitute a false instrument within the meaning of the said Act, an instrument must contain—(a) a message about the instrument itself, and (b) a message to be found in the words of the instrument that is to be accepted and acted upon. (3) Whether, in order for a person to be found guilty of forgery within the meaning of the said Act, he must be proved to have been aware of the relevant facts which constitute the making of the false instrument. (4) Whether the offence is made out if the 'somebody' whom the appellants allegedly intended should accept the false instrument as genuine (in this case—under section 10(3)—a machine) is the same machine as that which was said to be the false instrument, namely the user segment?"

Leave to appeal refused.

The employers employed both men and women as warehouse operatives and as checker warehouse operatives. The applicants, female warehouse operatives, claimed that they were entitled to equal pay with a male checker warehouse operative on the basis that they were doing work of equal value within the meaning of section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970,¹ as amended. The employers resisted the claim on the ground that the applicants were employed on like work with other male employees in the company within the meaning of section 1(2)(a) of the Act, and were not entitled to rely on the equal value provisions. An industrial tribunal upheld the employers' submission and dismissed the claims. The appeal tribunal dismissed the applicants' appeal holding that the express requirement in section 1(2)(c) that the work alleged to be of equal value was not work to which paragraph (a) or (b) applied excluded the applicants from relying on its provisions, and that, since section 1(2)(c) was unambiguous article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty² was not applicable.

Held, allowing the appeal, that the words "not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies" in section 1(2)(c) of the Act of 1970 were clear and unambiguous and, therefore, since the applicants were employed on like work as men within the meaning of paragraph (a), their claim based on work of equal value under paragraph (c) was excluded under the provisions of the Act; that, however, article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty created personal rights directly enforceable in national courts notwithstanding any restriction on such rights imposed by national legislation; and that, since the provisions of that article, as restated in article 1 of Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.), did not exclude a claim based on work of equal value where women were employed on like work with men, the applicants were not debarred from claiming that they were employed on work of equal value with the male comparator; and that, accordingly, the matter would be remitted to the industrial tribunal for determination whether their work was of equal value to that of the comparator and whether any difference in pay was due to factors unconnected with discrimination on the ground of sex (post, pp. 817G—818A, 820B—C, 821E—F, 822H—823B, 826F—G, 829A—B, 833D—834A, F, G—H, 835B—E).

APPEAL from the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

The applicants, I. Pickstone, A. Hepburn, P. J. Woolner, C. E. Fyffe and R. Roberts, five warehouse operatives, claimed against their employers, Freemans Plc., that they were entitled to equal pay to that of Mr. Phillips, who was employed as a checker warehouse operative, as their work as warehouse operatives was of equal value to his work within the meaning of section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970. The industrial tribunal sitting at Cambridge dismissed their claim on the ground that a claim under paragraph (c) relying on work of "equal value" could only be made if the applicant was unable to rely on the "like work" provision in section 1(2)(a). On the applicants' appeal, the appeal tribunal [1986] I.C.R. 886 dismissed the appeal on the ground that as they were employed on like work with men they could not claim that they were employed on work of equal value to that of another man under section 1(2)(c).

The applicants appealed on the grounds that (1) the appeal tribunal erred in law in deciding that, on its true construction, section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970, as amended, prohibited a woman from claiming equal pay for work of equal value by reference to named comparators

3 W.L.R.

It did not prevent a woman from claiming under the equal value provisions by reference to the work of one man merely because she did like work to another man; (3) the appeal tribunal erred in law in

- C (1) and (2) above or gave rights to the applicants upon which they might directly rely and against the employers in national courts and tribunals.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Nicholls L.J.

David Pannick for the applicants.

Christopher Carr Q.C. and Patrick Elias for the employers.

Cur. adv. vult.

D 25 March. The following judgments were handed down.

NICHOLLS L.J. This appeal concerns equal pay in cases of work of "equal value." Shortly stated, the question raised is whether a woman employed on work which is the same as that of one man but which is also of equal value with the work of another man, can claim equal pay with that other man where she is already being paid as much as the man engaged on the same work as herself. Both the industrial tribunal and the appeal tribunal have said no in answer to that question. We were told that there are many other claims before industrial tribunals awaiting the outcome of this appeal.

The five applicants, Mrs. Pickstone and four of her female colleagues, are employed by Freemans Plc., a mail order company, as "warehouse operatives." They contend that their work is of equal value to that of a Mr. Phillips, who is employed by the employers as a "checker warehouse operative." They are not paid as much as he is. So they made a complaint to the industrial tribunal, sitting at Cambridge. Before that tribunal the employers contended that men as well as women were employed as warehouse operatives, and paid equally, and that men and women were also employed as checker warehouse operatives. The employers submitted that in those circumstances it was not open to the applicants as warehouse operatives, paid equally with their male colleagues, to claim equality of pay with Mr. Phillips, a checker warehouse operative. Issue was joined before the industrial tribunal on that submission of law, without the facts being investigated and without any formal admission by the applicants that there are male employees doing like work to them. Thus, in effect, the industrial tribunal heard and decided a preliminary question of law on assumed facts.

The applicants base their claims on section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 and also on article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty.

Equal Pay Act 1970

Section 1(1) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 implies an equality clause into every contract of employment of a woman which does not already include such a clause. The nature and effect of an equality clause are set out in section 1(2). An equality clause has a similar effect in each of the three circumstances specified in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of section 1(2). Accordingly, for convenience I will omit sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii) from paragraphs (b) and (c) when setting out the material parts of section 1(2), as follows:

“(2) An equality clause is a provision which relates to terms (whether concerned with pay or not) of a contract under which a woman is employed (the ‘woman’s contract’), and has the effect that—(a) where the woman is employed on like work with a man in the same employment—(i) if (apart from the equality clause) any term of the woman’s contract is or becomes less favourable to the woman than a term of a similar kind in the contract under which that man is employed, that term of the woman’s contract shall be treated as so modified as not to be less favourable, and (ii) if (apart from the equality clause) at any time the woman’s contract does not include a term corresponding to a term benefiting that man included in the contract under which he is employed, the woman’s contract shall be treated as including such a term; (b) where the woman is employed on work rated as equivalent with that of a man in the same employment—(i) . . . and (ii) . . . (c) where a woman is employed on work which, not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies, is, in terms of the demands made on her (for instance under such headings as effort, skill and decision), of equal value to that of a man in the same employment—(i) . . . and (ii) . . .”

Like work under paragraph (a) means work of the same or of a broadly similar nature where any differences between what the woman does and what the man does are not of practical importance in relation to terms and conditions of employment. Work is only rated as equivalent under paragraph (b) if the woman’s and the man’s jobs have been rated as equivalent on a job evaluation study.

The employers’ argument, which was accepted by the industrial tribunal and the appeal tribunal, is straightforward. Paragraph (c), expressly and unambiguously, does not apply where the woman is employed on work to which either paragraph (a) or paragraph (b) applies. Paragraph (c) applies only where the woman is employed on work “not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies.” Hence, it was submitted, if the woman is in fact employed on like work with a man (meaning any man) in the same employment, paragraph (a) applies to her case whether she likes it or not, and she is thereby excluded from the scope of paragraph (c). Likewise with paragraph (b).

The applicants’ argument is that the exclusionary words in paragraph (c) “not being” are ambiguous, and that one of the possible meanings of the word “applies” is applies in the sense that the woman is not employed on like work with, or on work rated as equivalent with that of, a man in the same employment with whom the woman is comparing herself. It is for the applicant to choose the man with whose work she wishes to compare hers: Ainsworth v. Glass Tubes & Components Ltd. [1977] I.C.R. 347, and Parliament, when adding paragraph (c) to section 1(2) in 1983, cannot have intended to go against that principle and compel a woman to compare herself with a man under paragraph (a). In

Pickstone v. Freemans Plc. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A the present case the applicants are doing what traditionally has been “women’s work” and they should be free to have recourse for comparison to other work of equal value to theirs.

B In reply Mr. Carr submitted that this construction is untenable. The scheme of the section is to imply an equality clause into the woman’s contract, with immediate effect, viz., with effect from the inception of the woman’s contract. Where a woman is employed on like work with a man, paragraph (a) applies automatically, with the consequential, immediate deemed modification of the relevant term in the woman’s contract. Paragraph (a) applies in this way irrespective of whether any complaint is made to the industrial tribunal. Hence, if a complaint is made and is successful, the woman has a claim not merely for the future: she can claim arrears of remuneration or damages: section 2(1).
C But, continued Mr. Carr’s submission, Mr. Pannick’s construction is inconsistent with this, because on Mr. Pannick’s construction paragraph (a) would not apply (and, indeed, none of the paragraphs would apply) unless and until the woman selects a male comparable.

D Argument was also addressed to us on the mischief which section 1(2)(c) was intended to cure. This requires a consideration of Community law, because it was in response to a decision of the European Court of Justice that section 1(2)(c) was added to the Equal Pay Act 1970.

Community law: article 119

E The United Kingdom became a member of the European Economic Community on 1 January 1973, and the E.E.C. Treaty was introduced into English law by section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972. Article 119 is in these terms:

F “Each member state shall during the first stage ensure and subsequently maintain the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work. For the purpose of this article, ‘pay’ means the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind, which the worker receives, directly or indirectly, in respect of his employment for his employer. Equal pay without discrimination based on sex means: (a) that pay for the same work at piece rates shall be calculated on the basis of the same unit of measurement; (b) that pay for work at time rates shall be the same for the same job.”

G This article had two objects. First, in the economic field, to avoid the situation in which undertakings established in states which had implemented the principle of equal pay would suffer a disadvantage in competition within the Community with undertakings established in states which had not then eliminated pay discrimination against women workers. Secondly, in the social field, “by common action, to ensure H social progress and seek the constant improvement of the living and working conditions of [the member states] peoples:” see Defrenne v. Sabena [1976] I.C.R. 547, 565.

In 1975, concerned at the uneven progress being made by member states in implementation of article 119, the council of the European Communities adopted Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.), which it will be convenient to call “the equal pay directive.” The material parts of that Directive read:

"The Council of the European Communities . . . Whereas implementation of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay contained in article 119 of the Treaty is an integral part of the establishment and functioning of the common market; Whereas it is primarily the responsibility of the member states to ensure the application of this principle by means of appropriate laws, regulations and administrative provisions; . . . Whereas differences continue to exist in the various member states despite the efforts made to apply the resolution of the conference of the member states of 30 December 1961 on equal pay for men and women and whereas, therefore, the national provisions should be approximated as regards application of the principle of equal pay has adopted this Directive;

"Article 1.

"The principle of equal pay for men and women outlined in article 119 of the Treaty, hereafter called 'principle of equal pay,' means, for the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed, the elimination of all discrimination on grounds of sex with regard to all aspects and conditions of remuneration. In particular, where a job classification is used for determining pay, it must be based on the same criteria for both men and women and so drawn up as to exclude any discrimination on grounds of sex.

"Article 2.

"Member states shall introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to enable all employees who consider themselves wronged by failure to apply the principle of equal pay to pursue their claims by judicial process after possible recourse to other competent authorities . . .

"Article 4.

"Member states shall take the necessary measures to ensure that provisions appearing in collective agreements, wage scales, wage agreements or individual contracts of employment which are contrary to the principle of equal pay shall be, or may be declared, null and void or may be amended."

As authoritatively decided by the European Court of Justice, the first sentence of article 1 of the equal pay directive re-states the principle of equal pay set out in article 119 of the Treaty, but article 1 "in no way alters the content or scope of that principle as defined in the Treaty." The main purpose of article 1 of the Directive was to facilitate the practical application of that principle: see Jenkins v. Kingsgate (Clothing Productions) Ltd. (Case 96/80) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 972, 984.

Thus, as re-stated in article 1 of the equal pay directive, the principle embodied in article 119 of the Treaty is that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work, viz., for the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed. What, so far, the European Court has not considered (indeed, we were referred to no decision of any court where the point has been considered) is the application of that principle in the case posed by the question stated at the beginning of this judgment. In the present proceedings the appeal tribunal decided, for a

Pickstone v. Freemans Plc. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A different reason to which I shall come, that Community law was not applicable, and did not express a view on what the position would be under Community law if it were applicable. The industrial tribunal were bolder: in their view the equal pay directive envisages that the first matter to be considered is "the same work": "it is only if there is no same work that one goes to the alternative 'work to which equal value is attributed'."

B In this court Mr. Pannick submitted that the principle of equal pay for equal work enunciated in article 119, as re-stated or clarified in article 1 of the equal pay directive, entitles men and women to equal pay for the same work and (likewise) to equal pay for work to which equal value is attributed. They are entitled to equal pay in both those instances, and their entitlement to equal pay for work of equal value is not dependent upon there being no person of the other sex currently engaged in the same work as the person making the claim. If there is a man, or if there are men, doing the same work but being paid no more than the woman, that will be evidence, whose weight will depend upon all the circumstances, that the payment of a higher wage to other men who are doing work which is different but of no greater value is due to a material factor other than the difference in sex.

D The argument in favour of the narrower construction of article 119 is that it makes sense for recourse not to be had to the less precise and much more difficult yardstick of work of "equal value" when there is to hand the more precise and less controversial one of "same work." The second limb of article 1 of the equal pay directive (work to which equal value is to be attributed), preceded as it is by the disjunctive "or," is applicable only when the first limb (same work) is not in point. If the first limb is applicable, so that there is a man doing the same work as the woman, but the woman is entitled nonetheless to compare herself to another man and his work she would, as the industrial tribunal said in this case, "have wandered into the territory of job evaluation." The principle of equal pay for men and women doing equal work is intended to avoid discrimination on the ground of sex, not to have effect on disputed differentials unrelated to sex. Moreover, the basis of the decision of the European Court in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (Case 61/81) [1982] I.C.R. 578, 599, was that the United Kingdom had failed to take steps to provide a remedy in cases other than like work and work covered by voluntary job classification schemes: "equal value" was only needed as a supplement, a fall-back alternative.

G In my view Mr. Pannick's submission, in support of the first of these two interpretations of article 119, is correct. Article 119 enshrines a broad, general principle: equal pay for equal work. The equal pay directive makes clear that in this context equal work embraces work of equal value as well as work which is the same. I can see no justification for implying into this general principle, whereunder equal work includes both these categories, a rigid and inflexible limitation, to the effect that, although a woman is entitled to compare herself with a man doing work of equal value, she is only so entitled if and so long as no man is doing the same work as herself, and that whenever and for so long as there is a man doing the same work the woman cannot make that comparison, even if the difference in pay is attributable solely to grounds of sex. It makes the presence per se of one man doing the same work, which in some cases might be wholly fortuitous or even, possibly, a situation contrived by an unscrupulous employer, a decisive factor, regardless of all the other circumstances of the case.

Although this precise point has not been considered by the European Court, support for the broad approach I have adopted to the interpretation of article 119 can be obtained from the decision of the European Court in Macarthy's Ltd. v. Smith (Case 129/79) [1981] Q.B. 180. In that case a woman took up a post, after an interval of four months, which had been held by a man. She was paid a lower salary than he had been paid. She claimed to be entitled to the same salary as her predecessor. The European Court held, at p. 198, that the crucial question was whether there was a difference in treatment between a man and a woman performing "equal work" within article 119:

"... The scope of that concept, which is entirely qualitative in character in that it is exclusively concerned with the nature of the services in question, may not be restricted by the introduction of a requirement of contemporaneity. 12. It must be acknowledged, however, that, as the Employment Appeal Tribunal properly recognised, it cannot be ruled out that a difference in pay between two workers occupying the same post but at different periods in time may be explained by the operation of factors which are unconnected with any discrimination on grounds of sex. That is a question of fact which it is for the court or tribunal to decide."

Thus "equal work" involves a comparison between the work (the nature of the services) performed by the woman and the work done by the man, and in making that comparison it is not essential that the man is still doing that work or that he was ever doing it at the same time as the woman. Absence of contemporaneity does not prevent the comparison being made, although such absence is material when considering, as a question of fact, whether the reason for the difference in pay is discrimination on grounds of sex. I do not see how this interpretation of article 119 permits of the conclusion that nonetheless contemporaneity is of the essence in relation to work of equal value, in that a woman is entitled to equality of pay with a man whose work is of equal value but only so long as contemporaneously there is no man doing the same work as herself.

Community law: direct applicability

Before us, although he was not prepared to accept Mr. Pannick's interpretation of article 119 as correct, Mr. Carr concentrated most of his fire in a different direction. He submitted that, even if the applicants' interpretation of article 119 were correct, the applicants could still not succeed with their alternative claim under article 119, because in equal value cases article 119 is not directly applicable and enforceable in this country. In adopting this approach Mr. Carr was following the same course as the appeal tribunal in the present proceedings, who applied the decision of this court in O'Brien v. Sim-Chem Ltd. [1980] 1 W.L.R. 734. So I turn next to the question of direct applicability.

It is now well established that, where article 119 of the Treaty applies directly to the facts of a case, without the need for more detailed implementing measures on the part of member states or of the Community, the law enacted in that article is binding on the English court, and the individual has the right to apply to the English court for

Pickstone v. Freemans Plc. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A relief: see, for example, O'Brien's case, per Cumming-Bruce L.J. at p. 745.

Thus the question is: what are the circumstances in which article 119 does, or does not, apply directly? In Defrenne v. Sabena (Case 43/75) [1976] I.C.R. 547, 566–568, paragraphs 21–24, and 40, the European Court held that article 119 was directly applicable in cases where men and women receive unequal pay for equal work carried out in the same establishment or service, whether public or private. That was in 1976.

B Subsequently, in O'Brien's case this court held, in short, that equivalent work (in contrast to like work) was only brought within the scope of the equal pay principle in article 119 by article 1 of the equal pay directive, and that, accordingly, article 119 itself had no direct effect in respect of equivalent work. Nor did article 1 of the equal pay directive have direct effect, for it was addressed to the national legislatures for them to implement the equal pay provisions where the work was “equivalent” but not “like.”

C O'Brien's case came before the Court of Appeal in 1979. Since then Community jurisprudence has moved on. The European Court has authoritatively clarified the effect of article 1 of the equal pay directive, and also the position regarding direct enforceability of rights under article 119, and I conceive that on these points of Community law it is the duty of this court to give effect to those later decisions of the European Court. In March 1981, as already mentioned, the European Court held that article 1 of the equal pay directive did not alter the content or scope of the principle of equal pay outlined in article 119: Jenkins v. Kingsgate Ltd. (Clothing Productions) Ltd. (Case 96/80) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 972. Earlier in the same month, in Worringham v. Lloyds Bank Ltd. (Case 69/80) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 950, the European Court had to consider whether article 119 of the Treaty or article 1 of the equal pay directive conferred enforceable Community rights upon individuals where contributions were made by an employer bank to two staff retirement benefit schemes, there being one scheme for men and another for women. The court held that the contributions paid by the employer in the name of the employee were “pay” within the meaning of article 119. Accordingly, no question arose regarding article 1 of the equal pay directive. On direct applicability the court said, at p. 969:

“23. As the court has stated in previous decisions (judgment of 8 April 1976, in Defrenne v. Sabena (Case 43/75) [1976] I.C.R. 547 and judgment of 27 March 1980, in Macarthys Ltd. v. Smith (Case 129/79) [1981] Q.B. 180, article 119 of the Treaty applies directly to all forms of discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of the criteria of equal work and equal pay referred to by the article in question, without national or Community measures being required to define them with greater precision in order to permit of their application. Among the forms of discrimination which may be thus judicially identified, the court mentioned in particular cases where men and women receive unequal pay for equal work carried out in the same establishment or service, public or private. In such a situation the court is in a position to establish all the facts enabling it to decide whether a woman receives less pay than a man engaged in the same work or work of equal value.” (Emphasis added.)

The court concluded, at p. 970:

"27. In this case the fact that contributions are paid by the employer solely in the name of men and not in the name of women engaged in the same work or work of equal value leads to unequal pay for men and women which the national court may directly establish with the aid of the pay components in question and the criteria laid down in article 119 of the Treaty. 28. For those reasons, the reply to the third question should be that article 119 of the Treaty may be relied upon before the national courts and that these courts have a duty to ensure the protection of the rights which this provision vests in individuals . . ." (emphasis added).

In my view that decision covers the present case. The five applicants and Mr. Phillips work in the same establishment, and I can see no relevant distinction between the banking employees in Worringham's case and the applicants in the present case with regard to the ability of the court to determine, without further national or Community measures, whether a woman was or was not engaged in work of equal value.

Mr. Carr relied strongly on the decision of the European Court in July 1982 in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (Case 61/81) [1982] I.C.R. 578. In deciding that the United Kingdom had failed to introduce into its legal system in implementation of the equal pay directive such measures as were necessary to enable employees to pursue a claim in respect of work of equal value where no job classification scheme existed, the court said, at p. 598:

"there is at present no means whereby a worker who considers that his post is of equal value to another may pursue his claims if the employer refuses to introduce a job classification system."

Mr. Carr submitted that that is inconsistent with equal value claims being directly enforceable by individuals. I agree that, read literally, this passage supports Mr. Carr's submission, but I am not persuaded that the court's conclusion regarding the United Kingdom's breach of article 1 of the equal pay directive is inconsistent with the same court's decision in Worringham's case [1981] 1 W.L.R. 950 regarding the direct application of article 119. Even where the national legislation does no more than reproduce the Community right, explicit national legislation, with appropriate procedural rules and regulations, can have a practical usefulness for claimants and their advisers not possessed by a directly enforceable Community right which lacks that convenient clothing.

Conclusion on section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970

I broke off from considering the construction of the exclusionary words in section 1(2)(c) "not being work" to look at Community law in order to identify the mischief which the introduction of paragraph (c) into section 1(2) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 was intended to cure. The mischief was the omission, save for the cases covered by paragraph (b), of any provision in the Act for equal pay in cases of work of equal value. The European Court expressed its conclusion in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland [1982] I.C.R. 578, 599:

"14. Accordingly, by failing to introduce into its national legal system in implementation of the provisions of [the equal pay directive] such measures as are necessary to enable all employees

Pickstone v. Freemans Plc. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A who consider themselves wronged by failure to apply the principle of equal pay for men and women for work to which equal value is attributed and for which no system of job classification exists to obtain recognition of such equivalence, the United Kingdom has failed to fulfil its obligation under the Treaty."

B Paragraph (c) was added to section 1(2) as Parliament's legislative response to that decision. Moreover, the amendment to section 1(2) was made by means of a statutory instrument, Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations 1983 (S.I. 1983 No. 1794), under a statutory power enabling provision to be made for the purpose of implementing any Community obligation of the United Kingdom: section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972. Thus the link between section 1(2)(c) and article 119 is indeed a close one.

C If the view expressed above on the interpretation of article 119 is correct, and if the employers' argument on the construction of section 1(2)(c) is correct, two consequences would seem to follow inescapably. The first is that section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 would, in part, have failed to remedy the mischief which it must be taken to have been intended to cure, in that the Act still would not provide a remedy in those cases where currently no man is engaged on the same work. The second consequence, having regard to the reasoning of the European Court in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland [1982] I.C.R. 578, would be that in this respect the United Kingdom would, apparently, have still not wholly fulfilled its obligations under the Treaty and the equal pay directive.

E Needless to say, I am extremely reluctant to construe section 1(2)(c) in a way that would have these consequences. Nonetheless I have found the employers' arguments on the meaning of the exclusionary words in section 1(2)(c) cogent to the extent that, indeed, I have found myself driven to the conclusion that those words are not ambiguous and are not fairly capable of the meaning submitted by Mr. Pannick. It would be incompatible with the scheme of an equality clause introduced by section 1 for the exclusionary words in paragraph (c) to have the meaning or effect submitted by Mr. Pannick. In my judgment, on the assumed facts, the applicants do not fall within section 1(2)(c).

F There is one further point I should add here. It concerns section 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972, the material part of which provides that "any enactment passed or to be passed . . . shall be construed and have effect subject to the foregoing provisions of this section." The foregoing provisions of section 2 include a provision, in section 2(1), that all such rights and obligations created or arising by or under the Treaties, and all such remedies provided for by or under the Treaties, as in accordance with the Treaties, are without further enactment to be given legal effect in the United Kingdom shall be recognised and available in law, and be enforced accordingly.

H Garland v. British Rail Engineering Ltd. [1983] 2 A.C. 751, 771, Lord Diplock mentioned, and left open, the possibility that,

"having regard to the express direction as to the construction of enactments 'to be passed' which is contained in section 2(4), anything short of an express positive statement in an Act of Parliament passed after 1 January 1973, that a particular provision is intended to be made in breach of an obligation assumed by the United Kingdom under a Community treaty, would justify an English court in construing that provision in a manner inconsistent with a Community treaty obligation of the United Kingdom, however wide a departure from the prima facie meaning of the language of the provision might be needed in order to achieve consistency.”

In the present case no argument was addressed to us on this point, it being common ground in counsel's submissions that Community law was material on the construction of section 1(2)(c) only if what I have called the exclusionary words in section 1(2)(c) are ambiguous.

Had this section 2(4) point been likely to affect the outcome of the present appeal, I apprehend that it would have been necessary, before delivering judgment, to have invited the parties to consider whether they wished to return to the court to make submissions on this point. However, as at present advised, I do not think this point would assist either party. To construe the exclusionary words in section 1(2)(c) as having the meaning I have stated above does not encroach upon any directly enforceable rights which women (or men) have under article 119. There is nothing in the Equal Pay Act 1970 which expressly or impliedly negatives, or purports to negative, any such Community rights. Those rights remain enforceable in the English court. In that respect this construction of section 1(2)(c) is not in conflict with article 119.

Where, on this construction of section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970, there is a conflict is that the effect of the exclusionary words is to limit the ambit of section 1(2)(c) in such a way that the section does not cover all the cases which, in accordance with article 119, it should cover. Section 1(2)(c) fails to confer a statutory right on all employees endowed with equal pay rights under article 119. But, given that the exclusionary words are unambiguous and are not reasonably capable of the meaning which would carry out the United Kingdom's treaty obligations in this field, for my part, as at present advised, I have great difficulty in seeing how the effect of section 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972 in such a case can be to require the English court, nevertheless, to ascribe some other, artificial meaning to those words.

Overall conclusion

It remains for me to note that Mr. Pannick submitted that if he was wrong on the construction of the Equal Pay Act 1970, so that the appeal falls to be determined according to the meaning and effect of article 119, this court should seek rulings from the European Court on the relevant questions. In my view, in the exercise of its discretion this court should not accede to that submission. The position under Community law on both the material points is sufficiently clear for it to be appropriate for this court to deal with both these points (as it happens, in favour of Mr. Pannick's clients) without any reference to the European Court.

Accordingly, for the reasons given, for my part I would allow the appeal and direct that these applications proceed in front of the industrial tribunal on the footing that under article 119, although not under section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970, a woman employed on work which is the same as that of one man but which is also of equal value with the work of another man is not debarred from claiming equal pay with that other man by reason of the fact that she is already being

A paid as much as the man engaged on the same work as herself. In determining whether the work of these applicants is of equal value to that of the checker warehouse operatives, and in determining whether (to adopt and adapt the language of the European Court in Macarthys' case [1981] Q.B. 180, 198) the difference in pay between the warehouse operatives and the checker warehouse operatives is explicable by the operation of factors which are unconnected with any discrimination on grounds of sex, the industrial tribunal should give such weight to the factor that there is a man, or there are men, doing the same work as the applicants and being paid no more, as is appropriate having regard to all the circumstances. These are determinations of fact.

C PURCHAS L.J.: The history of events against which this matter comes before the court and the relevant United Kingdom statutory provisions have been described in the judgment of Nicholls L.J. and need not be repeated in this judgment except where necessary for ease of reference. The Equal Pay Act 1970 received the Royal Assent on 29 May 1970 but did not come into force until 29 December 1975, thus allowing a period of time for employers to bring their contractual arrangements into line. Section 1 was passed:

D “with a view to securing that employers give equal treatment as regards terms and conditions of employment to men and to women . . . (a) for men and women employed on like work the terms and conditions of one sex are not in any respect less favourable than those of the other; and (b) for men and women employed on work rated as equivalent . . . the terms and conditions of one sex are not less favourable than those of the other in any respect in which the terms and conditions of both are determined by the rating of their work.”

These provisions, as enacted, never came into force. The Act of 1970 was amended and re-enacted in Schedule 1 to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975; the terms of the amended Act have already been set out in the judgment of Nicholls L.J. The Act from the outset envisaged two criteria: “like work” and “equivalent work.”

F

There is no clue as to whether the rights in respect of “like work” and “equivalent work” were to be mutually exclusive or accumulative. This may have been because Parliament did not advert to the somewhat sophisticated mischief adumbrated by Mr. Pannick. I am not aware of any evidence of a compliant male actually having been put to “low paid woman’s work” to avoid a claim for “equal pay” for “equivalent work.” However, the possibility cannot be ignored. The simple approach might well have been that the presence of a male doing the same or like work would provide the best means of comparison without the necessity of resorting to a more remote comparison with someone doing equivalent work. Nor is any further light thrown on this problem by the amendments to section 1 of the Act of 1970 introduced by the Act of 1975. It was not until an amendment to section 1 of the Act of 1970 effected by the Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations 1983 added a further paragraph that the concept of mutual exclusivity appeared. I must return to this later.

G

H

To complete the statutory history the European Communities Act 1972 received the Royal Assent on 17 October 1972. Section 2, in its relevant parts, provided:

"(1) All such rights, powers, liabilities, obligations and restrictions from time to time created or arising by or under the Treaties . . . are without further enactment to be given legal effect or used in the United Kingdom shall be recognised and available in law . . .

(2) Subject to Schedule 2 to this Act, at any time after its passing Her Majesty may by Order in Council, and any designated minister or department may by regulations, make provision—(a) for the purpose of implementing any Community obligation of the United Kingdom, or enabling any such obligation to be implemented, or of enabling any rights enjoyed or to be enjoyed by the United Kingdom under or by virtue of the Treaties to be exercised; or (b) for the purpose of dealing with matters arising out of or related to any such obligation or rights or the coming into force, or the operation from time to time, of subsection (1) above; and in the exercise of any statutory power or duty, including any power to give directions or to legislate by means of orders, rules, regulations or other subordinate instrument, the person entrusted with the power or duty may have regard to the objects of the Communities and to any such obligation or rights as aforesaid. . . . (4) The provision that may be made under subsection (2) above includes, subject to Schedule 2 to this Act, any such provision (of any such extent) as might be made by Act of Parliament, and any enactment passed or to be passed, other than one contained in this Part of this Act, shall be construed and have effect subject to the foregoing provisions of this section; . . ." (emphasis provided).

Schedule 2 restricted the powers to make orders conferred by section 2(2) in respects which might well be thought to justify full legislative treatment such as imposing or increasing taxation, making orders with retrospective effect or creating by order new criminal offences. The power, therefore, to make statutory orders under section 2(2) was clearly defined and limited.

The Equal Pay Act 1970 as originally amended by the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 contained only provisions in relation to section 1(2) "(a) where the woman is employed on like work with a man in the same employment" and (b) where the woman is employed on work rated as equivalent with that of a man in the same employment." Each paragraph contained sub-paragraphs in precisely equivalent terms providing for the modification of the appropriate term in the woman's contract or the inclusion of a term otherwise omitted in that contract. It is significant, however, that section 1(2)(b) did not include, and still does not include, any express restriction upon resorting to this paragraph if section 1(2)(a) is also available (contrast section 1(2)(c) below).

It is convenient at this stage to set out again the material parts of article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty:

"Each member state shall . . . maintain the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work. For the purposes of this article, 'pay' means the ordinary basic or minimum wage . . . and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind . . . directly or indirectly . . ." (emphasis provided).

and Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.) which was adopted in 1975 by the Council of European Communities, who were anxious about the inertia being shown by some member countries in implementing article 119:

3 W.L.R.

Pickstone v. Freemans Plc. (C.A.)

Purchas L.J.

A “Whereas implementation of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay contained in article 119 is an integral part of the establishment and functioning of the common market; . . .

“Article 1

B “The principle of equal pay for men and women outlined in article 119 of the Treaty, hereafter called ‘principle of equal pay,’ means, for the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed, the elimination of all discrimination . . .”

It is now established that the Directive merely explains and defines article 119 and does not have any legislative force of its own: Jenkins v. Kingsgate (Clothing Productions) Ltd. [1981] 1 W.L.R. 972.

C In view of the failure (referred to below) of Mr. Pannick to demonstrate a viable alternative construction to the words “not being work . . . applies” in section 1(2)(c) of the Act of 1970 to support a submission of ambiguity, it is not necessary to consider article 119 as an aid to construction of the Act of 1970. The matter cannot, however, be concluded without recourse to Community law. It is necessary to consider the question of the direct enforceability of article 119 in the domestic courts of the U.K. in the following respects: (1) What is the statutory status of the amendment effected by the Regulations of 1983? (2) Does article 119 recognise any distinction between equal pay for equal work as defined by the Directive as meaning “the same work” or “work to which equal value is attributed” in the sense that the two concepts are mutually exclusive or are to be given an optional or accumulative effect? (3) Whether and to what extent article 119 is considered to give rise to personal rights enforceable in the courts of the United Kingdom?

Statutory status of section 1(2)(c) of Equal Pay Act 1970

F As a result of the reference by the Commission of the European Communities to the European Court in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland [1982] I.C.R. 578, it was held by the court that the Act of 1970, with section 1(2)(a) and (b) as amended by the Act of 1975, did not comply with article 119 in the sense that it did not enable all employees who considered themselves wronged by failure to apply the principle of “equal pay for men and women for work to which equal value is attributed and for which no system of job classification exists” to have recourse to the courts: see p. 599. The decision established: (1) that under article 119 the words “equal pay for equal work” meant equal pay “for like work or for work to which equal value is attributed”; and (2) that section 1(2)(b) of the Act of 1970 did not satisfy article 119 because a job valuation scheme could only be put into effect if the employer chose to organise one. This did not comply with article 2 of the equal pay directive which provides:

H “Member states shall introduce into their national legal system such measures as are necessary to enable all employees who consider themselves wronged by failure to apply the principle of equal pay to pursue their claims by judicial process after possible recourse to other competent authorities . . .”

In the submissions, questions and advice of the Advocate General, no consideration was given to the relationship between the two branches of the definition of equal pay for equal work identified in article 1 of the Directive. Of course, section 1(2)(b) was not said to be mutually exclusive with section 1(2)(a) of the Act of 1970. To comply with the decision of the European Court the Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations 1983 were made under the powers granted by section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972. In order to remedy the defect identified in section 1(2) of the Act of 1970 a further paragraph (c) was added:

“where a woman is employed on work which, not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies, is, in terms of the demands made on her (for instance under such headings as effort, skill and decision), of equal value to that of a man in the same employment” (emphasis provided).

Paragraph (c) was clearly modelled on paragraphs (a) and (b), with the additional words specifically providing that the relief under the new paragraph—and the relief afforded by paragraphs (a) and (b)—should be mutually exclusive. These words have, of course, been central to this appeal. The fact that Parliament saw fit to include them in section 1(2)(c) but did not amend the existing section 1(2)(b) by adding similar words of exclusion in line with the new paragraph, must, I would have thought, raise a question to say the least. Moreover, one might be forgiven for wondering what would have been the attitude of the European Court if the words of exclusion had appeared in section 1(2)(b) at the time of their decision in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in July 1982.

Mr. Pannick, who appears for the applicants, has submitted that, notwithstanding the inclusion of section 1(2)(c) under the statutory order, the United Kingdom legislation does not yet comply with article 119 and the Directive. The critical words are: “not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies.” I agree with Nicholls L.J. that Mr. Pannick’s primary submission, namely, that there is an ambiguity in the application and effect of these words, cannot succeed. I am firmly of the view that paragraph (c), read in its ordinary sense, is plain and contains no ambiguity. The qualification “not being work in relation to which paragraphs (a) and (b) above applies” relates to the work on which the woman is employed and its relationship with work falling within (a) or (b) and cannot relate, as Mr. Pannick submits, to the man with whom the woman at her election chooses to be compared. There is nothing which I would wish to add to what has fallen from Nicholls L.J. on this aspect of the case. However, as has already been stated, the matter does not end there.

If the expression “equal work” in article 119, as elucidated by article 1 of the Directive, is shown to embrace two separate comparisons, namely, “same work” and “work of equivalent value,” there are difficulties in the construction of section 1(2)(c) otherwise demanded by the plain language of the statute. The words excluding paragraphs (a) and (b) included in paragraph (c) would appear to go beyond the delegated powers under which the Regulations of 1983 were made. The powers are restricted generally to “the implementation” of the Treaty as set out in section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 already cited. Moreover, on a strict interpretation, the question may well be asked—Why “work of equivalent value” should not be available for the

Purchas L.J.

A identification of discrimination merely because there exists the same or similar work available for comparison, when no such restriction applies to “work rated as equivalent” under subsection (b).

B To date, so far as I know, consideration of section 1(2) of the Act of 1970 by the European Court has been without any argument that the provisions relating to “like work” and “work rated as equivalent” are mutually exclusive rather than optional or cumulative. By the introduction of the limiting words now included in paragraph (c) and the possibility, however remote, of their incorporation by necessary inference in paragraph (b), the minister in making the Regulations of 1983 may have failed to achieve compliance with article 119 as Mr. Pannick suggests. This submission has, in my judgment, considerable force and is supported by the further possibility that the new paragraph (c) is without the statutory powers granted by section 1(2) of the Act of 1972. However, as the latter point was not argued before us, I approach it with considerable reservation.

D In considering the true construction of this article in the light of the judgments of the European Court, I bear in mind, on the one hand, the judgment of Lord Denning M.R. in H. P. Bulmer Ltd. v. J. Bollinger S.A. [1974] Ch. 401 to which Mr. Pannick drew our attention and, on the other hand, the discretionary power we have, where necessary, to resolve questions of doubt, to refer the matter to the European Court under article 177 and R.S.C., Ord. 114. Lord Denning M.R. emphasised the importance of avoiding overloading the European Court and gave guidelines to construction for the English courts. As I read the position, it is this. If it is possible to detect a clear general approach to a particular question of construction from the judgments of the European Court, then a domestic court, not being “a final court” within article 177, should not exercise its discretion to refer to the European Court, but should attempt to construe the article in question, within the guidelines in Bulmer’s case.

F Article 119 has been considered in a number of cases by the European Court. A convenient starting point is Defrenne v. Sabena [1976] I.C.R. 547. The distinction between “like work” and “work of equivalent value” did not arise. The terms of service for the steward and stewardess were the same. The question of direct enforceability did arise, however, and it is convenient to refer to this at this stage. It was part of the United Kingdom Government’s case that article 119 was not directly enforceable, at p. 553:

H “(c) The need for legislative action on the part of the member states appears from the formulation of the obligation imposed on them by article 119 in the form of a general statement of principle. Directive (75/117/E.E.C.) acknowledged this need; in article 8 it requires member states to put into force the legislation necessary to comply with the Directive within one year of its notification and thus to ensure the application of the general principle contained in article 119. In the absence of such national implementing legislation an obligation of the kind contained in article 119 is incomplete and cannot properly be completed by interpretative judicial decisions.”

In answer to questions posed by the court, at p. 562, there is no suggestion of mutual exclusivity:

"In the private sector the Equal Pay Act 1970 provided for the abolition of all discrimination in collective agreements by the end of 1975. It gives the right to equal pay to women employed on work of the same or a broadly similar nature as men, as well as to women employed on work which, although different from that carried out by men, has been given an 'equal value' under a system of classification of duties ('job evaluation')."

In the judgment of the court the following paragraphs are relevant, at pp. 566-567, 568:

"18. For the purposes of the implementation of these provisions a distinction must be drawn within the whole area of application of article 119 between, first, direct and overt discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of the criteria based on equal work and equal pay referred to by the article in question and, secondly, indirect and disguised discrimination which can only be identified by reference to more explicit implementing provisions of a community or national character" (emphasis provided). 19. It is impossible not to recognise that the complete implementation of the aim pursued by article 119, by means of the elimination of all discrimination, direct or indirect, between men and women workers, not only as regards individual undertakings but also entire branches of industry and even of the economic system as a whole, may in certain cases involve the elaboration of criteria whose implementation necessitates the taking of appropriate measures at community and national level. . . . 21. Among the forms of direct discrimination which may be identified solely by reference to the criteria laid down by article 119 must be included in particular those which have their origin in legislative provisions or in collective labour agreements and which may be detected on the basis of a purely legal analysis of the situation. 22. This applies even more in cases where men and women receive unequal pay for equal work carried out in the same establishment or service, whether public or private. 23. As is shown by the very findings of the judgment making the reference, in such a situation the court is in a position to establish all the facts which enable it to decide whether a woman worker is receiving lower pay than a male worker performing the same tasks. . . . 40. The reply to the first question must therefore be that the principle of equal pay contained in article 119 may be relied upon before the national courts and that these courts have a duty to ensure the protection of the rights which this provision vests in individuals, in particular as regards those types of discrimination arising directly from legislative provisions or collective labour agreements, as well as in cases in which men and women receive unequal pay for equal work which is carried out in the same establishment or service, whether private or public."

I have set out Defrenne v. Sabena [1976] I.C.R. 547 at some length because the European Court referred back to this judgment in a number of subsequent judgments and because it is the fons et origo of the expression "direct and overt discrimination" which formed a main plank of Mr. Carr's submissions to which I shall return subsequently.

For my part I do not see that the reference to what has been compendiously referred to as "indirect discrimination" in Defrenne v.

3 W.L.R.

Pickstone v. Freemans Plc. (C.A.)

Purchas L.J.

A Sabena is a mandate for distinguishing cases in which it can clearly be established that "unequal pay" is received for "like work" from those cases in which "unequal pay" is received for "work of equivalent value," provided that the "equivalence" of the work can be identified without reference to "more explicit implementing provisions of a community or national character." Applying the decision in Defrenne v. Sabena in the light of the submissions and answers given by the United Kingdom, I would be prepared to construe article 119, as explained by the Directive, as affording a relief to a person who is receiving "unequal pay," either for the same work or for work of equivalent value, and that the two concepts are not mutually exclusive but are integral parts of the same concept.

C Direct enforceability

In general, therefore, I agree with Mr. Pannick when he submits that article 119 is directly enforceable. Mr. Pannick further submits, however, that any distinction which had been based upon the contention that article 1 of the Directive of 1975 was not so enforceable, was misconceived because article 119 was not extended by the Directive which merely explained it. On this basis Mr. Pannick submitted that discrimination described as indirect or hidden was no less within article 119 and, therefore, directly enforceable.

Mr. Carr submitted, on the other hand, that, if article 119 embraced claims based upon work of equal value, as well as like work, then by enacting section 2(1) of the Act of 1972 the United Kingdom would have complied with the article and that, therefore, the decision in Commission of the European Community v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland [1982] I.C.R. 578 should not have gone against the United Kingdom. The force of this argument is somewhat diluted because this was not the case proposed on behalf of the United Kingdom at that time. Mr. Pannick said that the decision of the European Court on this aspect must be taken as per incuriam if there is any force in Mr. Carr's submissions.

It was Mr. Carr's main submission that, in order to succeed on the direct enforceability point, Mr. Pannick had to allege that his claim fell within what has been described in some of the cases as the "direct discrimination category." He relied on paragraphs 9 and 10 of the decision in Macarthy's Ltd. v. Smith [1981] Q.B. 180, 198:

"9. According to the first paragraph of article 119 the member states are obliged to ensure and maintain 'the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work.' 10. As the court indicated in Defrenne v. Sabena [1976] I.C.R. 547, that provision applies directly, and without the need for more detailed implementing measures on the part of the Community or the member states, to all forms of direct and overt discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of the criteria of equal work and equal pay referred to by the article in question. Among the forms of discrimination which may be thus judicially identified, the court mentioned in particular cases where men and women receive unequal pay for equal work carried out in the same establishment or service."

Mr. Carr also relied upon Jenkins v. Kingsgate (Clothing Productions) Ltd. [1981] 1 W.L.R. 972, the judgment delivered by the European Court, at pp. 977, 983:

"Finally, as to the question of the direct effect of article 119 and article 1 of the Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.), it may be recalled that, as the court held in its decision of 8 April 1976, in Defrenne v. Sabena (Case 43/75) [1976] I.C.R. 547, these provisions are directly applicable to all forms of direct and overt discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of the criteria of equal work and equal pay, including unequal pay for equal work carried out in the same establishment or service. . . . Although 'adverse impact' is defined in the legislation of the United Kingdom as 'indirect discrimination,' it should not be confused with the 'indirect and disguised discrimination' which has been described by the court as falling outside the scope of the direct application of article 119. Here, 'indirect discrimination' is used in such a manner as to exclude any practice which, although not founded on any discriminatory motives, nevertheless has a discriminatory effect, and not as meaning discrimination which can only be suppressed by national or Community legislative measures more detailed than the provisions referred to above. . . .

"Fourth question

"16. In the fourth and last question, the national court asks whether the provisions of article 119 of the Treaty are directly applicable in the circumstances of this case. 17. As the court has stated in previous decisions (judgment 8 April 1976, in Defrenne v. Sabena [1976] I.C.R. 547; judgment of 27 March 1980, in Macarthys Ltd. v. Smith [1981] Q.B. 180 and judgment of 11 March 1981, in Worringham v. Lloyds Bank Ltd. [1981] 1 W.L.R. 950), article 119 of the Treaty applies directly to all forms of discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of criteria of equal work and equal pay referred to by the article in question, without national or Community measures being required to define them with greater precision in order to permit of their application. Among the forms of discrimination which may be thus judicially identified, the court mentioned in particular cases where men and women receive unequal pay for equal work carried out in the same establishment or service, public or private."

In particular Mr. Carr relied upon the decision of this court in O'Brien v. Sim-Chem Ltd. [1980] 1 W.L.R. 734. Here the court distinguished between equal work and equivalent work: see the judgment of Cumming-Bruce L.J., at pp. 747-748:

"I am satisfied that the Directive is what it professes to be, i.e. a directive to governments to take national measures to approximate their laws in order to give effect to the new criteria expressed in article 1 of the Directive. The discrimination identified by the application of the criterion in that article is not directly applicable in national courts until it is implemented in national legislation. Paragraph 68 of the judgment in the Defrenne case [1976] I.C.R. 547, 571, makes it necessary to make one qualification of that

A conclusion: 'Even in the areas in which article 119 has no direct effect, that provision cannot be interpreted as reserving to the national legislature exclusive power to implement the principle of equal pay since, to the extent to which such implementation is B necessary, it may be relieved by a combination of Community and national measures.' In my view this paragraph contemplates the combination of Community and national measures and affirms the jurisdiction to decide whether national measures comply with the Treaty and with relevant Directives, even if such Directives are not directly applicable."

C The judgments in O'Brien v. Sim-Chem Ltd. were, of course, delivered before the ruling of the European Court in Jenkins v. Kingsgate (Clothing Production Ltd. [1981] 1 W.L.R. 972. In so far as the court's attention in O'Brien's case was paid to the direct enforceability of article 1 of the Directive, the judgments have been overtaken by the subsequent D decisions of the European Court in 1981: Jenkin's case and Worringham
v. Lloyds Bank Ltd. [1981] 1 W.L.R. 950. In the latter case the applicants contended, inter alia, (a) that the exclusion of retirement benefit schemes from the Acts of 1970 and 1975 was incompatible with Community law; (b) that the deficiencies in the treatment by the bank of men and women in the bank's retirement benefit scheme was "a form of direct and overt discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of the criteria of equal work and equal pay referred to in article 119:" see p. 956B. The bank's reply emphasised that the benefits were not considerations paid directly or indirectly by the employer, but were received from the trustees of the pension fund and that the assessment E of terms in such a scheme to achieve fairness between men and women was an extremely complex one. On this basis it was submitted that, if there was discrimination, it could not be described as "direct or overt."
This argument was repeated by the United Kingdom at p. 963A-B. The judgment of the court, at p. 969 included the following:

F "21. Moreover, Directive (75/117/E.E.C.), whose objective is, as follows from the first recital of the preamble thereto, to lay down the conditions necessary for the implementation of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay, is based on the concept of 'pay' as defined in the second paragraph of article 119 of the Treaty. Although article 1 of the Directive explains that the concept G of 'same work' contained in the first paragraph of article 119 of the Treaty includes cases of 'work to which equal value is attributed,' it in no way affects the concept of 'pay' contained in the second paragraph of article 119 but refers by implication to that concept.

"The third question

H "22. The national court asks further in its third question whether, if the answer to question 1 is in the affirmative, 'article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty . . . [has] direct effect in the member states so as to confer enforceable Community rights upon individuals in the circumstances of the present case.' 23. As the court has stated in previous decisions (judgment of 8 April 1976, in Defrenne v. Sabena (Case 43/75) [1976] I.C.R. 547 and judgment of 27 March 1980, in Macarthys Ltd. v. Smith (Case 129/79) [1981] Q.B. 180), article 119 of the Treaty applies directly to all forms of discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of the criteria of equal work and equal pay referred to by the article in question, without national or Community measures being required to define them with greater precision in order to permit of their application. Among the forms of discrimination which may be thus judicially identified, the court mentioned in particular cases where men and women receive unequal pay for equal work carried out in the same establishment or service, public or private. In such a situation the court is in a position to establish all the facts enabling it to decide whether a woman receives less pay than a man engaged in the same work or work of equal value."

Finally, I wish to refer to Garland v. British Rail Engineering Ltd. [1983] 2 A.C. 751. This case involved post-retirement travel concessions which were non-contractual given to railway employees. The concession given to men included their spouses and children. Those given to the women were personal to them only. The following questions were asked of the European Court, at pp. 755-756. Was the discrimination:

"1 . . . contrary to (a) article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty? (b) article 1 of the Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.)? . . . 2. If the answer . . . is affirmative, is article 119 or either of the said Directives directly applicable . . . so as to confer enforceable . . . rights . . . ?"

The United Kingdom denied that article 119 would be directly enforceable asserting that national or Community measures would be required to achieve precision and relied upon paragraph 17 of the judgment in Jenkins v. Kingsgate (Clothing Productions) Ltd. [1981] 1 W.L.R. 972. This contention was not supported by the Advocate General. Paragraphs 13, 14 and 15 of the decision read, at pp. 767-768:

"Question 2

"13. Since question 1(a) has been answered in the affirmative the question arises of the direct applicability of article 119 in the member states and of the rights which individuals may invoke on that basis before national courts.

"14. In paragraph 17 of its judgment of 31 March 1981, in Jenkins v. Kingsgate (Clothing Productions) Ltd. (Case 96/80) [1981] 1 W.L.R. 972, 983 the court stated that article 119 of the Treaty applies directly to all forms of discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of the criteria of equal work and equal pay referred to by the article in question, without national or Community measures being required to define them with greater precision in order to permit of their application.

"15. Where a national court is able, using the criteria of equal work and equal pay, without the operation of Community or national measures, to establish that the grant of special transport facilities solely to retired male employees represents discrimination based on difference of sex, the provisions of article 119 of the Treaty apply directly to such a situation."

Some assistance in deciding the approach to be adopted by the domestic court in the presence of an apparent conflict between domestic and Community law is to be found in the speech of Lord Diplock in Garland's case after it had returned from the European Court, at p. 771:

"The instant appeal does not present an appropriate occasion to consider whether, having regard to the express direction as to the

3 W.L.R.

Pickstone v. Freemans Plc. (C.A.)

Purchas L.J.

A construction of enactments 'to be passed' which is contained in section 2(4), anything short of an express positive statement in an Act of Parliament passed after 1 January 1973, that a particular provision is intended to be made in breach of an obligation assumed by the United Kingdom under a Community treaty, would justify an English court in construing that provision in a manner inconsistent with a Community treaty obligation of the United Kingdom, however wide a departure from the prima facie meaning of the language of the provision might be needed in order to achieve consistency. For, in the instant case the words of section 6(4) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 that fall to be construed, 'provision in relation to . . . retirement,' without any undue straining of the ordinary meaning of the language used, are capable of bearing either the narrow meaning accepted by the Employment Appeal Tribunal or the wider meaning preferred by the Court of Appeal but acknowledged by that court to be largely a matter of first impression. Had the attention of the court been drawn to article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty and the judgment of the European Court of Justice in Defrenne v. Sabena (Case 43/75) [1976] I.C.R. 547, I have no doubt that, consistently with statements made by Lord Denning M.R. in previous cases, they would have construed section 6(4) so as not to make it inconsistent with article 119."

In my judgment the decisions of the European Court demonstrate a clear pattern of development as regards the direct enforceability of article 119 as follows. (1) The expression "equal pay for equal work" is to receive a broad interpretation. "Pay" is given a very wide definition in article 119 itself. It would be inconsistent if work were not treated similarly. (2) Article 1 of Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.) merely confirms that the expression "equal work" shall have an equally wide interpretation that is not only "same work" but also "work to which equal value is attributed." (3) The sense of (1) and (2) cannot be said to support the contention that "same work" must always exclude "work to which equal value is attributed" in choosing the most appropriate route by which to arrive at "equal work." (4) The expression in Defrenne v. Sabena [1976] I.C.R. 547, 566D, "direct and overt discrimination which may be identified solely with the aid of criteria based on equal work and equal pay" has been followed through the cases and remains the touchstone of direct enforceability. Attempts to limit its range by equating "equal work and equal pay" to "same work and equal pay" have invariably been rejected and in any event ignore the effect of article 1 of the directive in defining "equal work and equal pay." (5) That the words used to describe the second type of discrimination "indirect and disguised" mean what they say, namely, that without reference to more explicit implementing provisions the discrimination cannot be identified. Paragraph 19 of the judgment in Defrenne v. Sabena instances the sort of situation envisaged. (6) That a discrimination which appears on the face of a direct comparison demonstrates unequal pay for one type of work and another type of work to which equal value is attributed at the same place of employment must fall within the first rather than the second type of discrimination and would, therefore be directly enforceable.

Conclusion

Regrettably, in my judgment Mr. Pannick's submission that section 1(2)(c), whilst it contains unqualified words excluding section 1(2)(a) and (b), is inconsistent with rights that are directly enforceable in the United Kingdom courts under Community law is made out. There is clear authority that in a case of conflict Community law must prevail. Two courses are open to the court: (1) to refer two questions to the European Court asking (a) Does section 1(2)(c) comply with article 119? (b) Is article 119 directly enforceable in the United Kingdom courts in cases where the discrimination arises in cases of unequal pay for work to which an equivalent value is attributed? (2) To construe section 1(2) of the Act of 1970 so as to conform with the principles of article 119 by inserting the words necessary to achieve a result that is not inconsistent with Community law as I understand it. This involves an otherwise unjustifiable qualification of what are in fact clear words. As I understand the effect of Community law, it embraces the requirement that, in order to identify discrimination, the domestic court must be able to call upon the best method of arriving at a standard of "equal work" whether by comparing the work under review with "the same work" or "work to which equal value is attributed." This must be at the election of the domestic court, in this case the industrial tribunal. The choice method of determining "equal work" within the meaning of article 119 cannot, in my judgment, be either at the hands of the employer or the employee since that would encourage "comparison shopping" by either or both. This cannot have been the intention of the article. Although this course has obvious advantages, both from a social and also an industrial point of view, it is more difficult to find a satisfactory statutory justification. There is a possible approach. This is to assume: (a) that the draftsman of the Regulations of 1983 did not exceed the powers under which the regulations were drawn under section 2(2)(a) of the Act of 1972; and (b) to construe and give effect to the regulations in accordance with section 2(4) of that Act and article 119. This could be achieved by amending the relevant part of section 1(2)(c) to read: "... not being work which can more fairly be compared under paragraphs (a) or (b) above."

Since under article 117 reference to the European Court is discretionary so far as this court is concerned, and in view of the firm conclusion I have reached with regard to the state of Community law, I would favour the second of the two courses. Therefore I agree with the order proposed by Nicholls L.J.

SIR ROUALEYN CUMMING-BRUCE. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgments now delivered by Purchas L.J. and Nicholls L.J. and can state my own views very concisely.

As a matter of construction, I reject Mr. Pannick's submission that the words of section 1(2)(c) of the Act of 1970 are ambiguous. On their ordinary meaning the words "not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies" are plain and unambiguous, even though for the reasons stated by Purchas L.J. they may appear to go beyond the delegated powers under which the Regulations of 1983 were made. So the applicants' case fails on the construction of the English legislation.

Article 119 of the Treaty, as explained by Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.), gives an applicant the right to claim that he or she is

Sir Roualeyn

A entitled to equal pay when engaged under a contract of employment which imposes on the employee the obligation to do work of equal value to the work of any other employee of the opposite sex in the same establishment. It is for the industrial tribunal to decide the questions of fact relevant to the applicant's claim. Article 119 does not exclude such comparison on the ground that an employee of the opposite sex is engaged on the same or like work on the same remuneration as the applicant. An equal value claim and comparison are not dependent on the situation relevant to persons doing the same or like work, though the facts regarding same work or like work cases may be material evidence for consideration by the industrial tribunal, subject to the usual factors relevant to the weight of such evidence.

C The judgments of the European Court, to which Purchas and Nicholls L.JJ. have referred, point clearly enough to the conclusion that the equal pay rights established by article 119 as explained in the directive are directly enforceable in a national court in a case where the national legislation is such as to restrict the rights conferred on employees by article 119. This is sufficiently clear to justify this court so holding even though the particular issue of comparison of section 1(2)(c) of the Act of 1970 with the rights conferred by article 119 has not yet been resolved by the European Court.

D The conclusion, which in my view is likely to involve formidable problems of industrial and commercial convenience, must be that the European remedy is available to the applicant to the industrial tribunal even though there can be no remedy available under national legislation.

E For those reasons the appeal should be allowed, and the case sent back for determination by the industrial tribunal in the light of this judgment.

MORRIS v. LONDON IRON AND STEEL CO. LTD.

1987 Feb. 6

May and Croom-Johnson L.JJ. and Sir Denys Buckley

Industrial Relations—Industrial tribunals—Findings of fact—Industrial tribunal unable to decide whether employee dismissed—Issue determined by reference to burden of proof—Whether duty on tribunal to decide facts on evidence

Fact or Law—Issues of fact—Inability to make findings—Claim for unfair dismissal—Whether industrial tribunal having duty to find facts—Whether entitled to determine issue by reference to burden of proof without finding facts

The employee applied to an industrial tribunal, claiming that he had been unfairly dismissed by the employer. On the preliminary issue, whether the employee had been dismissed, the tribunal, finding the probabilities equally balanced, felt unable to make a finding of fact one way or the other, and dismissed the application on the basis that the employee had not discharged the burden which lay on him of proving that he had been dismissed. He appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal, which by a majority held that tribunals of fact were under a duty to make findings on at least the important issues of fact before them and that the industrial tribunal had failed to discharge that duty, and remitted the case for rehearing by another industrial tribunal.

On the employer's appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that although judges and tribunals were under a duty to make findings of fact in relation to matters before them if they could, drawing inferences from the findings of primary fact where appropriate, they were under no absolute obligation to make such findings; that if, in an exceptional case, the judge or tribunal applying the appropriate standard of proof was conscientiously unable to decide where the truth lay on a particular issue, he or it was entitled, in the absence of any relevant presumption of law, to determine that issue by reference to whether the party on whom the onus of proof lay had discharged it, without making findings of primary fact on that issue; that the industrial tribunal, having found itself unable to make a finding of fact as to whether the employee had been dismissed, had therefore been entitled to dismiss the application on the basis that he had not discharged the onus of proof which lay on him; that there was no duty on an industrial tribunal to give detailed reasons for its inability to make such a finding, beyond those which were necessary to enable the parties to know that there had been no error of law; that in the instant case the industrial tribunal had given adequate reasons; and that, accordingly, its decision should be restored (post, pp. 843G–H, 844A–C, D–F, 845F–H, 846A, C–E).

APPEAL from the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

- D By an originating application dated 4 July 1985, the employee, Michael Charles Morris, applied for a determination by an industrial tribunal of the question whether he had been unfairly dismissed by the employer, London Iron and Steel Co. Ltd., on 19 April 1985 from his employment as a labourer. On 10 October 1985, the industrial tribunal unanimously decided, as a preliminary issue, that the applicant had not
- E been dismissed. The employee appealed and on 17 April 1986 the Employment Appeal Tribunal [1986] I.C.R. 629 by a majority allowed the appeal and remitted the matter to a differently constituted tribunal for a fresh hearing.

- F By a notice of appeal dated 16 May 1986 the employer appealed, pursuant to leave granted by the appeal tribunal on 17 April, on the grounds (1) that the majority of the appeal tribunal were wrong in holding that the industrial tribunal had erred in determining that the employee had not been dismissed within the meaning of section 55 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978; (2) that the majority of the appeal tribunal had erred in law in holding (i) that there had been a duty on the industrial tribunal to decide the issues of fact relating to the question of whether the employee had been so dismissed notwithstanding that it had concluded that it was unable to say which evidence, as between that adduced by the employee and that adduced by the employer, was to be preferred on the balance of probabilities, and (ii) that the industrial tribunal had erred in law in failing so to decide and had further erred in determining that question by relying on the burden of proof and in finding as a fact that the employee had not discharged the burden which lay on him of proving that he had been
- H dismissed; (3) that the majority of the appeal tribunal ought to have held, as the dissenting member had done, that there was no duty in law on an industrial tribunal to decide issues of fact where it was genuinely and conscientiously unable to resolve conflicting evidence, and that it was permissible for a tribunal in such circumstances to determine the issue of dismissal by relying on the burden of proof and finding that the employee had not discharged it; (4) that the majority of the appeal tribunal had erred in law in holding that the industrial tribunal had been under a duty to consider each issue of fact singly and to make specific findings in relation to each issue; (5) that the majority of the appeal tribunal had erred in law in holding that the principle enunciated in Bray v. Palmer [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1455 and Baker v. Market Harborough Industrial Co-operative Society Ltd. [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1472, relating to the duty of judges to decide issues of fact in road traffic accident cases, applied equally to industrial tribunals determining whether an employee had been dismissed for the purposes of section 55 of the Act of 1978; that the majority ought to have held, as the dissenting member had done, that the authorities did not impose a duty on tribunals in all civil cases to resolve conflicts of evidence by specifically accepting or rejecting the evidence of one or other witness or set of witnesses, and that they did not prevent such tribunals determining particular issues by relying on the burden of proof when they were genuinely and conscientiously unable to decide issues of fact; (6) that the majority of the appeal tribunal had wrongly construed its dicta in Khanna v. Ministry of Defence [1981] I.C.R. 653, 658, 659 as indicating that industrial tribunals had a duty in all cases to decide issues of fact and that it was improper for them to reach decisions by relying on the burden of proof; that the majority ought to have held, as the dissenting member had done, that the appeal tribunal had there recognised that there might be cases in which the ultimate decision would turn on the burden of proof, and that, in any event, Khanna's case was distinguishable from the instant case; (7) that the majority of the appeal tribunal had further erred in holding that the industrial tribunal's failure to decide the issues of fact left the whole case undecided; and that they ought to have construed the industrial tribunal's conclusions, as the dissenting member had, as meaning that the employee had not satisfied it that he had been dismissed, and to have held that it had reached a proper and valid decision.

The facts are stated in the judgment of May L.J.

Andrew Thompson for the employer.
Michael McLaren for the employee.

MAY L.J. On 24 September and 10 October 1985 an industrial tribunal had to decide a preliminary issue on an application by an employee alleging unfair dismissal, namely whether or not that employee had been dismissed by his employer. The issue between the parties at that time was whether the employee had been dismissed by his employer, or whether, on the other hand, he had resigned from his employment.

The material facts upon which it fell to the industrial tribunal to decide that preliminary issue occurred in April 1985. In the industrial tribunal's reasons for its decision, it recorded that the pre-April 1985 facts were not contested, but went on: "but the evidence of the [employee] and his witness and that of the [employer's] witnesses as to what happened in April and thereafter is conflicting." Then the industrial tribunal rehearsed the evidence that there had been before it on the issue "Was there a dismissal, or had there been a resignation?" and expressed its conclusions in paragraphs 17 to 19 in this way:

"17. The members of this tribunal have found themselves unable to state which evidence is to be preferred on the balance of probabilities. After considering all the evidence and observing the

A demeanour of the witnesses we find that the probabilities are equally balanced. We do not feel able to make a finding of fact as to which version of events is to be preferred. 18. But the onus of proof of dismissal rests with the [employee]. We find as a fact that he has not discharged that onus. 19. Accordingly we are obliged to find that the [employee] was not dismissed."

B That that was the unanimous decision of the tribunal is apparent from the first page of its written decision, which was ultimately sent to the parties on 4 November 1985, although we are told that some half hour or so after the conclusion of evidence and submissions before the tribunal on 10 October, the parties were orally told of the nature of the industrial tribunal's decision.

C Being dissatisfied with that finding of the industrial tribunal the employee appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal. That appeal tribunal by a majority allowed the appeal and remitted the matter to a differently constituted tribunal for a fresh hearing. The appeal tribunal gave leave to appeal to this court. We have now heard an appeal on behalf of the employer against the allowing by the appeal tribunal of the appeal from the industrial tribunal by the employee to which I have referred. The employer on its appeal to us seeks to have the decision of the industrial tribunal reinstated, with the result that it was decided that in so far as this litigation is concerned, the employee was not dismissed.

D The majority of the appeal tribunal, having in their judgment referred to the decision of the industrial tribunal, parts of which I have quoted, came to their conclusion, allowing the appeal, in this way. At one stage they said [1986] I.C.R. 629, 631, 632:

E "the crux of the argument which has been advanced to us is that there is a duty not only in industrial tribunals but in any tribunal of fact to make findings of fact and that a tribunal of fact faced with conflicting evidence, however difficult it may find it to do so, must resolve the conflict, and if conscientiously it finds it cannot do so then it is, albeit conscientiously, failing in its duty as a tribunal of fact. . . . The majority is persuaded that the industrial tribunal was under a duty to make up its collective mind on at least the important issues of fact which arose before them. Its failure to do so in the present case was inevitably, so the majority find, a breach of that duty. . . . The majority consider that without specific findings of the sort which they regard as desirable, a party cannot decide whether he is in a position to challenge findings of fact, for example, on the ground of perversity or on the ground of some other error."

G Finally they said, at p. 633:

H the majority feels that by their failure to come to a conclusion on the issues of fact, the industrial tribunal have 'left the whole case undecided.' And for those reasons the majority would remit the matter for determination by a differently constituted industrial tribunal."

The views of the dissenting member of the appeal tribunal were that no criticism could be made of the way in which the industrial tribunal had reached its decision. He or she said in the course of the decision that "there must be cases (rare cases) when any tribunal of fact (using the word 'tribunal' in its broadest sense) cannot conscientiously decide between two sets of witnesses.” He or she then recorded paragraph 17 of the industrial tribunal’s reasons, which I have quoted, and went on to say, at pp. 633–634:

“Even having displayed their difficulty, indeed their inability, to decide between the two competing sets of evidence and even having chosen to express their views in the words which they did, the dissentient nonetheless feels that all they are saying in substance and effect is ‘the applicant has failed to satisfy us.’ They should not, the dissentient feels, be open to criticism on this account nor should the applicant be in a better position than he would have been had the industrial tribunal adopted some such formula as that suggested.”

B

The matter has been argued before us on much the same lines and with reference to the same authorities as it was before the appeal tribunal. In brief, the argument of the employer is that if the industrial tribunal conscientiously came to the conclusion which it is recorded as having reached, no criticism can be made of it and the result, having regard to the onus of proof, had to be that the employee had failed to make out his case.

On behalf of the employee before us, although the arguments have been expanded in a skeleton argument for which we are extremely grateful, effectively the appeal has been argued on the lines to which the majority of the appeal tribunal adverted in the passages from the judgment of the appeal tribunal which again I have quoted. The arguments have been based, first, upon the decisions of this court in two similar “running-down” actions. The first was Bray v. Palmer [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1455 and the second Baker v. Market Harborough Industrial Co-operative Society Ltd. [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1472. In each of those cases two vehicles were involved. In the second case both drivers were killed, so that it was not easy to adduce evidence as to precisely how the accident happened. In Bray v. Palmer [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1455 Oliver J. felt that, on the evidence he had, he was unable to see his way to deciding which of the respective drivers was responsible; he was unable to decide whether the plaintiff’s story or that of the defendant was true, and he accordingly dismissed the action and the counterclaim arising out of that road accident. When the matter came before this court, the essence of the court’s decision was that the explanation that both the plaintiff and the defendant (the respective drivers of the two vehicles) were in some measure each to blame for the accident had not been considered by the trial judge and was at least as likely as the explanation that one or other of the two drivers had been wholly to blame. In the result the decision of the trial judge was set aside. Having regard to the evidence which had been adduced, this court felt that the matter should go back for a rehearing.

Various dicta from the judgments have been relied on by one side or the other in the argument before us. Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. in his judgment rehearsed an argument which Mr. Fox-Andrews of counsel had put before the court, at p. 1458:

“... in essence and in substance the judge, having heard and considered the evidence, concluded, as a fact that the occurrence in issue was only explicable upon hypothesis ‘A’ or upon hypothesis ‘B’ and that, if that is right, then there is no duty upon a judge so compelling that he must, whatever the evidence and its nature and

May L.J.

A however great his experience, conclude the matter in favour either of 'A' or of 'B'. I do not find it necessary to express a conclusion whether the judicial duty in such a circumstance does require a judge to decide one or the other. I am not saying it does not, but it is unnecessary for me to say that he must, in those circumstances, make up his mind."

B Quite clearly, therefore, the Master of the Rolls was expressly reserving the question whether or not there was any judicial duty in the circumstances postulated to reach a conclusion on one side of the line or the other.

C Then in a longer passage from the judgment of Jenkins L.J., the latter, having referred to passages from the trial judge's judgment, said that they seemed to fall short of a decision of the case, and continued, at p. 1459:

D "Having come to the conclusion that the accident happened either in the way asserted on the plaintiffs' side or in the way asserted on the defendant's side, [the trial judge] said, in effect, that he was unable to decide which story was the right one. With the greatest respect to the judge, that seems to me to be a denial of justice. It can only mean that the parties to the case on one side or the other are deprived of relief to which they are entitled. In my view, it behoved the judge to form some conclusion one way or the other in the matter and I think the difficulty in which he found himself was in great measure due to his method of approaching the problem, which appears from his observation to the effect that he did not see his way to find that both were responsible or even that both were to blame and that it seemed to him to be a case of one or the other."

E The last part of that quotation from Jenkins L.J.'s judgment is particularly relied upon by the employee, being (it is said) a statement that it behoved the trial judge in the circumstances of that case to come to a conclusion one way or the other in the matter before him.

F As to that I have two comments to make. First, it seems to me that the statement was clearly made in the context of the failure of the trial judge to take into account, and indeed to appreciate, that there was the third possibility on the facts of the case that both drivers had been to blame. In any event, secondly, it seems to me quite clear that that dictum on the part of Jenkins L.J. was not necessary for the decision to which he came, namely that the approach of the judge below had been wrong and that accordingly the matter should be reheard.

G Morris L.J. in a short judgment said, at p. 1460:

H "The judge thought that the stories both of the plaintiffs and the defendant were wildly improbable. In those circumstances, I find it difficult to see how the case could proceed on the basis that one or other case must substantially be true and that the allegations on one side or the other must be rejected in their entirety. I do not think it was appropriate in this case to reject consideration of the possibility that there may have been some measure of fault on either side."

That, as I think, makes it quite clear that Morris L.J., with the other members of the court, was deciding the matter on the erroneous approach (as they thought) by the trial judge when the matter had been before him.

In Baker v. Market Harborough Industrial Co-operative Society Ltd. [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1472 the first judgment was given by Somervell L.J. It is necessary to refer to a brief passage from it where, referring to the trial of that action, he said, at p. 1475:

“Here all available evidence was called, and the question, as it seems to me, is one of probable inference from the facts as established. It seems plain that there must have been negligence. If the natural inference was that the accident was due to negligence on the part of one or other of the drivers but not to both I would have thought that the plaintiff would fail.”

He then went on to consider the judgment of the trial judge trying the first action, who came to the conclusion that the parties had been equally to blame. He agreed with that finding and held that the approach of the other judge (who, trying the second action arising out of the same accident had concluded that it was impossible to reach a conclusion) had been wrong and that the appeal should be allowed to the extent of holding each party equally to blame.

The next passage from the judgments in that case on which reliance is placed in the present appeal is a passage from the judgment of Denning L.J., at p. 1477:

“It is very different from a case where one or other only is to blame, but clearly not both. Then the judge ought to make up his mind between them, as this court said recently in Bray v. Palmer. But when both may be to blame, the judge is under no such compulsion and can cast the blame equally on each.”

With respect to Denning L.J., I think, first, that his judgment must be read, understood and its ratio applied in the context of an erroneous approach by the trial judge to the decision of the accident between the two vehicles in that case. Further, as I have already indicated, in my judgment the court did not hold in Bray v. Palmer [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1455 that which Denning L.J. there said that they had held; accordingly I do not think that the dictum can be of great assistance.

The position was made patently clear in the judgment of Romer L.J. in Baker's case. He expressed sympathy with the view of the trial judge who felt that he could draw no inference of negligence on the part of either of the two drivers, and continued [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1472, 1478:

“[The plaintiff’s] action could not succeed unless she established negligence on the part of the van driver. If the facts which were proved rendered it uncertain how the accident happened, so that it might have been brought about either by the negligence of the lorry driver alone or without negligence on the part of either driver, then [the plaintiff] could not be said to have discharged the onus which lay upon her. In these circumstances I can, as I say, appreciate Ormerod J.’s view that the cause of the accident is so speculative, on the meagre facts available, that either of the alternative elements to which I have referred may have, in fact, existed, and that the plaintiff had therefore failed to prove her case.”

Having there accepted that in certain circumstances, applying the principle of the onus of proof, the plaintiff might have failed, nevertheless Romer L.J. then went on to consider whether that was the proper approach on the facts of that case and, having considered the judgments

3 W.L.R.

Morris v. London Iron^g Co. (C.A.)

May L.J.

A of both trial judges, came to the conclusion that it was not and that the correct decision of the appeal was to dismiss one and to hold that the other should be allowed to the extent of making both parties equally to blame.

B On that analysis of those two cases (which, be it noted, were decided on facts wholly different from the facts of the instant case) I do not think that they support any of the contentions which the employee raised either before the appeal tribunal or before this court.

C We were then referred to the decision of the appeal tribunal in Khanna v. Ministry of Defence [1981] I.C.R. 653, quotations from which both the majority and the dissentient member of the appeal tribunal made in their judgment below. That was a case in which the question was whether the applicant, Mr. Khanna, had been racially discriminated against by his employers, the Ministry of Defence. Speaking for myself, I do not find the case an easy or satisfactory one, particularly because in one respect which it is unnecessary to outline further, I think that a statement by the appeal tribunal that the industrial tribunal had not expressed a view whether they accepted the evidence of certain board members in the Ministry of Defence is irreconcilable with part of the reasons of the industrial tribunal which were quoted by Browne-Wilkinson J. at p. 657. But after referring to the question of the burden of proof, the decision in that case can be seen from a short passage from the judgment, at p. 659:

E “As we see it, on the facts as found by the industrial tribunal, either the tribunal accepts the evidence of the board members that they were not motivated by racial considerations (in which case the claim fails) or it does not (in which case the claim is established by reason of the unavoidable inference the industrial tribunal has found). The failure by the industrial tribunal to decide that issue does not leave the matter decided by the burden of proof: it leaves the whole case undecided.”

F In the instant appeal counsel for the employee seeks to apply that dictum mutatis mutandis to the facts of the instant case and contends that the failure by the industrial tribunal to decide the issue of dismissal, to come down in favour of the evidence called on behalf of the employee or that called on behalf of the employer one way or the other, was not leaving the matter to be decided by the burden of proof, as the industrial tribunal recorded in paragraph 17 of its reasons, but was, as Browne-Wilkinson J. said in Khanna's case, leaving the whole case undecided. As I have said, however, I do not find the decision in Khanna's case entirely satisfactory.

H I think it unnecessary further to analyse those decisions. In my opinion what they come to is this. Judges and tribunals of fact should make findings of fact in relation to matters before them if they can. In most cases, although in some cases it may be difficult, they can do just that. Having made them, the tribunal is entitled to draw inferences from the findings of primary fact where appropriate. In the exceptional case, however, a judge conscientiously seeking to decide the matter before him may be forced to say “I just do not know:” indeed to say anything else might be in breach of his judicial duty. In this connection, however, I would say this. Speaking from my own experience some people find it easier to make up their minds than others and it should not be thought that a swift reliance upon where the burden of proof lies and a failure to decide issues of fact in the case, ought in any way to be considered an easy or convenient refuge for anybody who does find it difficult to make up his mind in a particular case. Judges should, so far as is practicable and so far as it is in accordance with their conscientious duty, make findings of fact. But it is in the exceptional case that they may be forced to reach the conclusion that they do not know on which side of the line the decision ought to be. In any event, where the ultimate decision can only be between two alternatives, for instance negligence or not, or, as in the instant appeal, dismissal or resignation, then when all the evidence in the case has been called the judge or the tribunal should ask himself or itself whether, on that totality of the evidence, on the balance of probabilities, drawing whatever inferences may be thought to be appropriate, the alternative which it is necessary for the plaintiff to establish in order to succeed is made out. If it is not, then the operation of the principle of the burden of proof comes into play and the plaintiff fails. But in those cases in which the ultimate decision could be between more than two possibilities, as for instance in the two running-down actions to which I have referred, again the judge should at the end of the day look at the whole of the evidence that has been called before him, drawing inferences where appropriate, and ask himself what has or has not been shown on the balance of probabilities, and then, bearing in mind where the onus of proof lies, decide whether the plaintiff or the defendant succeeds, or both succeed.

In my opinion that is what the industrial tribunal did in the instant case. It was entitled, if it found itself unable to decide which party's evidence it preferred on the balance of probabilities, ultimately to fall back on the onus of proof which lay upon the employee to prove that he had in fact been dismissed. I do not find that the criticisms which the majority of the appeal tribunal made of the industrial tribunal's findings on this particular point can be substantiated. There was, as I have indicated, no absolute obligation upon the industrial tribunal to reach a finding of fact. If at the end of the day it found itself unable to reach a conclusion which was to be preferred, it was entitled so to state and thereafter to decide the application, applying the onus of proof.

So much for the main criticism which the appeal tribunal made of the industrial tribunal's decision and the principal basis upon which this appeal was argued on behalf of the employee before us, an argument for which I am grateful.

The second part of Mr. McLaren's argument on behalf of the employee can be taken compendiously. He submitted that where the decision to which the tribunal has to come can be between two alternatives only, and where the employee's evidence, taken on its own, is sufficient to make out his case, the industrial tribunal must, however difficult it may be, reach a conclusion on the material question of fact. But he then went on to complain that the reason why the industrial tribunal did not do so in the instant case was because it approached the matter before it improperly. It should not (as Mr. McLaren put it, with a certain lack of respect for the industrial tribunal) have given the impression that it had ducked its duty to reach a decision; the industrial tribunal should have set out in much greater detail than it did its findings on other facts, its reasoning, its analysis of those facts, where that analysis had led it, and why in the end it found that it was unable to reach a conclusion one way or the other. That was a basis upon

3 W.L.R.

Morris v. London Iron Co. (C.A.)

May L.J.

A which the majority of the appeal tribunal also criticised the industrial tribunal below.

B In dealing with that submission (which, if I may say with respect, I do not accept) I will briefly refer to passages from the judgment of Eveleigh L.J. in Varndell v. Kearney & Trecker Marwin Ltd. [1983] I.C.R. 683 and also to two short quotations by him in the course of that judgment from earlier judgments of Sir John Donaldson in the Court of Appeal and the National Industrial Relations Court. Eveleigh L.J. said in Varndell's case, at p. 693:

C "It seems to me that the arguments put forward on behalf of the employees in effect require, not a statement of reasons, but an analysis of the facts and arguments on both sides, with reasons for rejecting the arguments of the employees and reasons for accepting the facts relied upon in support of the tribunal's conclusion. . . . There is no right of appeal on a question of fact, so of what use, generally speaking, is it to have a detailed recitation of the evidence? A conclusion of fact with which this court or the appeal tribunal might disagree, provided it is justifiable on the evidence, gives rise to no ground of appeal."

D The first quotation from Donaldson L.J., which was quoted by Eveleigh L.J. at p. 685 (referring to the reasons of an industrial tribunal for their decision) was from Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians v. Brain [1981] I.C.R. 542, 551:

E "their purpose remains what it has always been, which is to tell the parties in broad terms why they lose or, as the case may be, win. I think it would be a thousand pities if these reasons began to be subjected to a detailed analysis and appeals were to be brought based upon any such analysis. This, to my mind, is to misuse the purpose for which reasons are given."

Finally [1983] I.C.R. 683, 694, a quotation from Sir John Donaldson in Alexander Machinery (Dudley) Ltd. v. Crabtree [1974] I.C.R. 120, 122:

F "It is impossible for us to lay down any precise guidelines. The overriding test must always be: is the tribunal providing both parties with the materials which will enable them to know that the tribunal has made no error of law in reaching its findings of fact?"

G Applying those principles to the circumstances of the instant case, I can see no reason why, in the simple circumstances of this claim, there was any obligation on the industrial tribunal to enter upon any more detailed analysis of its reasoning and the way in which it reached its ultimate decision than it in fact gave in paragraphs 17 to 19 of its reasons.

H In those circumstances I think the second main basis upon which Mr. McLaren seeks to uphold the appeal tribunal's decision fails. In my judgment the criticisms of the two majority members of the appeal tribunal are not made out. I agree with the approach of the dissentient member of the appeal tribunal, and I would accordingly allow this appeal.

1472 shows that there is nothing in those cases to support the proposition that the court must at all costs come to a firm decision on questions of primary fact. The court normally will seek to do so, and it ought to, if it can. But it may clearly rely, where it is unable to make up its mind on that point, on the onus of proof. In those circumstances the result will be that the plaintiff will not have discharged the burden of proof.

In my view there was no misdirection in this case by the industrial tribunal. I agree entirely with the judgment of May L.J. and I would allow this appeal.

SIR DENYS BUCKLEY. I agree. I would like to associate myself with the emphasis by May L.J. in the judgment which he has delivered on the importance in litigation which turns upon matters of fact, of the tribunal of fact making findings of all the facts relevant to their decision which they feel able to make. It is necessary, in order to make clear the grounds of their decision, but the circumstances may in some cases (rare cases, I think) be such that the tribunal feels itself wholly unable to form a view as to what finding is, on the balance of probability, the view most likely to accord with the truth. In such a case, in the absence of any recognised presumptions which arise under the law (for instance, when two people die in a common disaster, that the younger survives the elder) which may provide a means of solving the problem in a case of that nature, where a tribunal is unable to form a conclusion, it has no alternative to falling back upon the burden of proof as the means of resolving the dispute between the parties. It seems to me that we are bound to accept what the industrial tribunal in the present case said at the end of its reasons to the effect that it found itself unable to make a finding of fact as to which version of the events described in the evidence was to be preferred. In those circumstances I think it reached the right conclusion in the matter.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

In wardship proceedings, evidence was given that the four wards might have been sexually abused by D., who was living with the wards' mother. The wards were committed to the care of the local authority for long term fostering with a view to adoption and the local authority were granted leave to take the wards to a clinic at a children's hospital which dealt in child abuse cases. The clinic considered that some, if not all, the wards had been sexually abused and, as a result, the Metropolitan Police began an investigation into whether criminal proceedings should be brought.

On the Commissioner of Police's application for leave of the court to permit disclosure to the police of the records and video recordings made by the clinic, leave to interview the wards and, if necessary, to subject them to a further medical investigation and leave to inspect the case records of the local authority:—

Held, (1) that notwithstanding the court had committed the care and control of the wards to the local authority, the court retained the duty to protect the interests of the wards until the discharge of the wardship and whether the police should see the medical records and video recordings for the purpose of a criminal investigation was not a matter for those having the day to day care of the wards but a matter for the judge exercising the wardship jurisdiction from whom directions should be sought (post, p. 850C–E).

F

(2) That the court had an unfettered discretion to grant leave for disclosure and in exercising that discretion the court had to balance the interests of the wards against the public interest which required that the police should not be obstructed in pursuing criminal investigations; that in all but the most exceptional circumstances the public interest in protecting not only the wards but other children from the perpetrators of crime by providing evidence for use in criminal proceedings would outweigh the interests of the individual ward; and that in all the circumstances the court would grant leave for the disclosure to the police of the medical records and video recordings made by the hospital and would grant leave to the police to interview the wards and, if necessary, subject the wards to a further medical examination (post, pp. 850G–H, 851C–D, F–H).

H

(3) That the case records of the local authority kept under the provisions of the Boarding-Out of Children Regulations 1955 were confidential records of the local authority and were protected from disclosure under the principle of public interest immunity; that, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to order the disclosure of those documents unless they had become part of the evidence in the wardship proceedings and thereby subject to the provisions of section 12(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 (post, pp. 852A-B, H-853A, B-C).

(4) That where case records formed the basis of the evidence given on behalf of the local authority in the wardship proceedings, the local authority did not thereby waive the immunity of those documents; but that where extracts from the case records had been exhibited to an affidavit in the wardship proceedings, the local authority had waived their immunity and the provisions of section 12(1) of the Act of 1960 applied so that the leave of the court was required before those extracts could be disclosed to the police; and that, in the exercise of its discretion, the court would grant leave for those extracts to be disclosed (post, p. 853F-H).

SUMMONS

Officers of the Metropolitan Police were undertaking an investigation into whether criminal offences had been committed against four wards of court, who had subsequently been committed to the care of the local authority. The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis applied to the court seized of the wardship proceedings for an order that the medical records and video recordings made in diagnostic interviews with the four wards at a specialist clinic concerned with sexual abuse of children be disclosed to the police officers; for permission for the officers to interview the wards and, if necessary, for further medical examination of the wards; and for the disclosure of the case records kept by the local authority concerning the wards.

The hearing was in chambers and the reserved judgment was handed down in chambers. The judgment is reported by consent of Booth J.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

A Patricia May for the applicant, Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Barbara Slomnicka for the local authority.

Cur. adv. vult.

B 16 December. BOOTH J. handed down the following judgment. On 29 October 1985, I made an order dealing with the long-term future of four wards of court, two boys aged eight and five, and two girls one of whom is nearly four and the other is two. The plaintiff in the proceedings is the local authority. The mother is the first defendant and her former cohabitee, who is the father of the youngest child, is the second C defendant. I will refer to him as Mr. D. By my order I confirmed the wardship and committed all the wards to the care of the local authority with leave for them to be placed with long-term foster parents with a view to adoption. I terminated access by the mother and Mr. D.

During the course of a long hearing some evidence was given by the local authority's social workers which strongly suggested that the wards had been subjected to sexual abuse by Mr. D. In view of that, at the conclusion of the hearing I gave leave to the local authority to take the D wards to Great Ormond Street Hospital for Sick Children for interview and examination by the specialist team working with sexually abused children. The findings of this team have confirmed the likelihood that some, if not all, of the wards have indeed been so abused and this matter is now the subject of investigation by the Metropolitan Police.

E It is against that background that counsel instructed on behalf of the Metropolitan Police Commissioner has sought the leave of the court for the disclosure to the police of medical records and video recordings made in consequence of my order at diagnostic interviews with the children at Great Ormond Street Hospital and for leave for the police to interview the children and subject them to medical examinations.
 Counsel also seeks directions with regard to inspection by the police of the local authority's case records which are relevant to this issue and F which may be of some assistance to their inquiry. The summons also asked that all documents in the wardship proceedings be disclosed to the police but that request has not been pursued.

The application was first made on behalf of the police by the plaintiff local authority without notice to the mother or Mr. D. Quite apart from the question whether or not the mother and Mr. D. should be informed,
 I took the view that in the circumstances it was not a proper step for the G local authority to take since a conflict might arise between the interests of the police and those of the wards for whom, by my order, the local authority was responsible. I further indicated that I wished to hear legal argument with regard to this application.

Accordingly, I directed that the police should be separately represented for this purpose, as is now the case. Their application is, H however, supported by the local authority, save in so far as it relates to having the wards further medically examined, as to which some concern is now expressed as to whether it is in the best interests of the wards.

Notice of this application had not been given either to the mother or Mr. D. The police have at all times been anxious that they should not be given prior knowledge of the intended investigations as they believe that this could be prejudicial to their final outcome. Having regard to the nature of the relief sought I consider this to be a proper course to take. The police do not now ask to see any affidavits or any transcript of the oral evidence before the court, nor do they seek the disclosure of any documents which have at any time been in the possession or control of either the mother or Mr. D.

So far as the wards are concerned the protection of their interests is now primarily a matter for the local authority to whose care they have been committed. So it seemed to me that neither the mother nor Mr. D. was directly concerned with the subject matter of this application and that in view of the possible prejudice to the police investigations, were they to be involved, it was proper to proceed in their absence.

In so far as the police desire to see the medical records and video recordings held by Great Ormond Street Hospital, in my judgment leave of the court is first required, despite the fact that such records and recordings only came into existence after the conclusion of the wardship hearing. When the wardship jurisdiction is invoked and exercised the court retains its duty to protect the interests of the ward for the duration of the wardship and does not divest itself of that duty by committing them to the care and control of one or more of the parties or, as in this case, to the care of the local authority: see In re Y. (A Minor) (Child in Care: Access) [1976] Fam. 125 and In re G.-U. (A Minor) (Wardship) [1984] F.L.R. 811. So it is still necessary to seek directions from the court whenever it is proposed to take a major step in the lives of the wards.

In my judgment, the disclosure to the police of the medical records and recordings for the purpose of criminal investigations falls into this category of decision and is a matter outside the scope of a party to whose care the ward is committed. The decision is not a matter which arises in the day to day care of the ward and the effect of granting the application could be far reaching. Indeed, the result of it could lead to the direct involvement of the ward in criminal proceedings, a fact which could be regarded as detrimental to his or her interests. It is, therefore, clearly a step of considerable importance in the life of any child. Similarly, if the police are to interview and conduct medical examinations of the wards then leave of the court must first be given. Such medical examinations do not have a therapeutic purpose, but a forensic purpose and, as in the case of the disclosure of the medical records and the video recordings, they may lead to the wards' direct involvement in subsequent proceedings. But if leave is given for the disclosure of those records and video recordings it seems to me that it must follow that leave must also be given to the police to conduct interviews with and, if necessary, examinations of, the wards. Having enabled the police to start upon an inquiry it would not be realistic, save in exceptional and presently unforeseen circumstances, to impose such limits upon them.

A judge dealing with an application such as is now made by the police has an unfettered discretion to grant or to refuse it: per Rees J. in In re R. (M. J.) (A Minor) (Publication of Transcript) [1975] Fam. 89, 98. In this case it is a matter of balancing the interests of the four young children who are the wards against the public interest that requires that no obstacle be placed in the way of the police in the course of their criminal investigations. From the wards' point of view, they have already been subjected to disturbed and unsettled lives during the course of which some, if not all, have been sexually abused. The elder children are undoubtedly able to remember a good deal of what has taken place and their memories cannot be healthy or pleasant. The process of

A healing those wounds, in so far as they can be healed, has only just begun. If the wards are now to be subjected to renewed questioning and examination it seems to me, as a matter of common sense, that it could lead to further distress and unhappiness which would be compounded were they to be called to give evidence in criminal proceedings.

B I accept the assurance of the police that all necessary procedures would be carried out with the least possible inconvenience and distress to the wards and with their welfare in mind. It has been made clear that medical examinations would be conducted only when they were clearly shown to be necessary by reason of the other information in the hands of the police. Nevertheless, I would be failing in my judicial duty to the wards were I not to consider that by granting the leave that is sought the likely outcome for them would be unhappy, if not, in a sense, detrimental.

C The court not only has a duty to protect its wards from potential harm, it also has a duty to uphold the public interest. Mrs. May, on behalf of the commissioner, has argued that public policy dictates that nothing should impede the police in carrying out their statutory duties or impede anyone from giving the police information in furtherance of their lawful inquiries. I am told by Miss Slomnicka, for the local authority, that it is the invariable practice of this local authority, and no doubt of many other local authorities, to invite representatives of the police to attend case conferences relating to the children in their care. This being so, information is available to the police from this source as to whether or not a criminal offence may have been committed. In relation to those children who are not wards of court the police, with the co-operation of the local authority, are free to conduct such investigations as they think fit and they will, where necessary, have access to the case records made by the social workers. The court, therefore, should be slow to interfere in this process in respect of its wards who are in local authority care. The protection afforded to a child by the exercise of the wardship jurisdiction should not be extended to the point where it gives protection to offenders against the law and, indeed, offenders against the wards themselves. In relation to those children who are not wards of court the police, with the co-operation of the local authority, are free to conduct such investigations as they think fit and they will, where necessary, have access to the case records made by the social workers. The court, therefore, should be slow to interfere in this process in respect of its wards who are in local authority care. The protection afforded to a child by the exercise of the wardship jurisdiction should not be extended to the point where it gives protection to offenders against the law and, indeed, offenders against the wards themselves. The court must take into consideration, as a matter of public policy, the need to safeguard not only its wards but other children against the harm they may suffer as the result of recurring crimes by undetected criminals.

F The likely outcome and its effects upon a ward of granting an application such as the police now make must be considered in each and every case. But when balanced against the competing public interest which requires the court to protect society from the perpetration of crime it could only be in exceptional circumstances that the interests of the individual ward should prevail. In this case, although the results may be far-reaching and unpleasant for these young and damaged children, their interests are secondary to that greater public need. I am satisfied that on the facts this application is wholly justified and that the police should have the leave they seek in respect of the medical records and video recordings now in the possession of Great Ormond Street Hospital and that they should have leave to interview and, if necessary, medically examine the wards.

H I turn now to the application which relates to the case records made in respect of the wards by the local authority. The police ask for access to those documents. They do not ask to see the evidence filed by the local authority in the wardship proceedings. Nevertheless, much of that evidence, particularly that of the social workers, was based upon information contained in the records. In one instance an extract from the case records relating to allegations made by the children to their foster mother and to the social worker, was exhibited to an affidavit which was before the court. As a result, if the police have access to the case records then they will come to know a good deal of the information which was placed by way of evidence before the court. The local authority are willing that this should be so, but in the circumstances they seek directions as to whether or not the leave of the court is first required.

Section 12 of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 precludes the publication of information relating to proceedings in private. The relevant part of that section reads:

“(1) The publication of information relating to proceedings before any court sitting in private shall not of itself be contempt of court except in the following cases, that is to say—(a) where the proceedings relate to the wardship or adoption of an infant or wholly or mainly to the guardianship, custody, maintenance or upbringing of an infant, or rights of access to an infant . . .”

It is well established that the court has an absolute discretion to give leave in a proper case to publish such information relating to proceedings: see In re R. (M. J.) (A Minor) (Publication of Transcript) [1975] Fam. 89. Thus, if it is desired to disclose evidence placed before the court in such proceedings, leave is undoubtedly necessary. In this case the first question I have to determine is whether the words in the section “information relating to proceedings” should be construed to cover documents which do not themselves form part of the evidence but which contain information upon which evidence was based.

The general rule that the court sits in private in wardship proceedings was evolved to guard the interests of the ward: see per Viscount Haldane L.C. in Scott v. Scott [1913] A.C. 417, 437. Equally, the statutory prohibition against publication of information relating to such proceedings must be deemed to have been enacted for the protection of the child.

I have not heard argument from the Bar as to the construction of this subsection but if the court is to fulfil its duty to protect a child then the words “information relating to such proceedings” must not bear too narrow a meaning. In the context of a case such as this the statute would preclude publication of the evidence presented to the court and in my judgment this would extend to statements prepared by a party or a witness for the purpose of such proceedings. If this were not to be the case the intention of the legislature could be thwarted by the publication of such statements upon the basis that they did not themselves constitute evidence before the court.

The case records of the social services department come within a different category. First, they are not records which are prepared for the purpose of legal proceedings: they are made by local authorities pursuant to a duty imposed upon them by the Boarding-Out of Children Regulations 1955. Secondly, by reason of public interest, the confidentiality of case records is preserved and as a general rule they are privileged from disclosure in court: see In re D. (Infants) [1970] 1 W.L.R. 599, applied in D. v. National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children [1978]

A A.C. 171, 191. This is the application of the principle now known as public interest immunity.

In those circumstances, since it cannot compel the disclosure of those records it would not seem appropriate for the court to seek to exercise any control over them and to make them the subject matter of any directions. If this is so, then in this case the local authority must be free to determine whether or not to allow the police access to them.

B Again, this is not a matter upon which I have had full argument from the Bar. But I am satisfied that so far as the case records do not relate to matters which were placed in evidence before the court, there could be no basis upon which the court could, or should, give the local authority any directions as to their use. If, by reason of having had access to such records, the police or any other authorised agency or person then wishes to take steps directly affecting a ward, leave of the court will first be necessary.

C I have been less clear as to the position with regard to those case records upon which evidence placed before the court was based, although they do not of themselves form part of that evidence. Undoubtedly, such records continue to be protected from disclosure by reason of the principle of public interest immunity: see In re S. and W. (Minors) (Confidential Reports) (1983) 4 F.L.R. 290. Although the court has the statutory right and duty to protect a child by means of its control over information relating to proceedings heard in private, this must be balanced against the right of the local authority to preserve the confidentiality of its records and thereby to control access to them.

D Since confidentiality in the records could not be considered to have been waived by reason only of the fact that they have been relied upon as the foundation for the social workers' evidence, I have come to the conclusion that those records also do not fall within the ambit of section 12(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960. To come to the contrary decision could have the effect of placing an unrealistic fetter upon the local authority in the course of their day-to-day use of their records and it would also serve to draw a distinction between the records of those children in care who are wards and those who are not, which would be difficult to observe.

E In my judgment, a distinction must be made with regard to the verbatim extract from the case records, which in this case was exhibited to an affidavit made by a social worker. This exhibit was disclosed and filed by the local authority as part of its evidence to the court. Confidentiality in respect of this part of the case records has clearly been waived.

F The exhibit undoubtedly contains information relating to the proceedings since it constitutes a part of the evidence. I am satisfied that for this reason the extract of the case records comes within the ambit of section 12(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 and that its publication is precluded without leave of the court. As to whether or not that leave should be given I must adopt the approach I have taken with regard to the medical records and video recordings, so that for the same reasons I give leave for this extract from the local authority's case records to be made available to the police.

The applicants owned the freehold of a block of flats, 14 of which were let on long leases at low rents and the remaining six were let on periodic protected tenancies. The block was in a state of disrepair, substantial works being needed in particular to the roof and common parts, including passages and staircases. At all material times it was agreed that the local authority could serve repairs notices on leaseholders under the provisions of sections 9(1A) and 18 of the Housing Act 1957¹ in respect of works required to be done in relation to a particular flat. However the local authority had since 1981 been anxious to utilise their powers under Part II of that Act to ensure that repairs were carried out to the fabric of the block. Following the service of a number of repairs notices in respect of the block that had been allowed to lapse, in 1984 the local authority decided to class each flat in the block as a "house" and accordingly they served notices under section 9(1A) on each of the 14 leaseholders and six on the applicants as "the person having control" of the flats subject to protected tenancies. In so serving those notices the local authority having noted that by section 189 of the Act of 1957 "house" included "appurtenances," were of the opinion that the roof and common parts of the block constituted appurtenances of each flat and could thus be subject to each of the notices. Attached to each notice was a schedule divided into two parts specifying first works of internal repair to a particular flat and second external works of repair to the block and internal works to the shared common parts. On receipt of the notices the leaseholders and the applicants applied to the local authority for mandatory repairs grants under sections 71 and 71A of the Housing Act 1974² in respect of the works required to be done. The local authority refused to make payments on the ground that they had come to the conclusion that all the repairs notices were invalid because leaseholders

A and tenants could not be required to carry out repairs to the roof and common parts in so far as they were not included in the leases or tenancies of each particular flat. The applicants thereupon sought judicial review to compel the local authority. Hodgson J. dismissed the application upholding the local authority's contention that the notices were not valid, could not be severed so as to allow them to stand in relation to internal repairs of particular flats and that the local authority were not estopped from challenging the validity of the notices.

C Held, dismissing the appeal, (1) that although an individual flat in a block was a "part of a building" within the meaning of section 18 of the Housing Act 1957 and as such could be the subject of a repairs notice under section 9(1A) of the Act, it was not a "house" within the meaning of Part II of the Act so that the extended definition of "house" contained in section 189 of the Act did not apply so as to include "appurtenances belonging thereto"; that accordingly even if the rights relating to the roof and common parts were "appurtenances" of each individual flat the notices could not require works of repair to such parts to be carried out by the leaseholders (post, p. 864B–E).

D (2) That section 18 of the Housing Act 1957 did not of itself enable the local authority to serve valid notices on the leaseholders to do repairs outside each particular demise because section 9(1A) of the Act required the notices to be served on the "person having control" of the house and in relation to the roof and common parts of the block that person was the freehold owner; that it followed that a notice in relation to repairs outside the demise of any individual leaseholder could not validly be served on him (post, pp. 864G–H, 865B–C, 867G–868C).

E Pollway Nominees Ltd. v. Croydon London Borough Council [1987] A.C. 79, H.L.(E.) considered.

F (3) That as the leaseholders could not be required to do repairs to the roof and common parts the major object of the notices failed and, in the absence of any challenge by the applicants to the contents of the notices having been made to a county court, no material existed whereby works which the leaseholders could not properly be required to do could be severed so as to leave the remaining parts of the notices relating to the interiors of the flats valid (post, pp. 866H, 867B–C, D).

G Per Glidewell L.J. A house in its ordinary sense means a separate building. It may contain one dwelling or more than one. Whether a particular purpose-built block of flats is a "house" for the purposes of Part II is a question of fact (post, p. 864B–C).

APPEAL from Hodgson J.

The applicants, Clayhope Properties Ltd., the freeholders of a block of flats known as Dover Mansions, London S.W.9 sought judicial review by way of mandamus directed to Lambeth London Borough Council requiring them to make mandatory repairs pursuant to sections 71 and 71A of the Housing Act 1974. The application was refused by Hodgson J. sitting in the Queen's Bench Division on 8 October 1986.

The applicants by way of a notice dated 30 October 1986 appealed on the grounds that (1) the judge erred in holding that the several notices served under section 9(1A) of the Housing Act 1957 were not valid notices; he ought to have held that the notices were valid; (2) the judge erred in holding that the notices were invalid by reason that a flat within a block is not a "house" for the purposes of section 9(1A) of the Act and ought instead to have held either (a) such a flat was a house for the purposes of the section and the notices were valid accordingly, or (b) that they were valid as directed to part of a building under the provisions of section 18 of the Act; (3) the judge erred in holding that if the notices would otherwise have been valid they were nevertheless invalid because they included a requirement to do repairs to the common parts of the block outside the curtilage of each individual flat and ought instead to have held that (a) the definition of a "house" in section 189 included appurtenances and therefore (b)(i) on the footing that each flat was a "house" works required by a notice might (and in the instant case should) include works outside the curtilage of the flat where such works were in respect of the physical subject matter of rights enjoyed in respect of the flat over other parts of the block, and (ii) the works required by the notices in the instant case were works to the physical subject matter of rights actually enjoyed in respect of each flat, alternatively, (c)(i) on the footing that a flat was not itself a "house" but had to be treated as a "part of a building," that works required by a notice nevertheless might include works outside the curtilage because unless such works were executed the standard required by section 9(1A)

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Lambeth L.B.C., Ex p. Clayhope Ltd. (C.A.)

A of the Act could not be achieved (whether such standard was required to be applied to the whole block as being a "house" or to the demised premises or to some other part of the block as being a "house"); (ii) such works required to be done outside the curtilage of the individual flat might and in the instant case should include works outside the curtilage of the flat in respect of the physical subject matter of rights enjoyed in respect of the flat over other parts of the block, and (iii) the works required by the notices were works to the physical subject matter of rights actually enjoyed in respect of each flat, and were works which the tenant of the relevant flat was entitled to execute; (4) the judge erred in holding that if and in so far as any notice required works to be done to parts of the relevant block which were outside the curtilage of the flat to which such notice referred or that were works which the local authority had no authority to do or to require to be done the notices were not severable and were therefore void and ought instead to have held that as a general proposition such notices were severable; (5) alternatively to (4) the judge erred in holding, in so far as he did hold, that because any individual notice contained some works which ought not to have been required to be done by the person to whom that notice was addressed, the entire notice was void and ought in any event to have decided that since the recipient of a notice had the right to appeal the notices to the county court that court had by virtue of section 11 of the Act power to vary the notices by removing from them works which ought not to have been required to be done, any notice not so varied on appeal ought to be regarded as a valid notice notwithstanding that it required to be done works which ought not to have been required; (6) the judge ought accordingly to have held that the notices were valid and that each one was capable of founding an application for a mandatory grant and his conclusion that no such grant was payable was accordingly wrong.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Glidewell L.J.

John Colyer Q.C. and Roger Cooke for the applicants.

Andrew Arden and Caroline Hunter for the local authority.

GLIDEWELL L.J. delivered the first judgment. This is an appeal against a decision of Hodgson J. given on 8 October 1986 refusing an application for judicial review; that is to say, refusing an order of mandamus requiring the local authority, Lambeth London Borough Council, to make to the applicants, Clayhope Properties Ltd., mandatory repairs grants under section 71A of the Housing Act 1974, amended by the Housing Act 1980.

The applicants are the freehold owners of a mansion block of flats called Dover Mansions, Canterbury Crescent, S.W.9. The block comprises 20 flats, served by two entrances; 14 are held on 99-year leases at low ground rents and six are on protected tenancies. The roof and some common parts, including the passages and staircases, are not included in either the leases or the tenancies.

With that brief introduction I turn to consider the legislation which forms the battleground of this appeal. Part VII of the Housing Act 1974 empowers, and in some cases requires, local authorities to make grants for the improvement or repair of dwellings. Repairs grants are mandatory if the provisions of section 71A of the Act of 1974 are fulfilled, but otherwise they are discretionary. The local authority's finances do not enable them to make discretionary grants. Section 71A, so far as is material, reads: A

“In so far as an application for a repairs grant relates to the execution of works required by a notice under section 9 of the Housing Act 1957 . . . (b) the authority shall not refuse it if it is duly made and the authority are satisfied that the works are necessary for compliance with the notice.” B

One comes, therefore, to section 9 of the Housing Act 1957, which was in force at all times material to this appeal, though its provisions have now been replaced by similar, though not totally identical, provisions in the Housing Act 1985. Section 9 is concerned, under the general rubric “Unfit premises capable of repair at reasonable cost” with the power of local authorities to require the repair of houses. Section 9(1) gives a local authority power to require the repair of a house which in their opinion is unfit for human habitation, provided it is not incapable of being made habitable at reasonable expense. This case is concerned with subsection (1A), which was added by section 72 of the Housing Act 1969. It provides: C

“Where a local authority . . . are satisfied that a house is in such state of disrepair that, although it is not unfit for human habitation, substantial repairs are required to bring it up to a reasonable standard, having regard to its age, character and locality, they may serve upon the person having control of the house a notice requiring him, within such reasonable time, not being less than 21 days, as may be specified in the notice, to execute the works specified in the notice, not being works of internal decorative repair.” D E

By section 9(2) and (3):

“(2) In addition to serving a notice under this section on the person having control of the house, the local authority may serve a copy of the notice on any other person having an interest in the house, whether as freeholder, mortgagee, lessee or otherwise. (3) In this and the three next following sections references to a house include a reference to a hut, tent, caravan or other temporary or moveable form of shelter which is used for human habitation” F

The phrase “person having the control of a house” is defined in section 39(2) of the Act:

“For the purposes of this Part of this Act”—that is to say Part II—“the person who receives the rack-rent of a house, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive it if the house were let at a rack-rent, shall be deemed to be the person having control of the house. In this subsection the expression ‘rack-rent’ means rent which is not less than two-thirds of the full net annual value of the house.” G H

In the present case it is common ground that the 14 flats the subject of long leases, were not, and are not, let at rack-rents but if they were to be let at rents exceeding two-thirds of the full net annual value of the house, the person who would be entitled to receive that rent would in each case be the leaseholder. The person having control of the house is thus, as far as the leasehold flats are concerned, the leaseholder. In respect of the six other flats, the subject of the controlled tenancies, it is

Glidewell L.J.

A the applicants, because they do, or they did at the material time, receive rack-rents from their tenants.

B What is a “house” for the purposes of this Act, or at any rate for the purposes of this Part of this Act? There are two references in the Act to what the word “house” can include. I have already read section 9(3), which does not apply. The other reference is in the interpretation section, section 189(1). That provides: “‘house’ includes—(a) any yard, garden, outhouses, and appurtenances belonging thereto or usually enjoyed therewith . . .” (b) does not apply to Part II of the Act of 1957 but it should perhaps be read because it throws some light on the meaning of the word “house”:

C “(b) for the purposes of any provisions of this Act relating to the provision of housing accommodation, any part of a building which is occupied or intended to be occupied as a separate dwelling.”

D So for the purposes of other provisions of the Act a part of a building intended to be occupied as a separate dwelling is a house, but not for the purposes of this Part of the Act. If the premises are not a “house,” nevertheless the provisions of Part II of the Act may apply, because there is another provision which so far I have not reached, namely section 18, which reads:

“(1) A local authority may under the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act take the like proceedings in relation to—(a) any part of a building which is used, or is suitable for use, as a dwelling . . . as they are empowered to take in relation to a house . . .”

E The qualification which follows again does not arise in the present case. So if the premises are not a house, but are part of a building which is used, or which is suitable for use, as a dwelling—and for this purpose the building itself may be a building wholly or partly, or the rest of it not at all, in residential occupation—then that part is a part in respect of which the local authority may take the same sort of proceedings as they may take in respect of a house under the earlier parts of that Part of the Act, and thus may serve a section 9(1A) repairs notice. Indeed, as I shall say later, although the question whether each of these flats is a house is a, if not the, major issue in this appeal, if the answer is “no, each flat is not a house,” it is common ground that each flat is certainly a part of a building used as a dwelling, and section 9(1A) repairs notices can properly be served in respect of each flat.

G There are two other provisions of the Act of 1957 to which I should refer before I come briefly to the facts. If a repairs notice is served, under section 11 there is a right of appeal against it. Section 11(1) reads:

“Any person aggrieved by—(a) a notice under the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act requiring the execution of works . . . may, within 21 days of the service of the notice, demand or order, appeal to the county court . . .”

H By subsection (3), which I can summarise, on an appeal to the county court the judge may either confirm or quash or vary the notice as he thinks fit. So he has, as it seems to me, total discretion to arrive at whatever conclusion he thinks right in all the circumstances; he might quash the notice or he might say that the notice should be varied by deleting some of the works required to be done. Finally, under section 37(1):

"Any notice, demand or order against which an appeal might be brought to a county court under this Part of this Act shall, if no such appeal is brought, become operative on the expiration of 21 days from the date of the service of the notice, demand or order, and shall be final and conclusive as to any matters which could have been raised on such an appeal . . ."

I turn now to the history. In May 1981 the local authority served a notice on the applicants under section 9(1A) in respect of repairs to the whole block. The local authority did so on the basis that Dover Mansions as an entity was a "house" within Part II of the Act. The applicants appealed to the county court. That appeal stands adjourned and has not yet been heard. If the notice had been upheld on the appeal, the local authority accept that they would be liable to pay a mandatory repairs grant to the applicants under section 71A of the Housing Act 1974, and indeed the applicants applied for such a grant. But before anything had happened in respect of that application, there had been two material changes. First, by 1984, the condition of the block had deteriorated further, so that the schedule of repairs appended to the 1981 notice needed amendments and additions; secondly, doubt had arisen whether the whole block could properly be considered to be a "house." The local authority therefore decided to change course. They decided to serve fresh notices, this time the notices with which this appeal is concerned. They are 20 in all, one in respect of each flat, 14 on the leaseholders and six on the applicants as the persons having the control of the flats the subject of the short tenancies. Those notices were served on or about 23 March 1984 and I should refer briefly to their contents. As I have said, 14 were addressed to the individual leaseholders and, apart from the formal parts of the notices, there is attached a sheet which reads:

"The attached schedule is divided into two parts as follows: part A internal works of repair in connection with the specified flat; part B external works of repair to the whole block and internal works to the shared common parts. Each recipient of this notice is responsible for all the works specified in part A and one twentieth of the cost of the works in part B of the schedule."

There then follows some five pages of schedule in part A, and 18 pages in part B. The works to the interior of the flats include such things as replastering, replacing defective window frames and doors. The works to the exterior and to the common parts are not merely in length and description, but in fact, much more extensive. In particular, they include a complete reroofing of the entire property, together with extensive repairs to the brickwork and stonework of the exterior walls.

Following the service of those notices, applications were made for grants under section 71A of the Act of 1974 in respect of each flat by the leaseholders and the tenants, each accompanied by a request that the money should be paid to the receiver appointed to receive the money on behalf of the applicants. Nothing turns on that. The applicants, but not the leaseholders, appealed to the county court in respect of the six tenancy flats against the 1984 repairs notices. Those appeals are still outstanding. It is clear, and I believe it to be common ground, that the Part B repairs are substantially the major part of the repairs required to be carried out in these repairs notices. All are agreed that the block,

Reg. v. Lambeth L.B.C., Ex p. Clayhope Ltd. (C.A.)

Glidewell L.J.

A and the flats within the block, are in bad condition and that major repairs are necessary.

In confirmation of what I have just said, in a letter of 22 March 1984 from solicitors acting, I believe at that stage, on behalf of the leaseholders, Zelim & Zelim, they said:

B “Clearly, therefore, the lessees have ‘control’ only over the insides of their flats. As you are aware, the majority of the damage is on the exterior and common parts, in respect of which the lessees simply cannot have any control.”

C However, on 17 October 1984 the local authority wrote to the solicitors for the applicants, saying in effect that they had changed their minds again, and that current legal opinion is “that we are not able to grant-aid works to common parts and areas of shared responsibility.” By this time they had doubts as to the validity or effect of the 20 notices which they had served earlier in that year, and indeed doubts as to whether they could achieve a situation in which they could be required to make mandatory grants in respect of the roof, the exterior walls and the common parts, and therefore they have made no grants at all. Accordingly, the applicants made the present application for an order D for mandamus in May 1985. In July 1985 the local authority were advised by counsel that notices could not validly be served on the leaseholders, or indeed in respect of individual flats which required repairs to the roof, the exterior walls or common parts, in so far as they were not included in the leases or tenancies of the flats.

E So one has a Gilbertian situation. The local authority, though anxious to have the repairs done, and though happy to pay any grants which they can properly be required to make under section 71A of the Act of 1974—the major proportion of which, I should say, will come from the Department of the Environment—argue that the repairs notices of March 1984 in respect of the individual flats, are misconceived and invalid. The applicants argue that the repairs notices are perfectly sound and valid and that therefore the local authority should be ordered to F make the grants. The form of order sought is

G “an order of mandamus directed to the Lambeth Borough Council requiring them to make according to law mandatory repair grants pursuant to section 71 and 71A of the Housing Act 1974 in respect of each and every flat contained in the mansion block known as Dover Mansions . . . or alternatively flats nos. 2, 5, 8, 12, 14 and 17 contained in Dover Mansions” those being the subject of the short tenancies.

Mr. Colyer, for the applicants, accepted that grants under section 9(1A) are only payable if the repairs notices are valid and effective. He said that he can reach the conclusion that the repairs notices are valid by either of two alternative routes. I describe route one shortly as follows:

H (i) each flat is a “house” within Part II of the Act of 1957; (ii) under section 189 a house includes its appurtenances; (iii) the leaseholders have rights of support, shelter and way relating to the walls, roof and passages. If the applicants decline to honour their obligations under the leases to keep the roof, main walls and passages under repair, the leaseholders may carry out these repairs themselves. Thus, the easements are “appurtenances” to, and thus part of, each flat within the definition of “house” in section 189, which I have already read. Thus, a notice requiring repair of the common parts and the roof and walls relates to the "house." As an alternative to (iii), (iv) if the easements are not appurtenances, the leaseholders nevertheless have the right to do the repairs, as I have already said, and under section 9(1A) the repairs the subject of the notice, need not be repairs to the "house" itself, but may be repairs outside the limit of the "house."

Route two is the route to be followed if the flat is not a "house" for the purposes of Part II of the Act. In that case, (i) each flat is part of a building used as a dwelling. Mr. Arden, for the local authority, accepted and asserted that this is the case, that if an application for repairs notices were required only in respect of the interior of the flats, such notices could be served on each leaseholder in respect of the individual flats and in respect of works to the flats, and that mandatory grants would be then payable. (ii) The "appurtenances" way is closed if this route is followed, because the section 189 definition applies only to a house, but (iii) the last point which I sought to describe as Mr. Colyer's alternative termination to route one provides a termination to route two also. In other words, he argued that if each flat is part of a building used as a dwelling, then an order can still be made requiring repairs to be done outside that dwelling. That raises the following issues: first, the major issue, is a flat a "house" within Part II of the Act of 1957? Hodgson J. in his judgment said:

"The local authority contend that these submissions fail in limine because a flat in a block is not a 'house'; it is only part of a building. I agree. I can find nothing in section 18 which would justify me in holding that a flat in a block is a house for the purposes of Part II of the Act. If that had been intended it could have been specifically provided. And, in this connection, it is, in my judgment, importantly indicative of statutory intention that specific provision is made under paragraph (b) relating to 'house' in section 189 that the word includes 'part of a building' for the purposes of provisions in the Act relating to the provision of housing accommodation; these provisions one finds in Part V of the Act: see also Critchell v. Lambeth Borough Council [1957] 2 Q.B. 535, 540 per Lord Evershed M.R.: 'In any case, in my judgment, [sections 9, 10 and 11 of the Act of 1936]—sections 9, 10 and 16 of the Act of 1957—'use the word "house," in their context as meaning what is commonly called a house—that is, a separate structure'."

That passage in that judgment, being a decision of this court, is of course authoritative.

We were referred to two other authorities which are of assistance: Quiltotex Co. Ltd. v. Minister of Housing and Local Government [1966] 1 Q.B. 704, a decision of Salmon L.J. sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division. It was a question which arose under Part III of the Housing Act 1957—that is the clearance and compulsory purchase part of the Act, the slum clearance part of the Act in ordinary parlance. The decision is to the effect that a house divided into tenements is nevertheless, or can nevertheless be, a "house" for the purposes of at least that Part of the Act, and for this purpose I apprehend that the same is true of Part II of the Act, because the definition, in so far as there is a definition in Part III, is the same as that in Part II. Salmon L.J. said, at pp. 713–714:

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Lambeth L.B.C., Ex p. Clayhope Ltd. (C.A.)

Glidewell L.J.

A "In this connection, it is perhaps worth noting that in another part of the Act, Part 2, there is section 5 which lends some support to the conclusion at which I have arrived. Section 5(1) reads:
B 'Notwithstanding anything in any local Act or byelaw in force in any borough or district, it shall not be lawful to erect any back-to-back houses intended to be used as dwellings for the working classes, and any such house shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be unfit for human habitation: Provided that nothing in this section shall prevent the erection or use of a house containing several tenements in which the tenements are placed back to back, if the medical officer of health for the borough or district certifies that the several tenements are so constructed and arranged as to secure effective ventilation of all habitable rooms in every tenement.' This C postulates a house containing several tenements. Each of these eight houses of the applicants is, in my view, a house containing several tenements and section 5 at any rate does lend support to the view that 'house' covers the genus 'tenement house.' No assistance can be gathered at all from the so-called definition of 'house' in section 189 because it merely extends the ordinary meaning of the word but does not attempt to define it."

D And so he decided.

Much more recently the House of Lords, in Pollway Nominees Ltd.
v. Croydon London Borough Council [1987] A.C. 79, had for consideration a question relating to a block containing 42 flats which were let on long leaseholds. One repairs notice was served under section 9(1A) in respect of the whole block on the freeholder. It was held at all E stages—by which I mean at first instance, by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords—that assuming, which was not in dispute, that the whole block was a "house" for the purposes of Part II of the Act nevertheless the freeholders were not the persons having control, and thus the notice could not be served on them. The leaseholders collectively were the persons having control. If I may interpolate, that means that in F this case the local authority's first attempt was wrong and that their first change of heart was well founded. In his speech, Lord Bridge of Harwich said, at p. 90:

G "The main issue has been argued both in the Court of Appeal and before your Lordships on the footing that Crown Point can properly be regarded as a 'house' within the meaning of section 9 of the Act of 1957. In so far as that may involve an admission of fact by the respondent, it is, of course, open to a party to make any admission of fact he chooses. But in so far as the matter proceeds upon a concession of law that a modern purpose-built block of flats is a 'house' to which the provisions we are considering apply, I am by no means prepared to accept it as necessarily correct. We have heard no argument on the point and I refrain from expressing any H opinion on it one way or the other. I apprehend, however, that a building originally constructed as a single dwellinghouse does not cease to be a 'house' under the Act if it is internally converted into a number of separate residential units which are then sold off on long leases, as commonly happens as an incident of a familiar form of contemporary property development. Accordingly, even if we may be addressing an artificial problem in relation to Crown Point, the question how the definition applies to a building which is undoubtedly a house where the separate residential units within the house are all let on long leases at ground rents is one that requires to be answered.”

As I hope I have made clear, the answer which was given was to the effect that the local authority's first attempt to serve the notice in this case was inappropriate, and that had they wanted to treat Dover Mansions as a house the proper course would have been to serve the 14 leaseholders plus the freeholder as together being the person having control of the whole house. It may be, we are told, that that is a course which the local authority will wish to adopt.

In my judgment Hodgson J. was correct in deciding that the individual flats in this building are not each a house. In my view a flat is not a house within Part II of the Act of 1957. A “house” in its ordinary sense means a separate building. It may contain one dwelling or more than one. Whether a particular purpose-built block of flats is a “house” for the purposes of Part II is a question of fact. In relation to this block I express no opinion. It may have to be tested later or it may not. The local authority may decide that it is a “house.” If they do, they may serve a notice accordingly. I assume that if they do, they will serve the notice on the person whom I have already referred to as being collectively the person having control in respect of the roof, exterior walls and common parts, and perhaps a series of individual notices on the leaseholders relating to each flat separately. But it is not for me to advise them. That is for them. Since it is my view that a flat is not a “house” my view is also that route one is barred to Mr. Colyer at its entrance, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider, and I do not propose to consider, the fascinating question whether the easements of shelter, support and way are appurtenances or not.

Mr. Colyer, therefore, can only succeed, if at all, by way of route two. As I have already said, it is accepted that a repairs notice can validly be served on a leaseholder of a flat under section 9(1A) in respect of repairs to that flat. Thus, the issue is: can such a notice also be served which requires repairs to part of the building not within the demise of an individual flat? Mr. Colyer submitted that it can. The works are, it is to be assumed, works which need to be done. He argued that Parliament must have intended that they should be done. The leaseholder has, either by express grant or by implication, the power to do the works of repair to the roof and so on if the freeholder fails to do them. This is enough to enable the notice to require the leaseholder to do such work, to be valid and effective. On the contrary, Mr. Arden argued that the legislation empowers the local authority to serve the notice on the “person having control,” because he is the person who can, and normally will, and should, undertake the repairs to his property. In relation to the roof and the common parts that person is the freeholder, the applicants. The fact that by contract the leaseholder has power to do the work in default does not make any leaseholder the person having control. Put another way, the premises a person can be required to repair are those of which he has control, that is, the premises included in his demise and no more. In this respect Mr. Arden referred us to the provisions of sections 11(3) and 12(1) of the Housing Act 1957. Section 11(3), so far as material, provides:

“On an appeal to the county court under this section the judge may make such order either confirming or quashing or varying the

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Lambeth L.B.C., Ex p. Clayhope Ltd. (C.A.)

Glidewell L.J.

A notice, demand or order as he thinks fit and where the judge allows an appeal against a notice requiring the execution of works to a house, he shall . . . ”

The rest does not matter. The passage that matters is that which requires the execution of works to a house. The same phrase is to be found in section 12(1), which begins: “Where a person has appealed against a notice under this Part of this Act requiring the execution of works to a house . . . ” So Mr. Arden drew support from those passages for the proposition that the works must be to the house or, if one is going by the section 18 route, to the part of the building occupied as a dwelling, and to nothing else.

I accept Mr. Arden’s argument in this respect as correct. In my view a notice under section 9(1A) in relation to works on the roof and common parts, which are not within the demise of any individual leaseholder, cannot be served on the leaseholder of the flat as an individual. Mr. Colyer argued that, if this is the case, there is a gap or lacuna in the law which will continue because the relevant provisions of the Housing Act 1985 contain the same definition of the “person having control.” Hodgson J. dealt with this argument in his judgment; he said:

“I do not myself find this lacuna, if it be one, particularly surprising. In Pollway Lord Bridge said: ‘I appreciate that this conclusion may cause inconvenience for local authorities. But I imagine that normally the contractual rights of the owners of long leasehold interests in flats to enforce repairing obligations against their lessors will provide an adequate solution to the problem. This may be the explanation of the fact that, though the formula found in the definition has been in common use in statutes since at least 1847, it was not until 1982 that its application to buildings divided into units let on long leases had to be considered by the courts. The truth, I suspect, is that generations of parliamentary draftsmen have been content to use the time-honoured formula without ever contemplating its application to the circumstances presently under consideration. That must surely be true of section 39(2) of the Act of 1957 which simply re-enacts the formula first used in its present context in section 17(1) of the Housing Act 1930. That Act introduced the compulsory procedure which we now see in expanded and amended form in Part II of the Act of 1957 requiring “the person having control of the house” to effect repairs to a house which was unfit for human habitation and which was “occupied or of a type suitable for occupation by persons of the working classes.” The draftsman in 1930 can hardly be blamed if it did not occur to him to make suitable provision for dealing with problems arising from flats let on long leases at low rents.’

“On the facts of this case the contractual rights enjoyed by the tenants are capable of providing, and will no doubt provide, an adequate solution to the problem at which Part II of the Act of 1957 is aimed. The misfortune is that, by limiting the grant legislation to work performed under a section 9 notice, the legislature have failed to provide for the making of grants in respect of the ‘outside’ work. Whether that comes about by oversight or intention matters not. If it is an unintentional lacuna it is for the legislature, if it wishes, to fill it; if it is an intentional restriction of grant aid (and this cannot be excluded) then, of course, whilst one may or may not think it fair, the court is in no way concerned.” A

If in a particular case a block of flats is a “house” for the purposes of Part II, a notice in respect of the roof and common parts can be served on the freeholder and the leaseholders together, as I have already said, following Pollway’s case [1987] A.C. 79. But if not, and there is no person who can be required by the local authority to repair the parts not demised, like Hodgson J. I do not find this surprising. Parliament has not yet thought it right to extend this part of the legislation to all flats let out on long leases, and thus must be assumed to think it right to rely upon the contractual provisions as between freeholder and long leaseholder. B

Mr. Colyer further argued that even if we reach, as I have now done, the conclusion set out above, we should not hold that the section 9(1A) notice is invalid. He argued, too, that the part of the works which the leaseholder cannot be required to do can be severed from the rest. In other words disregard part B and leave part A standing. I must confess that it is not totally clear to me that these are separate arguments or part and parcel of the same argument, but I believe it is the latter. Since there is a right of appeal to the county court, Mr. Colyer argued that that is the way in which the notice can be quashed, if it is to be quashed. The High Court should not achieve the same effect by declaring it invalid. This is not, he said, as in Pollway’s case, a notice addressed to the wrong person. It is a notice addressed to a person to whom it can be addressed, containing extraneous material, but still valid, and thus, under section 37(1) of the Act of 1957, it cannot properly be challenged save by way of appeal to the county court. Mr. Colyer referred us also to the decision of this court in Cohen v. West Ham Corporation [1933] Ch. 814, which is really to the same effect as section 37(1), namely that the notices are valid unless and until an appeal against them to the county court succeeds. As for that argument Hodgson J. said trenchantly: C

“In my judgment a notice which required a recipient to do work which is the main part of the requirement and which the local authority have no right in law to require him to do is as invalid and void as is a notice served on the wrong recipient: see Pollway’s case.” D E

Mr. Arden argued that it is clear that the purpose of these repair notices was to ensure that all the work was done. The work to the roof and common parts is, as I have already said, by far the major part. Whether the local authority would have served on the leaseholders notices requiring only the works to the interior of their flats, if they were not able to require the works to the roof and common parts to be done, must be in doubt; and he urged us not to hold that the notices remain valid. G

For my part I accept that, having decided that the leaseholders cannot be required to do the work to the roof and common parts, the major object of the repairs notices fails. In my view neither this court nor Hodgson J. had the material upon which we could sever the requirement for repairs, one part from another. If the appeals to the county court had been pursued, or if they are pursued, the judge can do exactly that if he thinks right. H

Glidewell L.J.

A Mr. Colyer concluded his submissions by saying that although he is in form asking for mandamus, what he really wants is a declaration as to his rights. In effect, in my judgment there is inherent a declaration that a flat is not a "house" for the purposes of Part II of the Act, and that in respect of the repairs to the roof and common parts, these notices accordingly could not be served on the leaseholders. But if Mr. Colyer meant that what he really wants is a declaration that nevertheless the notices are still valid and if he had sought that initially, I would refuse to grant such a declaration. Whether I would actually say, as did Hodgson J., that the notices were invalid matters not. What I am quite positive is that it would be pointless to grant a declaration that they were valid, when their major point will not be achieved. But a declaration is not what these proceedings are asking for. What the applicants seek is a mandamus to require the local authority to make grants to leaseholders under section 71(A) of the Act of 1974. The decision of Hodgson J. on the main issue, with which I entirely agree, inevitably means that the basis for requiring payment of mandatory grants is not established.

C Accordingly, in my view the judge was right to dismiss the application, and I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

D

SIR GEORGE WALLER. I agree and do not wish to add anything.

KERR L.J. I also agree that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Glidewell L.J. I only add a few words on what appears to me to be the short central issue among the many peripheral matters which have been argued.

This is the question whether the holder of a long lease of a flat in a block of flats can be required to carry out repairs to the common parts of the block pursuant to a notice served on him individually under section 9(1A) of the Housing Act 1957. That provides that the notice must be served on "the person having control." The person having the requisite control is defined in section 39 of the Act as the person who receives, or would be entitled to receive, the rack rent of the premises in question.

F

G

H

It is of course clear that in relation to repairs required to be done by the long leaseholder to his own flat, a section 9(1A) notice is good. He is the person in control of the flat within the definition of section 39(2). And although section 9(1A) refers to a "house," the proceedings can be served on him, and the same provisions apply mutatis mutandis, by virtue of section 18 which provides that the like proceedings may be taken in relation to "any part of a building." In my view it is only because of section 18, for the reasons explained by Glidewell L.J., that a section 9(1A) notice is effective to require repairs to flats to be carried out by the persons in control of them within the terms of section 39(2). The central issue, however, is whether such a person, by reason of such a notice served on him individually, can also be required to carry out repairs to the common parts of the block. For that purpose I take the roof of the block as an example which is in fact of particular importance here. In what relationship does the tenant of any particular flat stand to the roof of the block? There are, so far as I can see, only two connections between him and the roof; and certainly no others have been mentioned in argument. Both concern rights which he has in relation to the roof. Broadly speaking, he has a right to the protection of the roof against the ingress of rain and so forth. Secondly, he has the right to repair the roof if the landlord does not do so pursuant to the terms of his lease. He may have those rights expressly by the terms of his lease, by demise as in this case, or he may have them by virtue of the reference to "appurtenances" in section 189 of the Act of 1957, though in my view only in the context of houses and not in the context of parts of a building, or he may have them by virtue of section 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925 which refers to rights, appurtenances and so forth. However, these factors merely involve the possible existence of rights enjoyed by the tenant in relation to the roof. That obviously does not have the effect of making a tenant of a flat a person who is in control of the roof for the purposes of section 9(1A) read together with section 39(2) of the Act of 1957. The Act is not concerned with rights. As shown by the heading to Part II, it is concerned with provisions for securing the repair, maintenance and sanitary conditions of houses. Houses and parts of buildings under the control of persons defined in section 39(2) are the subject matter of Part II, not the power to exercise rights. For those reasons I conclude that part B of these notices could not properly be served on the individual leaseholders of any of these flats.

INDIAN OIL CORPORATION LTD. v. GREENSTONE SHIPPING
S.A. (PANAMA)

1987 March 4, 5; 18

B Shipping—Bill of Lading—Cargo, intermixture of—Crude oil mixed with shipowners' crude oil already on board vessel—Mixture of oils not separable—Shipowners' liability to receivers for short delivery of oil —Whether receivers entitled to entire mixture of oilShips' Names—Ypatianna

C The owners of a vessel which was chartered to transport a quantity of Russian crude oil, the property of the receivers, from a Russian port to India, mixed the Russian oil with crude oil, which was their own property, already on board the vessel. The mixture of oils could not be separated for practical purposes and the owners claimed delivery of all the oil on board when the vessel discharged her cargo at the Indian port. The receivers obtained a quantity of oil less than the figure endorsed on the bill of lading. On the receivers' claims in an arbitration that they were entitled, inter alia, to delivery of the whole of the pumpable oil on board the vessel at the port of discharge and damages, accordingly, in the sum of U.S. $388,000, the arbitrators awarded them $46,014.90 only for damages for short delivery.

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

By notice of motion dated 31 July 1986, the applicant, Indian Oil Corporation Ltd., who were the receivers of a quantity of crude oil shipped on board the vessel Ypatianna, owned by the respondents, Greenstone Shipping S.A. (Panama), appealed against the arbitration award, dated 9 July 1986, of Mr. Donald Davies, Mr. E. J. T. Newcomb and Captain D. Spon, whereby it was found and held that the receivers' claims succeeded only in the sum of U.S. $46,014.90 together with interest. The receivers applied for an order that so much of the award as dismissed the balance of their counterclaims should be set aside, varied or reversed and/or that the award should be remitted for the reconsideration of the arbitrators together with the court's opinion on the question of law.

The grounds of the appeal were, inter alia, that (1) the arbitrators had held that the mixing of cargo on board the Ypatianna took place by reason of the owners' breaches of contract and conversion. (2) In the light of those findings the arbitrators should have held that the property in all the cargo so mixed became vested in the receivers. (3) Accordingly, the arbitrators erred in law and/or in principle and/or misdirected themselves in failing so to hold and/or to award damages for 1,300 tons of crude oil remaining on board the vessel which the owners refused to discharge. (4) Further or alternatively, the arbitrators held that the cargo remaining on board the vessel, which was not discharged, included Russian crude oil, which was the property of the receivers. (5) In the light of those findings, the arbitrators erred in law and/or in principle and/or misdirected themselves in failing to hold that such Russian crude oil should have been delivered to the receivers and they were entitled to damages for failing to deliver it.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Kenneth Rokison Q.C. and Peter Gross for the receivers.

Gordon Pollock Q.C. and Peregrine Simon for the owners.

Cur. adv. vult.

18 March. STAUGHTON J. read the following judgment. Confusio is the Latin word for the mixing of goods belonging to two different owners, so that they cannot be separated. Where they can be separated it is commixtio: see Buckland, Text-Book of Roman Law, 3rd ed. (1963), pp. 208–209. The effect in English law was decided as long ago as 1594 in Stock v. Stock (1594) Poph. 37 (sometimes called

Staughton J.

A Anon). There, the decision of Popham C.J. and the Court of King's Bench was this, at p. 38:

B "the plaintiff pretending title to certain hay which the defendant had standing in certain land, to be more sure to have the action pass for him, took other hay of his own, (to wit, the plaintiff) and mixed it with the defendant's hay, after which the defendant took and carried away both the one and the other that was intermixed, upon which the action was brought, and by all the court clearly the defendant shall not be guilty for any part of the hay, for by the intermixture (which was his own act) the defendant shall not be prejudiced as the case is, in taking the hay. And now the plaintiff cannot say which part of the hay is his, because the one cannot be known from the other, and therefore the whole shall go to him who hath the property in it with which it is intermixed."

D In the present case the owners mixed crude oil loaded on their vessel at Novorossisk in the Soviet Union with crude oil which was their own property. At least for practical purposes the mixture could not be separated, so it was a case of confusio. When the vessel came to discharge at Madras the owners claimed delivery of the whole. Hence this dispute. Although the transfer of title to moveable things is in general governed by the laws of the place where they are at the time (Dicey & Morris, The Conflict of Laws, 10th ed. (1980), p. 555), which in this case would be the Soviet Union, or a Greek ship on the high seas, or the Union of India, it is agreed that I must decide this case in accordance with English law, having regard to the decisions of Popham C.J. and of other judges since 1594.

E On 29 November 1980 the owners chartered their vessel Ypatianna to the Shipping Corporation of India Ltd. for the carriage of a part cargo of 75,000 long tons of crude oil from Russia to India. The reason for the restriction to 75,000 tons appears to have been the vessel's draft in the Suez Canal. A bill of lading dated 26 December 1980 recorded that 69,276 metric tons of Soviet export blend had been shipped by V/O Sojuzneftexport at Novorossisk for carriage to one or more Indian ports. The applicants, Indian Oil Corporation Ltd., were as the award finds the receivers of the oil at Madras. Presumably the bill of lading was endorsed to them and (subject to the issues in this case) the title to the crude oil shipped then passed to them, if it was not their property already (as may have been the case). I shall call them the "receivers."

G On any view there was short delivery at Madras, compared with the bill of lading quantity. For that the arbitrators have awarded the receivers damages in the sum of U.S. $46,014.90. But the receivers' contention is that they are entitled to a much greater sum as damages, that is to say U.S. $388,000 or thereabouts, on the basis that all the pumpable oil on board the vessel at Madras was their property and should have been delivered to them. They also complain that the arbitrators applied a conventional tolerance in calculating the amount of the shortage which was not supported by the facts found.

H In point of form it was the owners who were claimants in the arbitration. The remedy which they sought was U.S. $38,000 in respect of over-delivery of crude oil. Even if that claim had been supported by the facts, it is not clear to me how it would have been justified in law; but the point has not been argued, for the owners' claim failed and there has been no appeal by them. This appeal is from the decision of the arbitrators upon the receivers' counterclaims, pursuant to leave granted by Leggatt J. A

The figures

The quantity loaded, as found in the award, was about 508,000 barrels. The bill of lading quantity is found to have been the equivalent of 507,977 barrels. Crude oil on board before loading: (i) in the cargo tanks no more than 13,262 barrels. This may have included some ballast water. Otherwise it comprised about 5,528 barrels of Iranian crude oil from the immediately preceding voyage and the remainder was in part at any rate Indonesian crude oil from the third previous voyage. (ii) In the deep tanks 2,371 barrels. B C

The total quantity on board before loading was thus 15,633 barrels, and the total after loading 523,610 barrels; each figure may have included some water.

Crude oil discharged was 503,896 barrels. Water discharged from the cargo tanks was 6,229 barrels. Pumpable oil remaining on board after discharge was 9,545 barrels. (There are two different figures in the award for the quantity of crude oil remaining on board in terms of weight but somewhat surprisingly they are both said to equal this volume.) D

The last three figures add up to 519,670. That is somewhat less than the total quantity on board after loading. So far as I can tell the difference can be explained only by evaporation, or because some residues were unpumpable, or more probably in part by one of those causes and in part by the other. E

The receivers' smaller claim was for the shortage revealed by comparing the bill of lading quantity (507,977 barrels) with the quantity of crude oil discharged (503,896 barrels). The arbitrators allowed that claim in principle, but deducted a tolerance of 0.55 per cent. from the bill of lading figure, or 2,793.87 barrels. Accordingly, they awarded damages for a shortage of 1,287.13 barrels only. That deduction forms the basis of one of the receivers' grounds of appeal. F

The larger claim made by the receivers was based on the proposition that all the pumpable oil remaining on board the vessel, 9,545 barrels, had become their property and should have been delivered to them. I assume, although the point was not discussed, that if this larger claim succeeded the smaller claim would merge into it. However, the arbitrators held that the larger claim failed; and that gives rise to the receivers' other grounds of appeal. G

Further facts

The bill of lading incorporated all the terms of the charterparty, including the arbitration clause. The carriage was accordingly subject to the Hague Rules for the carriage of goods by sea. H

Four topics need further consideration. The first is the nature and quality of the crude oil on board before loading. To the extent that it comprised Iranian or Indonesian or other crude oils, I would infer that its specification was not exactly the same as that of Soviet export blend. But there is no finding that it was either better or worse. The furthest that the award goes is this finding:

3 W.L.R.

Indian Oil Corpn. v. Greenstone Shipping S.A. (Q.B.D.)

Staughton J.

A "There were no complaints at the time, neither have there been since, in respect of the quality of the crude oil discharged from the vessel at Madras; therefore it has been assumed that the owners discharged their primary obligation to deliver the bill of lading cargo subject to a conventional shortage of 1,287.13 barrels."

B Later it is said that there was no contamination of the receivers' crude oil. It does not necessarily follow that the quantity on board before loading was, in point of quality, as good as or better than, Soviet export blend. It would have comprised on average no more than 3 per cent. of the cargo discharged, so that a quality claim might well have been difficult to prove or trivial in amount. But there remains a possibility that the owners may have wished to improve the quality of the oil which they already had on board, and for that reason deliberately mixed it with the cargo loaded at Novorossisk.

C In passing I should mention that the crude oil on board before loading was the property of the owners, either because they had paid for it by way of penalties to previous consignees, or because it had been abandoned to them by the true owners. The award describes the quantity on board before delivery as "slops." I am not confident as to the precise meaning of that term—whether it can comprise simply crude oil residues, or necessarily means crude oil mixed with water. The arbitrators say that the slops "could have included some ballast water." In the end, I do not think that the water content of the slops matters, for this reason: it is recorded that a quantity of water was discharged—6,229 barrels. That is not directly credited to the owners in the calculation of the shortage claim: the claim starts by comparing the bill of lading quantity with the quantity of crude oil discharged. But the arbitrators make an allowance of 0.3 per cent. for water and sediment, as part of their total allowance of 0.55 per cent. So far as water is concerned, the notion is that it was entrained in the crude oil loaded but settled out of it during the voyage. That would account for 1,524 barrels. The balance of the water discharged must have come from the slops. There is no reason to believe that they must have contained any greater quantity of water. So I conclude that although the owners may possibly have wished to improve the quality of their crude oil by mixing it with the cargo loaded, there is no evidence that in fact they had that objective or that they achieved it. The inference which I think it fair to draw is that the crude oil loaded, and that already on board, were substantially of the same nature and quality.

E The second topic is the conduct of the owners. The award finds that there was interconnection between the vessel's cargo, ballast and fuel oil systems which was a breach of the International Maritime Organisation and Classification Societies rules. I am aware that a number of cases have recently occurred where there has been the transfer of cargo to a vessel's fuel tanks for use on the voyage, thus constituting theft as well as giving rise to danger of fire on board. So there is a hint here that these owners were going equipped for theft; but it is no more than a hint.

H The awards finds that "during the voyage from Novorossisk to Madras there were many deliberate inter-tank transfers and there were also inter-tank leakages." That too is a hint, but no more than a hint, of wrong-doing on the part of the owners. It is sometimes appropriate and necessary to make inter-tank transfers during a voyage, for example to correct the trim of a vessel as bunker fuel is consumed. I decline to infer that deliberate wrong-doing on the part of the owners in that respect is proved. As to events before loading, there is this passage in the award:

“The owners wanted to segregate out the crude oil remaining on board the vessel before she arrived at Novorossisk and were quite open in respect of this. There did not appear to be anything furtive in their approach. They were commercially sensible or so one would think. They wanted to separate the relatively large quantity of crude oil for which some payment had been made, so that it did not become mixed with the other cargo. Their failure to segregate the crude oil does not to our mind affect the issues in this case albeit that the matter would be much different if contamination of cargo had taken place.”

In the light of that finding, I should be slow to conclude that the owners by their master deliberately mixed the cargo with their own oil for some commercial motive.

Thirdly, I must say something about a procedure called load on top. This has been devised in order to avoid pollution from tank washing and ballast water. After successively washing some tanks and ballasting others, the vessel ends up with all oil residues in one tank, no doubt intermingled in some degree with water. New cargo is then loaded on top in the slop tank, as well as in the other cargo spaces which are empty. The effect is described by the arbitrators:

“The load on top procedure is widely used in the tanker business and had been for many years prior to the voyage in question. It is common usage or commonly understood in the bulk oil trade that charterers/receivers are entitled to all pumpable oil remaining in the vessel's cargo tanks after discharge when the conventional load on top procedure has been adopted. This may result in there being a delivery from the vessel of more oil than the bill of lading quantity loaded into the vessel although experience suggests that over delivery is not common. There is no common usage or common understanding as far as we are aware in respect of what is the practice in circumstances such as those now before us which were of an unusual nature.”

The usual load on top procedure was not employed in this case. The existing residues were distributed among all or some of the vessel's cargo tanks as well as in the deep tanks, rather than in one cargo tank only. Although this point featured in the owners' skeleton argument, at the hearing it was not contended that the usage found in relation to the load on top procedure is directly applicable here. However, Mr. Rokison for the receivers seeks to derive some support from that usage. If receivers are entitled to all pumpable oil when that procedure is adopted, he argues that a fortiori they should be entitled to pumpable residues when it is not. But the arbitrators's finding does not, in my judgment, form a sufficient foundation for any binding custom or practice when the pumpable oil exceeds the quantity loaded by a substantial amount. It seems that the arbitrators recognised this, for they said later in their award: “We also shrink from deciding that the conventional ‘load on top’ procedure gives title to pumpable oil in

Staughton J.

A the vessel in all circumstances. I agree with the arbitrators that their finding does not establish any custom or practice which would be binding in this case.

Fourthly, there is the question whether the cargo interests consented to the mixing of the crude oil loaded with that already on board. The award finds:

B "There was no question of the receivers expressly assenting to the mixing of the crude oils at the time of loading and/or during the voyage to Madras. . . . there was no consent between the parties, expressed or implied, to the mixing of the crude oil at the loading port."

C Those findings are conclusive that the receivers themselves did not consent. But may there have been consent on the part of the shippers, or of whoever owned the cargo as it went into the vessel?

D At first sight it seems to me surprising that anyone loading 69,000 tons of crude oil should not sound the ship's tanks first to see what was in them already. But equally it is surprising that the arbitrators did not intend to make any finding as to the knowledge or consent of the shippers or those who owned the oil as it was loaded, since
E absence of consent was a fundamental premise of the receivers' legal argument. Mr. Pollock for the owners observes that there may have been some confusion as to the status of the parties to the arbitration. In the heading of the award Indian Oil Corporation Ltd. are described as "respondents (charterers)" and in paragraph 3 it is recited that "the charterers" appointed Mr. Newcomb as arbitrator on their behalf. But F according to the charterparty, which has been put before me by consent, the charterers were the Shipping Corporation of India Ltd. There is, moreover, a dispute between counsel as to the extent to which the point was raised in the arbitration. Mr. Rokison for the receivers asserts that the case was treated before the arbitrators as one of admixture without consent. If that be right I should not allow the owners now to raise the question whether the shippers or the G owners of the oil at the time of loading consented. But Mr. Simon, who represented the owners at the time of the arbitration, says that documents showed and it was common ground that the shippers knew about the oil already on board the vessel. Mr. Gross, who represented the receivers, disputes that.

The point may be of crucial importance. It is essential to the receivers' argument that admixture took place without consent; and that must mean, in my judgment, without consent of those who owned the oil at the time of loading, or of any agent acting on their behalf. It is for consideration whether the award should be remitted to the arbitrators for them to state: (1) whether the case was, as Mr. Rokison says, treated by all as one of admixture without consent; if not, (2)(a) whether it was common ground that the shippers knew of
H the oil already on board the vessel; and if yes, (b) whether the shippers owned the oil at the time, or were acting as agents for those who owned it; if not, (3) whether in fact those who owned the oil at the time of loading or any agent acting on their behalf consented to the admixture.

The arbitrators may well be able to answer those questions sufficiently without difficulty; and if the answers are important that seems to me the best way to proceed. Perhaps there never was a snail in the ginger beer bottle. But for the present I assume that there was no relevant consent by anybody. A

Whilst on the subject of what was and was not argued in the arbitration, Mr. Pollock sought to put forward a case which it is admitted was not before the arbitrators. This was that the receivers must show either that they owned the oil at the time of loading or that the title to the whole contents of the vessel passed to them by some means such as endorsement and delivery of the bill of lading. B
Seeing that this point might well have been met by further evidence from the receivers, was not raised at the time, and does not have any conspicuous merit about it, I decline to allow it to be raised now.

(1) The tolerance of 0.55 per cent.

This is a short point. The arbitrators say in their award: C

"In assessing this conventional shortage we have, based upon the documentation and expert evidence produced before us, allowed the owners 0.30 per cent. in respect of water and sediment in the crude oil cargo and 0.25 per cent. in respect of vapour losses while the cargo was being loaded and discharged. The owners might in other circumstances have been allowed more than a total D tolerance of 0.55 per cent., but the inter-tank transfers and leakages during the ocean passage militated for a minimum allowance for the owners. The arithmetic regarding the shortage is as follows: Bill of lading quantity 507,977 barrels. Tolerance of 0.55 per cent. 2,793.87. The difference 505,183.13. Received in store tanks"—which presumably means shore tanks—"503,896.00. E Shortage 1287.13 barrels."

The receivers complain that no tolerance should have been allowed and that they should have been awarded damages on their first claim based on the total shortage of 4,081 barrels. That in money terms would have come to U.S. $145,895.75 instead of the sum of U.S. $46,014.90 which they were in fact awarded by the arbitrators. The receivers contend that there is no finding of any custom which justifies a tolerance of 0.55 per cent. or any other figure; and as there was still F crude oil on board when the vessel sailed, it cannot be assumed that 0.55 per cent. of the oil loaded was lost as water and sediment or by evaporation.

I agree that there is no finding of custom. But despite their use of the word "conventional" I do not think that the arbitrators were treating the point as governed by custom. It was said as long ago as Giacomo Costa Fu Andrea v. British Italian Trading Co. Ltd. [1963] 1 Q.B. 201, 218, and has been repeated since, that awards of commercial arbitrators are not to be examined with a fine-toothed comb. What the arbitrators were finding, as seems clear to me, is that crude oil cargoes usually lose 0.25 per cent. by evaporation on an ocean voyage and that 0.3 per cent. of the crude oil loaded was likely to have H settled out as water and sediment. I see no reason why they should not have made those findings if they were justified by the documents and expert evidence before them. Only two months ago, in Amoco Oil Co. v. Parpada Shipping Co. Ltd. (unreported), 22 January 1987, I arrived at a figure of 0.2 per cent. for evaporation on the evidence that was then before me. For all practical purposes it is impossible to measure what loss in fact occurs by evaporation on every tanker

A voyage. The obvious solution is to act on the evidence of experts as to what loss is likely to have occurred. The difficulty is rather less with water and sediment, which can be measured in a sample of the oil before loading. But I see no ground for rejecting the arbitrators' finding of an apparent loss of 0.3 per cent. by water and sediment, settling out of the cargo. The fact that crude oil remained on board after discharge seems to me immaterial on this point. No doubt there was evaporation from the owners' oil as well; and it is plain from the figures that water settled out of it to a much greater extent than from the crude oil loaded.

The owners are not liable for the inevitable loss by evaporation, under the Hague Rules. And the apparent loss by settling out of water and sediment is not a loss of cargo at all, or at any rate not a loss of anything of value. Hence I uphold the arbitrators' conclusion on the tolerance point. The receivers' appeal in respect of their smaller claim fails.

(2) The admixture claim

D Mr. Rokison's submission is as follows: where B wrongfully mixes the goods of A with goods of his own, so that the original goods cannot be separated or identified, the whole of the mixture becomes the property of A. So it is a case of "happy undeserving A," if not also of "wretched meritorious B."

E Mr. Pollock's submission is this: where a wilful admixture occurs without consent, both parties have a joint interest in the whole and the innocent party is entitled to receive his full contribution from the mixture even if it has been diminished by subsequent accidental loss. Alternatively, he submits that the general rule is as above, but that the innocent party is entitled to the whole if (1) the admixture was deliberately brought about for the purpose of depriving the innocent party of his rights, or making them difficult of enforcement, and (2) it is impossible to tell with any certainty what the contributing proportions had been.

G There are numerous and very distinguished authorities. But it is agreed on both sides that none of them is binding on me. In the circumstances, I do not see that I can refrain from citing all those which were put before me, even if the result is an inordinately long judgment for a case where the argument lasted rather less than two days.

H Stock v. Stock (1594) Poph. 37, 38 has already been quoted in part. Even as a record of Tudor law I consider the case to be of very little authority. The reports of Popham have been described as a "mangled and ill-translated edition": Wallace, The Reporters, 4th ed. (1882), p. 207. And if one accepts that the report of this case is accurate, there is a degree of confusion in it which is not easy to resolve.

Warde v. Aeyre (1615) 2 Bulst. 323 is reported as follows:

"In an action of trespassse for an assault and battery, & quod cumulum pecuniae, containing five markes, cepit. The case appeared to be this, the plaintiffe and the defendant, being at play, the plaintiffe thrust his money into the defendant's heape, and so intermingled them together: the defendant kept all, and upon this, being striving together for the money, for this the plaintiffe brings his action.

“Coke C.J. In this case, the law is, that if I.S. have a heape of corn, and I.D. will intermingle his corne with the corne of I.S. he shall here have all the corne, because this was so done by I.D. of his own wrong, and so it was adjudged in a case between Shordish and Moore, and so it is in case of money, if two being at play, and the one of them will intermingle his money in the others heap of money, he shall now have all, for this is so done by him of his own wrong, and this we have so adjudged in one Sir Richard Martins case, for that his own proper money, or corn cannot now be known, and therefore by this his intermingling, being his own act, and of his own wrong, by the law he shall lose all, for this is so used and done by him, onely as a trick, thinking thereby to deceive the other, and so to gain something by this to himself, but by this his so doing, he hath deceived himself, and shall now by this his tortious act, lose all; and if this should be otherwise, a man should be made to be a trespasser, volens nolens, by the taking him of his goods again, and for the avoiding of this inconvenience, the law in such a case is, that he shall now retein all; the whole court agreed with him herein against the plaintiffe, and for the reason aforesaid, and so the rule of the court was, quod querens nil capiat per billam.”

That case is consistent both with Mr. Rokison’s argument and also with Mr. Pollock’s qualified proposition. The admixture was brought about by a trick in order to deceive, and it seems likely that the proportion which each part had contributed to the mixture could no longer be determined.

In Colwill v. Reeves (1811) 2 Camp. 575 the headnote reads:

“A shopkeeper may maintain trespass for taking goods sent to him on sale or return. If A for a fraudulent purpose mixes his goods with B’s; still, if they can be distinguished, he retains the property in them; and he may maintain trespass against a person who, having a right to take B’s goods, ignorantly takes these goods of A as part of B’s.

Lord Ellenbrough C.J. said, at pp. 576–577:

“If a man puts corn into my bag, in which there is before some corn, the whole is mine; because it is impossible to distinguish what was mine from what was his. But it is impossible that articles of furniture can be blended together so as to create the same difficulty. The goods in question remained distinct, and the messenger might have discovered that they belonged to the plaintiff. He took them at his peril. Whatever fraud there might be in the case, the property was not divested from the plaintiff, and the stratagem described is no defence on the general issue to an action at his suit for taking and converting the goods.”

That case cannot be said to be inconsistent with Mr. Pollock’s qualified proposition.

Meanwhile the subject had received much fuller treatment in Lupton v. White (1808) 15 Ves. Jun. 432. There a dispute had arisen between the owners of adjoining lead mines and an injunction had

3 W.L.R. Indian Oil Corpn. v. Greenstone Shipping S.A. (Q.B.D.) Staughton J.

A been granted. It was dissolved upon the defendant undertaking to keep a distinct account of the ore which he might take from the plaintiff's mine. Later it was shown that the ore had been mixed by the defendant, at p. 433, "for the purpose of preventing a discovery of the ore got" from the plaintiff's mine; that the accounts and books had been, "so kept or contrived as to prevent a true discovery;" and B that no true estimate could be formed of the quantity of ore got from the plaintiff's mine. Lord Eldon L.C. said, at p. 436:

"If the result is, that the master cannot take the account, it is clearly not for him, without a farther direction, to apply the great principle, familiar both at law and in equity, that, if a man, having undertaken to keep the property of another distinct, mixes it with his own, the whole must both at law and in equity be C taken to be the property of the other, until the former puts the subject under such circumstances, that it may be distinguished as satisfactorily, as it might have been before that unauthorised mixture upon his part."

The case was reargued. On that occasion Lord Eldon L.C. said, at
pp. 439-441:

D "If a man by his own tortious act makes it impossible for another to ascertain the value of his property, and that in a transaction, in which the former was, not merely under an implied moral obligation, but pledged by a solemn undertaking in a court of justice, that such should not be the state of things between them, by those means preventing the guard which the court would have effectually interposed, is the argument to be endured, that, as the E party, so injured, cannot distinguish his property, therefore he shall have nothing? That is not the law of this country; as administered in courts either of law or equity. The case (Armory
v. Delamirie (1722) 1 Str. 505) of the diamond ring, found by a poor boy, proves the contrary. He had not the means of showing the value. The person who took it from him, by wrong, prevented F the jury from ascertaining the value by production of the ring, or other evidence. Therefore, as it was proved, that the plaintiff's evidence had been destroyed by the act of that person, who ought to have refrained from placing the transaction in that state, the Lord Chief Justice directed the jury to find, that the stone was of the utmost value they could find; upon this principle, that it was the defendant's own fault, by his own dishonest act, that G the jury could not find the real value. The case of Panton v.
Panton (in the Court of Exchequer) applies to this. A clerk in a banking-house at Chester remitted his own money, with that of his employer, to an agent in London, to be laid out upon security; and by management the securities were so changed, that the property could not be distinguished. The Court of Exchequer held, that, the confusion being occasioned by him, who so dealt H with the property, the distinction lay upon him; and, if he could not distinguish, what was his own, the whole must be considered as belonging to the other. A principle, not dissimilar, though not precisely the same, governed me in the case of Mr. Jackson's executors (White v. Lady Lincoln, The Duke of Newcastle v.
Kinderley (1803) 8 Ves. Jun. 363). There was no more duty imposed upon him than upon these individuals. He had kept the account, and, as it appeared to me, not incorrectly, upon his own side: but, having kept it only upon his own, though bound to keep it upon the other, side, it was held, that he could not maintain a demand, to which under other circumstances he would have been fairly entitled. The decision was made, not upon the notion, that strict justice was done, but upon this; that it was the only justice, that could be done; and that no more could be done was the fault of Jackson himself; who, if he did not enable those parties to know, what demand they had upon him, could not be heard to say, he had any demand upon them.”

Then, at p. 441:

“What are the cases in the old law of a mixture of corn or flour? If one man mixes his corn or flour with that of another, and they were of equal value, the latter must have the given quantity: but, if articles of different value are mixed, producing a third value, the aggregate of both, and through the fault of the person, mixing them, the other party cannot tell, what was the original value of his property, he must have the whole and the principle goes to the full extent of what is now contended.”

The analogy with Armory v. Delamirie (1722) 1 Str. 505 is striking. If the wrongdoer prevents the innocent party proving how much of his property has been taken, then the wrongdoer is liable to the greatest extent that is possible in the circumstances. That is consistent with Mr. Pollock’s qualified proposition, or at any rate with the second part of it. So too are Lord Eldon L.C.’s remarks about corn or flour. If the components are proved to be of equal value, the innocent party is entitled only to the given quantity, which I take to be that which he contributed. It is only if the innocent party cannot tell what was the original value of his property that he is entitled to the whole.

A footnote to the report of Lupton v. White (1808) 15 Ves. Jun. 432 refers to Blackstone’s Commentaries, 17th ed. (1830), vol. 2, pp. 404–405:

“But in the case of confusion of goods, where those of two persons are so intermixed that the several portions can be no longer distinguished, the English law partly agrees with, and partly differs from, the civil. If the intermixture be by consent, I apprehend that in both laws the proprietors have an interest in common, in proportion to their respective shares. But if one wilfully intermixes his money, corn, or hay, with that of another man, without his approbation or knowledge, or casts gold in like manner into another’s melting pot or crucible, the civil law, though it gives the sole property of the whole to him who has not interfered in the mixture, yet allows a satisfaction to the other for what he has so improvidently lost. But our law, to guard against fraud, gives the entire property, without any account, to him whose original dominion is invaded, and endeavoured to be rendered uncertain, without his own consent.”

The arbitrators in the present case expressed a preference for the Roman law, in plain terms. For my part I am not convinced that either Blackstone or the arbitrators correctly summarised the Roman law. In the Institutes of Justinian II.I.28, dealing with the case of corn mixed by accident or deliberately by one party, it is said that

3 W.L.R. Indian Oil Corpn. v. Greenstone Shipping S.A. (Q.B.D.) Staughton J.

A "the corn is no more made common property than there would be a common herd if Titius' cattle were mixed with yours. And if either of you holds the whole of the corn, the other will have an action in rem for the amount of his grain, it being a matter for the judge to estimate which grain is whose (in rem quidem actio pro modo frumenti cuiusque competat, arbitrio autem iudicis continetur, ut is aestimet, quale cuiusque frumentum fuerit)."*

B The effect, however, is in economic terms the same.

It is to be noted that the motive ascribed by Blackstone is, "to guard against fraud." And Mr. Pollock emphasises the words "and endeavoured to be rendered uncertain," as indicating an intention to conceal the innocent party's property.

C Before returning to the cases, I refer to another respected commentator. Stephen's Commentaries on the Laws of England, 12th ed.
(1895), vol. 2, p. 21, after citing Blackstone almost verbatim, continues:

D "However, this rule of the English law applies only to cases where the confusion is such as to render it impossible to subsequently apportion the respective shares; for if the goods continue to be distinguishable, as in the instance of articles of furniture thrown together, the confusion makes no alteration in the property; or if the quality of the articles is uniform, and the original quantities are known, as in the case of £500 of trust money mixed with £300 of the trustee's own money, the party by whose act the confusion took place would still be entitled to claim his proper quantity, subject only to the quantity of the other proprietor being first made good out of the whole mass."

E That, as it seems to me, entirely accords with Mr. Pollock's qualified proposition, or at least with the second part of it.

F In Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Co. Ltd. (1868) L.R. 3 C.P.
427, bales of cotton belonging to different owners had lost their marks owing to a casualty at sea. The case seems to have been treated as one of accidental mixture and is therefore not directly in point. Bovill
C.J. said, at pp. 437-438:

G "In our own law there are not many authorities to be found upon this subject; but, as far as they go, they are in favour of the view, that, when goods of different owners become by accident so mixed together as to be undistinguishable, the owners of the goods so mixed become tenants in common of the whole, in the proportions which they have severally contributed to it. The passage cited from the judgment of Blackburn J. in the case of the tallow which was melted and flowed into the sewers, is to that effect: Buckley v. Gross (1863) 3 B. & S. 574. And a similar view was adopted by Lord Abinger in the case of the mixture of oil by leakage on board ship in Jones v. Moore (1841) 4 Y. & C. Ex.
351. It has been long settled in our law, that, where goods are mixed so as to become undistinguishable, by the wrongful act or default of one owner, he cannot recover, and will not be entitled to his proportion, or any part of the property, from the other owner: but no authority has been cited to show that any such

* Institutes of Justinian Text, Translation and Commentary, J. A. C Thomas (1975),
p. 69.

principle has ever been applied, nor indeed could it be applied, to the case of an accidental mixing of the goods of two owners; and there is no authority nor sound reason for saying that the goods of several persons which are accidentally mixed together thereby absolutely cease to be the property of their several owners, and become bona vacantia.” A

The obiter dictum in that passage as to wrongful admixture is direct support for Mr. Rokison’s argument. B

Cook v. Addison (1869) L.R. 7 Eq. 466 was a case of mixture of trust funds. Sir John Stuart V.-C. said, at p. 470:

“It is a well-established doctrine in this court, that if a trustee or agent mixes and confuses the property which he holds in a fiduciary character with his own property, so as that they cannot be separated with perfect accuracy, he is liable for the whole. This doctrine was explained by Lord Eldon in Lupton v. White (1808) 15 Ves. Jun. 432. In this case it is impossible to say how much of the £250 received by the defendant Addison from Fowler for repairs consisted of what was due under the covenant to repair in the underlease. The consequence is, that the whole £250 is liable to the demands of the cestui que trust so far as necessary to make up, with the other sums admitted to be part of the trust property, the full amount of the trust fund of £520, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum from 30 April 1865 . . .” C D

That does not, as I see it, amount to a decision that the whole of the mixed fund belonged to the trust, but rather that it was available so far as necessary to make good the amount lost by the trust. E

In re Oatway [1903] 2 Ch. 356 was also a trust case. There is a significant passage in the judgment of Joyce J., at pp. 359–360:

“It is a principle settled as far back as the time of the Year Books that, whatever alteration of form any property may undergo, the true owner is entitled to seize it in its new shape if he can prove the identity of the original material: see Blackstone, vol. ii, p. 405 and Lupton v. White (1808) 15 Ves. Jun. 432. But this rule is carried no farther than necessity requires, and is applied only to cases where the compound is such as to render it impossible to apportion the respective shares of the parties. Thus, if the quality of the articles that are mixed be uniform, and the original quantities known, as in the case of so many pounds of trust money mixed with so many pounds of the trustee’s own money, the person by whose act the confusion took place is still entitled to claim his proper quantity, but subject to the quantity of the other proprietor being first made good out of the whole mass: 2 Stephen’s Commentaries (13th ed.), 20. Trust money may be followed into land or any other property in which it has been invested; and when a trustee has, in making any purchase or investment, applied trust money together with his own, the cestuis que trust are entitled to a charge on the property purchased for the amount of the trust money laid out in the purchase or investment.” F G H

That is support for Mr. Pollock’s proposition, subject to the second part of his qualification.

3 W.L.R.

Indian Oil Corpn. v. Greenstone Shipping S.A. (Q.B.D.)

Staughton J.

A In Sandeman & Sons v. Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co. Ltd.
 [1913] A.C. 680 a consignee of bales of jute claimed that six of his bales were missing. It was found that 14 bales, belonging either to that consignee or to others, were missing; and that 11 bales were available without any marks. It was held that the consignee was entitled to claim for his six bales not delivered, and was not obliged to accept that any of the unmarked bales belonged to him. The obiter dictum of Lord Moulton is directly in point, at pp. 694–695:

B “My Lords, if we proceed upon the principles of English law, I do not think it a matter of difficulty to define the legal consequences of the goods of ‘A’ becoming indistinguishably and inseparably mixed with the goods of ‘B.’ If the mixing has arisen from the fault of ‘B,’ ‘A’ can claim the goods. He is guilty of no
 C wrongful act, and therefore the possession by him of his own goods cannot be interfered with, and if by the wrongful act of ‘B’ that possession necessarily implies the possession of the intruding goods of ‘B,’ he is entitled to it (2 Kent’s Commentaries, 10th ed., 465). But if the mixing has taken place by accident or other D cause, for which neither of the owners is responsible, a different state of things arises. Neither owner has done anything to forfeit his right to the possession of his own property, and if neither party is willing to abandon that right the only equitable solution of the difficulty, and the one accepted by the law, is that ‘A’ and ‘B’ become owners in common of the mixed property. Farther than this I do not think that it is safe to go. That the whole matter is far from being within the domain of settled law is shown E by the divergence of opinions as to the relative shares of the participating parties in the case of an accidental commixtio.
 Blackburn J. in Buckley v. Gross (1863) 3 B. & S. 566, at p. 575 (following Kent’s Commentaries) considers that they would be tenants in common in equal shares. In Spence v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (1868) L.R. 3 C.P. 427 they were judged to possess F the mixed mass in proportion to the probable amounts of their contributions to it. The fact is that the conclusions of the courts in such cases, though influenced by certain fundamental principles, have been little more than instances of cutting the Gordian knot—reasonable adjustments of the rights of parties in cases where complete justice was impracticable of attainment. I doubt whether even the fundamental principles enunciated above would G be strictly adhered to in extreme cases where they would lead to substantial injustice. For instance, if a small portion of the goods of ‘B’ became mixed with the goods of ‘A’ by a negligent act for which ‘A’ alone was liable, I think it quite possible that the law would prefer to view it as a conversion by ‘A’ of this small amount of ‘B’s’ goods rather than do the substantial injustice of treating ‘B’ as the owner of the whole of the mixed mass.”

H Mr. Rokison relies on the first part of that passage, on the law as to wrongful admixture. The difficulty that I feel is over the later observation, that those principles might not be strictly adhered to if they would lead to substantial injustice—for example, if the innocent party’s contribution had been small. I have difficulty in understanding how a rule of law as to rights of property can be subject to the qualification that it must not cause substantial injustice. Rather than conclude that some rule of equity prevails in such cases, I would suppose that Lord Moulton did not intend to lay down rules of settled law, but instead to offer an opinion as to what the law might turn out to be if such cases arose. A

The last of the cases cited was Jones v. De Marchant (1916) 28 D.L.R. 561. The headnote in that case reads:

“Where beaver skins belonging to a wife have been wrongfully taken from among her effects by her husband, who has them made up into a fur coat which he makes a gift of to a third person, the property in the coat is in the wife under the principle of ‘accession,’ and the coat may be recovered by her in an action of replevin.” B

It seems that the coat was made up of 18 skins taken from the plaintiff and another four provided by the husband. Nobody suggested that the coat should be severed or dismantled. The case was one of accessio. Apart from the fact that Richards J.A., at p. 563, cited Blackstone’s Commentaries, p. 405, with apparent approval, the decision is not of assistance in the present case. C

Other authorities relied on were Smith’s Leading Cases, 13th ed. (1929), vol. 1, p. 396; Story on Bailments, 9th ed. (1878), pp. 41–44; Holdsworth, A History of English Law, 2nd ed. (1937), vol. 7, pp. 501–502; Halsbury’s Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 35 (1981), para. 1139, and vol. 2 (1973), para. 1537. With the possible exception of Holdsworth, those support Mr. Rokison’s argument. In modern times there is Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution, 3rd ed. (1986), pp. 65–66: D

“At law, as in equity, the plaintiff must be able to identify his property in the hands of the defendant. Where the plaintiff is claiming non-fungible chattels, this important practical limitation will create little difficulty. But the identity of fungibles may become easily lost by their becoming mixed with other fungibles. Consequently if grain has become mixed in a ship or in a warehouse, the common law applies the special rules, akin to those developed in Roman law, of commixtio and confusio. Where A’s property has become inseparably mixed with B’s, the resultant mass will belong, in proportion to their contributions, to A and B as tenants in common. But if the mixing has been due to the wrongful act of either A or B, then English law appears to make a significant and punitive departure from the Roman doctrine and to give the property in the whole mass to the innocent party.” E F G

The arbitrators said of that passage: “The above erudition exemplifies some uncertainty about the English law on the topic thus allowing us to take our own course.”

Paton, Bailment in the Common Law (1952), pp. 156–158, appears to support Mr. Pollock’s qualified argument, although one section, at p. 157, has the heading “Present Law Uncertain.” Birks, Introduction to the Law of Restitution (1985), p. 368, refers to the maxim that everything is presumed against a thief, and continues: H

“This is the spirit in which the exercise of identification has been conducted against those who have been guilty of wrongful misappropriation.”

3 W.L.R. Indian Oil Corpn. v. Greenstone Shipping S.A. (Q.B.D.) Staughton J.

A Matthews in Current Legal Problems (1981), vol. 34, p. 159, supports Mr. Rokison's argument.

Finally, I was referred to the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law of Restitution (1937), para. 209:

"Where a person wrongfully mingles money of another with money of his own, the other is entitled to obtain reimbursement out of the fund."

B Paragraph 214 provides:

"The rules stated in paragraphs 209-213 are applicable where a person wrongfully mingles things other than money.

C "Comment: a. Mingling of fungible things. The rule stated in this section is applicable where a person wrongfully mingles fungible things, such as grain. If a person wrongfully mingles the grain of another with grain of his own in a bin, the other is entitled to receive from the grain in the bin the amount of his grain so mingled, even though a part of the grain has been withdrawn from the bin (compare paragraph 211)."

D Two points of significance in my view emerge from the authorities. First, in some cases a decision had to be made "not upon the notion, that strict justice was done, but upon this: that it was the only justice, that could be done," per Lord Eldon L.C. in Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. Jun. 432, 440. Or as Lord Moulton put it, such cases "have been little more than instances of cutting the Gordian knot—reasonable adjustments of the rights of the parties in cases where complete justice was impracticable of attainment," in Sandeman & Sons v. Tyzack and Branfoot Steamship Co. Ltd. [1913] A.C. 680, 695. Secondly, if the wrongdoer has destroyed or impaired the evidence by which the innocent party could show how much he has lost, the wrongdoer must suffer from the resulting uncertainty. Thus the jury in Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Str. 505 were directed by Pratt C.J. to award the plaintiff the value of the finest jewel which the socket would hold, not the finest jewel that had ever been known.

E The combined effect of those principles would justify and require that where it is totally unknown how much of the innocent party's goods went into the mixture, the whole should belong to him. But I do not see that they require or justify the same result where it is known how much was contributed by the innocent party, or even what the maximum quantity is that he can have contributed, being something less than the whole. That would not be the only justice that could be done; it would be injustice.

G As for the reason given by Blackstone—"to guard against fraud"—in my opinion that will be sufficiently achieved if the principle in Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Str. 505 is followed. I do not see that it is the function of civil justice to punish or discourage crime by awarding the victim more than he has lost, unless it be in the special case of an award of exemplary damages. There is the allied principle that the courts will not enforce an illegal contract or one that is tainted with illegality. But that has its limits. See the judgment of Devlin J. in St. John Shipping Corporation v. Joseph Rank Ltd. [1957] 1 Q.B. 267, 279-280:

H "When the master of the plaintiff's ship St. John was prosecuted at Birkenhead under the [Merchant Shipping (Safety and Loadline Conventions) Act 1932] and, on 28 November 1955, found to have overloaded his ship by more than 11 inches, he was fined the maximum of £1,200; but the amount of cargo by which the ship was overloaded was 427 tons and the extra freight earned was £2,295. So the ship came very well out of this situation; and she and other ships will doubtless continue to come very well out of similar situations until the Act of 1932 is amended. I can see that it is a situation that must cause some concern to cargo owners whose property is at risk. The ship was carrying a cargo of about 10,000 tons of grain from Mobile, Alabama, U.S.A., to Birkenhead. The defendants held a bill of lading for about 3,500 tons of this quantity on which the freight due was nearly £19,000. The defendants, apparently in association with the charterers, decided that some additional punishment should be inflicted on the plaintiffs, and that it should take the form of withholding the £2,295 extra freight. The defendants have withheld £2,000, for which sum they are being sued in this action, and another cargo owner has withheld £295 and is being sued for it in an action that depends on this one. This is the explanation of how this dispute has arisen. But I, of course, have not got to decide whether the defendants are morally justified in trying to make good deficiencies in the criminal law; nor is any justification of that sort put forward in the case.”

In the present case there is, as I have said, a hint that the owners were engaged in wrong doing, but on the award as a whole I do not conclude that they mixed the cargo with their own oil for some commercial motive. It would be a severe penalty to impose on them a fine of U.S. $342,000 for their conduct (that being the difference between the receivers' larger claim of U.S. $388,000 and the award in respect of the shortage of some U.S. $46,000). The arbitrators, who know a great deal about the business of carriage by sea, did not perceive justice in that; and neither do I. But in any event, the rule cannot, unless Lord Moulton's qualification in the Sandeman & Sons case [1913] A.C. 680, 695, represents the existing law, be altered to suit the circumstances of each particular case. It must be one rule for all cases. Those may vary between one where the shipowner deliberately mixes property with a view to stealing it, to another where he does so purely for convenience of carriage without any intention to harm anybody.

The other motive to be found in the cases is that of Coke C.J. in Warde v. Aeyre (1615) 2 Bulst. 323, 324, “otherwise, a man should be made to be a trespasser, volens nolens, by the taking of his goods again . . .” In theory there may still be cases where that reasoning is sound, for example, if a farmer wished to retake his hay from a heap where it had been wrongly mixed with that of somebody else. In practice, it is not likely to arise often and certainly not in the present case: the notion of the Indian receivers boarding the owners' vessel after the conclusion of discharge at Madras in order to retake their oil is implausible. I would not regard that argument as justification for a rule which may work substantial injustice.

In the days when corn and hay were to be found in heaps which could not be measured accurately, when such disputes were tried by jury and witnesses might be illiterate or ignorant, a rough and ready

A rule which Goff and Jones, p. 66, describe as punitive may have been the best that the law could find. But a primitive rule is no longer appropriate when modern and sophisticated methods of measurement are available. The measurement of cargoes of oil is, as I learnt in Amoco Oil Co. v. Parpada Shipping Co. Ltd. (unreported), 22 January 1987, conducted with care and precision. It will not, of course, achieve absolute accuracy. What method of measurement ever does? But for all practical purposes the quantity of the innocent party's goods which have gone into the mixture can often be ascertained with a sufficient degree of precision, as it can be in this case. Similarly, there are methods of sampling and analysis which should enable the quality of the innocent party's goods, and of the mixture, to be assessed. If doubt remains as to either quantity or quality, the principle of Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Str. 505 provides a solution.

Seeing that none of the authorities is binding on me, although many are certainly persuasive, I consider that I am free to apply the rule which justice requires. This is that, where B wrongfully mixes the goods of A with goods of his own, which are substantially of the same nature and quality, and they cannot in practice be separated, the mixture is held in common and A is entitled to receive out of it a quantity equal to that of his goods which went into the mixture, any doubt as to that quantity being resolved in favour of A. He is also entitled to claim damages from B in respect of any loss he may have suffered, in respect of quality or otherwise, by reason of the admixture.

Whether the same rule would apply when the goods of A and B are not substantially of the same nature and quality must be left to another case. It does not arise here. The claim based on a rule of law that the mixture became the property of the receivers fails.

(3) The bailment claim

Mr. Rokison's submission on this point is that where A is the bailee of B's goods and A fails or refuses to deliver the same to B then B is entitled to claim those goods or damages in respect of the value of the same. The cause of action is said to be "in bailment." For my part I find difficulty in distinguishing it from the cause of action relied on in section (2) of this judgment; but one point of distinction became clear in the course of the argument. Whilst the claim just considered was for the whole of the pumpable oil on board the vessel, under this head the receivers claim only 97 per cent., being that proportion of it which they say was their property. They give no credit for the fact that, amongst the oil which was delivered to them, 3 per cent. was the property of the owners.

The answer to this point is, as Mr. Pollock submits and I agree, that the mixture was held in common by the receivers and the owners. The receivers were entitled to an amount equal to their contribution to the mixture. That has been delivered to them, except for the small shortage in respect of which the arbitrators awarded them damages. What remained in the vessel became the property of the owners alone. I do not consider that the decision in the Sandeman & Sons case [1913] A.C. 680, as opposed to Lord Moulton's observations, requires me to reach any other conclusion.

It might, I suppose, have been argued that the loss in transit of 0.55 per cent. should not have been deducted from the receiver's shortage claim, on the ground that the owners' share is deemed to suffer from accidental loss before the receivers' share. That argument was not put forward, but paragraph 214 of the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law of Restitution might be said to support it, and Mr. Pollock's main proposition makes provision for accidental loss to be borne by the wrongdoer. In fact, the argument would not apply to the 0.3 per cent. apparent loss, by reason of water and sediment settling out of the crude oil. That, as I have said, was not a loss at all, or at any rate, not a loss of anything of value. As to the loss of 0.25 per cent. by evaporation, that was not an accidental loss but one by natural wastage. No doubt the oil loaded as cargo, the oil already on board, and the mixture all suffered equally from evaporation—or if there were differential rates the oil loaded recently suffered most. If this small point had been raised, I should not have held that the owners' share of the mixture must suffer all loss by evaporation before any is attributed to the receiver's share.

In those circumstances, no purpose would be served in remitting the case to the arbitrators on the point about consent, at all events, unless either party intends to appeal. This appeal fails and the award is upheld.

Appeal dismissed with costs, including costs of application for leave to appeal.

Certificate pursuant to section 1(7) of the Arbitration Act 1979 that question of law whether the receivers' claim that they were entitled to all pumpable oil on board vessel was correct was one of general public importance.

Leave to appeal.

The plaintiff applied to a building society for a mortgage to assist her in purchasing a house. She signed a mortgage application form and paid an inspection fee, and the building society instructed the defendants, a firm of surveyors and valuers, to carry out a visual inspection of the house and to report on its value and any matter likely to affect the value. The defendants carried out the inspection but, having noticed that two chimney breasts had been cut away, they failed to check whether the chimneys above had been left adequately supported. They reported that the house was readily saleable for owner occupation, was likely to remain so at about the mortgage valuation and that no essential repairs were required. The report concluded with general disclaimers which warned the plaintiff that it was neither a market valuation nor a structural survey, expressly excluded any warranty, representation or assurance to her that the report was accurate or valid, and stated that the defendants had made the report without any acceptance of liability to the plaintiff. The mortgage application form signed by the plaintiff had contained a disclaimer in relation to the report to the same effect. The building society, pursuant to its agreement with the plaintiff, supplied a copy of the report to her, and she relied on it and purchased the house without any further survey. The chimneys were not adequately supported and they subsequently collapsed. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants in negligence, and the defendants relied, inter alia, on the general disclaimers in the report and the mortgage application form as exempting them from liability to the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed that the disclaimers did not exclude the defendants' liability and that the defendants were in any event precluded by section 2 of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977¹ from so excluding their liability since the disclaimers did not satisfy the requirement of reasonableness set out in section 11(3) of the Act. The judge held that the disclaimers were not effective to exclude the defendants' liability for negligence and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

On the defendants' appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that since there was no contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, the disclaimers would have no meaning if they did not apply to exclude any liability of the defendants to the plaintiff in negligence, and on their true construction their effect was to relieve the defendants of such liability; but that (per Dillon and Glidewell L.JJ.) where a surveyor, having been engaged to carry out a visual inspection of a property at the lower end of the market, which he was obliged to carry out with reasonable care, prepared a mortgage valuation report for a building society in the knowledge that the mortgage applicant, who had paid for the report and herself had no relevant special skill, would be supplied with the report and would probably rely on it, it was not fair or reasonable to allow him to rely on such disclaimers so as to exempt him from his liability to the applicant for his negligence in carrying out the inspection; that (per Sir Edward Eveleigh) since the report contained the statement, as to which there was no warning of its unreliability, that the house was readily saleable for owner occupation, when, with the least attention to the task which the plaintiff was entitled to expect, the dangerous state of the premises would have been revealed, it was not fair or reasonable to allow reliance on the disclaimers; and that, accordingly, the disclaimers did not satisfy the requirement of reasonableness in section 11(3) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 and section 2(2) of the Act therefore precluded the defendants from excluding their liability to the plaintiff by reference to them (post, pp. 895D–G, 896H, 897D–E, 898E, 899D–F, 900C–E).

Per Dillon L.J. The position may be different where the mortgage applicant who chooses to rely on such a report, despite having read such disclaimers, is himself a surveyor or a lawyer (post, p. 897F).

APPEAL from Mr. Recorder Gerald Draycott sitting at Norwich Crown Court.

By a summons and particulars of claim dated 6 June 1983 the plaintiff, Jean Patricia Smith, claimed against the defendants, Eric S. Bush, a firm of surveyors and valuers, damages limited to £4,000 in respect of substantial disturbance, inconvenience and distress, loss and damage occasioned by the collapse of the chimney stacks at her home, 242, Silver Road, Norwich, alleging that the defendants had been negligent in the preparation or content of a report and mortgage valuation commissioned by the Abbey National Building Society in respect of the property, on which she had relied and by which she had been induced to purchase the property. By their amended defence dated December 1985 the defendants, inter alia, denied that they owed the plaintiff any duty of care and alleged that they were not in any event liable to the plaintiff for any defects which a valuation inspection would not have revealed, and that the express terms and/or disclaimers contained in the plaintiff's mortgage application and in the defendants'

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Eric S. Bush (C.A.)

A report had put the plaintiff on notice that the defendants owed her no, or a restricted, duty of care, and operated to exclude any liability of the defendants to the plaintiff for any of the breaches alleged by her. By her amended reply dated 10 February 1986 the plaintiff, inter alia, relied on section 2(2) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 in so far as the defendants purported to exclude or restrict their liability for negligence by reason of the terms and/or disclaimers in the form and the report. On 17 April 1986 Mr. Recorder Draycott gave judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of £3,729.97 damages plus £650 interest, not to be enforced without leave of the court.

By a notice of appeal dated 14 May 1986 the defendants appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) the recorder had erred in law and/or in fact in appearing to hold that the disclaimers contained in the mortgage application form and/or the valuation report were not to be construed as sufficient to exclude the defendants' liability to the plaintiff for negligence; (2) the recorder had erred in law in appearing to hold that the disclaimers were subject to an implied condition that there should have been a complete visual inspection of all parts in the fabric, and in holding that the defendants had been in breach of that condition, and had thereby rendered the disclaimers ineffective in excluding the defendants' liability in negligence; (3) the recorder had erred in law in appearing to hold that the disclaimers did not prevent a duty of care to the plaintiff arising; (4) the recorder had erred in law in failing to find that the provisions of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 were inapplicable to the disclaimers; and (5) the recorder had erred in law and/or in fact in appearing to find that it was not fair and reasonable for the defendants to rely on the disclaimers, and in particular had failed to give sufficient weight to certain evidence.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Dillon L.J.

Nigel Hague Q.C. and Jane Davies for the defendants.

Robert Seabrook Q.C. and Philip Havers for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

13 March. The following judgments were handed down.

DILLON L.J. The defendants in this action, a firm of surveyors, appeal against a judgment against them for damages for professional negligence awarded to the plaintiff by Mr. Recorder Gerald Draycott at the trial of this action in the Norwich County Court on 17 April 1986. The appeal raises a question of some general importance as to the application of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.

The story begins in 1980. At that time the plaintiff, Mrs. Smith, lived at Coulsdon in Surrey in a house which she owned and which was subject to a mortgage in favour of the Abbey National Building Society ("Abbey National"). She decided, however, to move to Norwich. Her personal circumstances were that she was a state enrolled nurse, but had been working for some months as a clerk for a well-known firm, Reckitt & Colman; she had divorced or was separated from her husband, and she had two children, both living with her, a girl of 15 and a boy of 12.

She found a purchaser for her house in Surrey, and she also offered for a house at Horsham St. Faith's near Norwich. But that purchase fell through. By the beginning of October 1980 she was, as the judge's note of herevidence records, desperate to get another house in Norwich, because she had been offered a good price for her house in Surrey and did not want to lose her purchaser. She then found the house with which this action was concerned, 242, Silver Road, Norwich. It was on offer at an asking price of £17,250, but the vendor said that he already had someone else interested at that price, and so she agreed to buy the house, subject to contract, for £17,500. It was a terraced house, some 70 years old, at the lower end of the housing market, but the plaintiff regarded it as suitable for herself and her children as it was well decorated, had central heating, and she could move in without doing any work to it.

To raise the price she needed a mortgage, and so on 6 October 1980 she applied to Abbey National for a mortgage and completed their standard mortgage application form. In fact she only required a mortgage for £3,500 which was well below the price of the house, but nothing turns on that.

Under section 25 of the Building Societies Act 1962 (now section 13 of the Building Societies Act 1986) a building society which makes an advance on the security of a freehold or leasehold property has to get a report from an appropriately experienced person as to the value of that property and as to any matter likely to affect the value thereof. Building societies satisfy this requirement either by instructing firms of surveyors in general practice or by using their own in-house employed surveyors. In the present case, Abbey National instructed the defendants, a firm of surveyors and valuers carrying on practice in Norwich; the defendants acted by their senior partner, Mr. Cannell, a chartered surveyor who was amply qualified for the job.

It has always been the case that applicants for mortgages are required by the building society to pay the fees for the valuation reports which the societies are by the statute required to get. It used for many years to be the practice that the building societies refused to disclose the reports to the applicants, on the footing that they were only obtained for the building societies' own purposes. But this practice gave rise to widespread discontent in that applicants could not see why they should not have copies of reports for which they had paid. Before October 1980, therefore, the building societies had adopted instead a new practice of making copies of the reports available to the applicants for mortgages, but with extensive disclaimers of liability.

In accordance with this new practice, there was included in a somewhat lengthy set of declarations just above the place where the plaintiff signed the mortgage application form, the following:

"I/We have read the notes for the guidance of mortgage applicants and accept that if the loan is approved the mortgage guarantee policy premium will be added to the loan. I/We accept that the society will provide me/us with a copy of the report and mortgage valuation which the society will obtain in relation to this application. I/We understand that the society is not the agent of the surveyor or firm of surveyors and that I am making no agreement with the surveyor or firm of surveyors. I/We understand that neither the society nor the surveyor or the firm of surveyors will warrant, represent or give any assurance to me/us that the statements, conclusions and opinions expressed or implied in the report and mortgage valuation will be accurate or valid and the surveyor(s)

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Eric S. Bush⁽¹⁾ (C.A.)

A report will be supplied without any acceptance of responsibility on their part to me/us.”

Just below the plaintiff's signature it is recorded that she had paid the inspection fee which was £36.89. There is a somewhat similarly worded disclaimer of liability in printed “Notes for the Guidance of Mortgage Applicants” which it was the practice of Abbey National to supply to all mortgage applicants, but I need not refer to those notes because the disclaimer there adds nothing to what appears in the mortgage application form, as above set out, and in the copy of the defendants' report which was supplied to the plaintiff as mentioned below.

Mr. Cannell inspected the property on 8 October 1980. It is common ground that he was not required to carry out a structural survey. What he was required to do was to make a reasonably careful visual inspection of the property, and to fill in Abbey National's standard printed form headed “Report and Mortgage Valuation.” Mr. Cannell said that he would usually spend about half an hour on an inspection for a building society; that was generally in line with the evidence, as to their own practice, given at the trial by two other experienced surveyors, Mr. Manwaring and Mr. Wreford. It seems that thousands of such inspections and reports are made by surveyors for the purposes of building society mortgage applications every year over England and Wales as a whole.

A copy of Mr. Cannell's report was sent by Abbey National to the plaintiff under cover of a letter from Abbey National dated 9 October 1980. The report gives the value of the property for mortgage purposes, with vacant possession, as £16,500. It answers affirmatively the printed question whether the property was readily saleable for the purposes of owner occupation and was likely to remain so at or about the mortgage valuation. The report states that the property had been modernised in recent years to a fair standard and that no essential repairs were required. The report amply warrants the plaintiff's reaction to it, as expressed in her evidence at the trial: “The impression I got from the report was that I was very pleased with it—it did not show anything seriously wrong with the property.” On the third page of the copy of the report sent to the plaintiff, there was the disclaimer on which the defendants particularly rely, distinctively printed in red, whereas the rest of the form is printed in black. It is as follows:

“TO THE MORTGAGE APPLICANT(S): IMPORTANT

“1. THIS DOCUMENT IS NOT A MARKET VALUATION. IT IS NOT AND SHOULD NOT BE TAKEN AS, A STRUCTURAL SURVEY. It has been obtained by the society from a qualified surveyor or firm of surveyors to comply with section 25 of the Building Societies Act 1962.

“2. If you are purchasing the property, you will receive a notice that the society does not warrant that the purchase price is reasonable.

“3. This is a report to the society by its surveyor(s) and neither the society nor the surveyor(s) give any warranty, representation or assurance to you that the statements, conclusions and opinions expressed or implied in the document are accurate or valid.

“4. The surveyor(s) has/have made this report without any acceptance of responsibility on his/their part to you.”

The plaintiff admits that she read this.

The plaintiff then proceeded to buy the property. She was forced by her vendor to increase her offer to £18,000, but nothing turns on that. She did not have any other survey of the property done because, as she said in evidence and the judge accepted, she relied on the building society survey. A

Unfortunately, in his inspection of the property Mr. Cannell overlooked a serious defect. He noticed that the chimney breasts in two of the first floor rooms, including the main bedroom, had been cut away, but it did not occur to him to check whether that had been done in a way which left the chimneys above adequately supported. Had it occurred to him to check, it would have been easy to have done so (since there was a trap door through which he could have looked into the roof space with the aid of the ladder he had with him) and it would have taken him no more than 10 minutes. Had he checked he would have seen at once that the brickwork of the chimneys had been left unsupported by the removal of the chimney breasts. The absence of adequate supports meant inevitably, as explained by Mr. Manwaring at the trial, that the flues would collapse at some time. The house was thus in truth a dangerous structure, and unfit for habitation until adequate support for the flues had been provided. B C

Some 18 months later, at about 10.20 p.m. on 1 June 1982, the inevitable happened. One of the flues collapsed through the main bedroom and landing ceilings, bringing down part of another flue with it. Rubble came down the stairs into the lounge. Fortunately the plaintiff was downstairs at the time; had she been in her bed she might have been killed or seriously injured. The building work to get the place right was put in hand at once by the plaintiff, but it was five weeks before she could move back into her bedroom. D E

By this action the plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants for the negligence of Mr. Cannell in failing to check whether the removal of the chimney breasts had left the chimneys without adequate support and consequently failing to give in his report correct advice as to the condition of the property. The recorder upheld the plaintiff's claim, and awarded her £4,379.97 damages, including interest. F

On this appeal two points only are raised to which I shall come. The defendants do not dispute the recorder's findings that (i) in preparing his report Mr. Cannell owed a duty of care to the plaintiff, apart from the disclaimers which I have mentioned, since he knew that she was likely to rely on his report; (ii) she did indeed rely on his report; (iii) he was negligent in the sense that in carrying out a reasonably careful visual inspection of the property he ought to have looked to see whether the chimneys had been left with adequate support after the removal of the chimney breasts; and (iv) there was no contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part. The defendants do not in this court dispute the amount of damages awarded in the court below, if liability is established. G

The defendants submit, however, that (1) the disclaimers, i.e. the provisions set out above in the form of mortgage application signed by the plaintiff and in the notice in red on the copy of Mr. Cannell's report which was supplied to the plaintiff, have the effect of absolving the defendants from all liability for negligence which would otherwise have fallen on them; and (2) the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 does not preclude the defendants from relying on the disclaimers because, they submit, the requirement of reasonableness under section 11(3) of the H

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Eric S. Bush (C.A.)

Dillon L.J.

A Act is satisfied in relation to the disclaimers. The recorder held against the defendants on issue (1) because he found that it was an implied condition of the disclaimers that if the disclaimers were to apply there should have been a complete visual inspection of all parts of the fabric of the house. In other words, the disclaimers would have applied if Mr. Cannell had looked into the roof space but had then negligently failed to see what was plain before his eyes there, but they did not apply as he negligently failed to look into the roof space at all. Counsel for the plaintiff in this court have, rightly, felt unable to support the reasoning of the recorder on this issue, but they have submitted that the wording of the disclaimers is not sufficiently explicit to exempt the defendants from liability for negligence. They say that so far as the defendants' position is concerned (as opposed to Abbey National's position) the disclaimers merely told the plaintiff that the defendants had not carried out a full structural survey of the property and that she had no contract with the defendants.

D Reference was made in a general way in the course of argument to the well known line of authorities, stemming from Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd. [1945] K.B. 189, in which the courts have considered the principles which are applicable to clauses which purport to exempt one party to a contract from liability to the other party for the consequences of the first party's own negligence. Assuming, however, that those are the principles which ought to be applied to the construction of these disclaimers, I find it impossible to conclude that the disclaimers do not cover tortious liability of the defendants for negligence. The final words in the notice on the copy of the report supplied to the plaintiff. "The surveyor(s) has/have made this report without any acceptance of responsibility on his/their part to you," and the corresponding words at the end of the declaration in the form of mortgage application are really meaningless if they do not extend to responsibility or liability in negligence. If authority is required, it is to be found in the speeches of Lord Upjohn and Lord Pearson in Spalding v. Tarmac Civil Engineering Ltd. [1967] 1 W.L.R. 1508, 1526, 1529.

F At common law, as is recognised in Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] A.C. 465 where there is no contract the assumption of a duty of care can by appropriate words be avoided, e.g. where a reference is given "without responsibility," and where a report is supplied subject to stipulations disclaiming responsibility the recipient cannot accept the report and ignore the stipulations: see per Lord Reid, at p. 492, and per Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, at p. 504. Apart, therefore, from the Act of 1977, the disclaimers relied on would, in my judgment, have provided an effective defence for the defendants against the plaintiff's claim.

I turn, therefore, to consider issue (2), the effect of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. Section 2 of the Act provides:

H "(1) A person cannot by reference to any contract term or to a notice given to persons generally or to particular persons exclude or restrict his liability for death or personal injury resulting from negligence. (2) In the case of other loss or damage, a person cannot so exclude or restrict his liability for negligence except in so far as the term or notice satisfies the requirement of reasonableness. . . ."

Section 11(3) provides:

"In relation to a notice (not being a notice having contractual effect), the requirement of reasonableness under this Act is that it should be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on it, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining when the liability arose or (but for the notice) would have arisen."

A

Under section 11(5) the onus is on those claiming that a contract term or notice satisfies the requirement of reasonableness to show that it does.

B

The recorder includes in his judgment a finding that he had not been satisfied by the defendants that in all the circumstances of the case it would be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on the disclaimers. But this is tacked on to the section of his judgment which deals with the quantum of damages and it may relate back to the recorder's view that the disclaimers were inadequate because Mr. Cannell had never looked into the roof space at all.

C

The question is whether the requirement of reasonableness, referred to in section 2(2) of the Act of 1977 is satisfied, i.e. whether, on the words of section 11(3), it is fair and reasonable to allow reliance on the disclaimers, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining at the relevant time. In view of the generality of the words "all the circumstances," Mr. Hague for the defendants concedes that the court is not limited to considering merely the questions whether the notice referred to in the section was sufficiently clearly brought to the attention of the person concerned or was sufficiently clearly expressed for that person to have been able to understand it.

D

Whether in any particular case it is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances to allow reliance on a notice excluding liability for negligence must, of course, depend on the circumstances of the particular case. In that sense no case is a precedent for any other case. But the circumstances of the present case are very ordinary, and we are told that there were many other cases waiting the outcome of this appeal. That is not surprising considering the number of building society surveys that are carried out. It appears that it is the practice of very many, if not all, building societies to include as a matter of course in their printed forms disclaimers, to protect the society itself and its surveyors from all liability, in substantially the same terms as the disclaimers in the present case.

E

It is common ground that it was no part of Mr. Cannell's duty to carry out a full structural survey of the house, and this was understood by the plaintiff. She knew that she was taking a chance on there being no hidden defects in the house which would not have been apparent on a reasonably careful visual inspection of the house. To hold that the surveyor in such a case as the present cannot rely on the disclaimers does not involve extending the surveyor's obligations so as to make it incumbent on him to detect such hidden defects. His obligation is still merely to carry out a reasonably careful visual inspection.

F

G

H

But where he is dealing with a property at the lower end of the market and he knows that the purchaser is likely to rely on his report, and not instruct his or her own surveyor, I find it very difficult to see why it should be fair and reasonable to allow him to rely on an automatic blanket exclusion of all liability for negligence if his visual inspection of a property turns out not to have been reasonably careful.

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Eric S. Bush⁶⁷ (C.A.)

Dillon L.J.

A The defendants have urged various considerations as showing that it is fair and reasonable that they should be allowed to rely on the disclaimers. They are all general considerations, unrelated to the particular facts of this case, and they are said to warrant an automatic blanket exclusion of all liability to mortgage applicants for negligence in respect of building society surveys. They say, for instance, that the surveyors never meet the mortgage applicants and so have no opportunity of clarifying or explaining anything they may have put in a report for a building society. They say also that it is of great benefit to the mortgage applicants that the report required by a building society under the statute, before it can agree to make a mortgage advance, should be available quickly and cheaply, and they suggest that neither of these ends will be attained if the surveyor has always in his mind the fear of litigation and the need to satisfy his insurers. They also naturally point to the fact that the interests of the building society, merely as mortgagee, and the interest of the purchaser as owner of the equity of redemption are not the same; but this point is greatly weakened when it is seen that the report covers such questions, in which the purchaser is vitally interested, as the marketability of the property and whether urgent repairs to the property are required.

D Giving full consideration to all that has been urged by Mr. Hague, I cannot see that it is fair or reasonable that a professional surveyor making a mortgage report at the lower end of the property market, when he knows that the would-be-purchaser who is applying for a mortgage on the property has paid the fee for the report, will be supplied with a copy of the report and is likely to rely on the report and so is not likely to instruct any other surveyor, should be able to rely on any general disclaimers, such as those in the present case, unrelated to any special factors affecting the particular property, to exempt him from liability to the purchaser for negligence if it should happen that he, the surveyor, carries out his visual inspection of the property without due care.

F It may be different—I express no opinion—where the mortgage applicant who chooses to rely on a building society's surveyor's report, despite having read such disclaimers, is himself a surveyor or a lawyer who understands these matters. So far as the plaintiff was concerned—I fancy this would go for most purchasers—I do not think she would have seen any reason to incur the additional cost of instructing a second surveyor after she had read the copy of Mr. Cannell's report.

G I do not doubt that Mr. Cannell, when he makes a visual inspection of a property with a view to making a mortgage report to a building society, intends to act with reasonable care. I do not see why he should not be liable in damages like any other professional man who fails to show reasonable care if on a particular occasion he has failed to take reasonable care in his inspection.

H I would accordingly dismiss this appeal.

GLIDEWELL L.J. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgment of Dillon L.J. I gratefully adopt his recital of the facts, including the relevant documents.

There are two issues in this appeal. (1) On their face, did the words of the disclaimer suffice to prevent any duty of care being owed by the defendants to the plaintiff? (2) If so, did the disclaimer satisfy the requirement of reasonableness in sections 2(2) and 11(3) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977? A

(1) The effect of the disclaimer

The documents which are particularly important are the declaration on the mortgage application form signed by the plaintiff and the notice at the end of the defendants' report of 8 October 1980, below their valuation. Dillon L.J. has set that out in his judgment. The plaintiff said in evidence that she read that notice. We are thus not concerned with the question whether the disclaimer was brought to her attention. Clearly it was. B

The reason which the recorder gave for holding that the disclaimer was not sufficient to avoid responsibility, i.e. that there was an implied condition that, if the disclaimer is to apply, there should have been a complete visual inspection, was unsound. Counsel for the plaintiff did not attempt to rely on it. C

Mr. Seabrook's argument is that the disclaimer did not cover liability for negligence. If that is correct, the disclaimer did not cover anything. The plaintiff was never in a contractual relationship with the defendants. If they were or could be liable to her, that liability could only be in the tort of negligence—which is how the plaintiff's claim is framed. D

The payment by the plaintiff of £36.89 was not a payment of a fee for the provision of a report to her. The building society required the inspection, report and valuation by a surveyor both for its own purposes and to comply with section 25 of the Building Societies Act 1962. At 6 October 1980 the only contract was a promise by the building society to obtain a report and valuation and then consider whether to make to the plaintiff the mortgage loan she required in consideration of the payment of £36.89 to it. E

In my view, the wording of the disclaimer set out in the notice on the defendants' report and valuation did suffice to prevent the defendants owing any duty of care to the plaintiff. In other words, it was so worded as to relieve them of all liability in negligence. F

(2) Did that notice satisfy the test of reasonableness in the Act of 1977?

Is it "fair and reasonable to allow reliance on it, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining" at 8 October 1980, i.e. the date of the report? This is a question of policy, which could sensibly be answered either way.

The argument for the plaintiff, as it eventually emerged, is that it is necessary to distinguish between a disclaimer of liability for not doing something which Mr. Cannell was not purporting to do, i.e. carrying out a full structural survey, and doing incompetently that which Mr. Cannell was purporting to do, i.e. making a visual inspection sufficient to reveal any state of disrepair which would affect the value of the property, to ascertain the general condition of the property, and to place a value upon it. It is submitted that it is unfair to exclude liability for negligence in the latter category. G

Mr. Hague for the defendants has two main arguments on this. (a) The lack of support for the chimney flues in the roof space and the chimney stack above would only have been revealed by a full structural survey, not by a visual inspection of the sort Mr. Cannell was carrying out. In my view this is not correct. The judge accepted the evidence of H

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Eric S. Bush (C.A.)

Glidewell L.J.

A Mr. Manwaring, a chartered building surveyor called as an expert witness for the plaintiff, that the fact that the chimney breasts had been removed (which Mr. Cannell observed) should have put him on inquiry as to whether the flues and stack above had been left unsupported. That inquiry would have involved no more than putting his head and shoulders through the trap door into the roof space, when the lack of support would at once have been apparent. The judge said that it would B have taken no more than 10 minutes to check, and that Mr. Cannell should have looked through the trap door but did not. I agree with him.
In my view Mr. Cannell was guilty of lack of proper care in doing the sort of inspection he was purporting to do. (b) Mr. Cannell was carrying out the inspection for, and reporting to, the building society and for nobody else. Mr. Hague argues that it is not fair or reasonable that the C defendants should be under any duty of care to a potential purchaser, with whom they had no contractual relationship, simply because the building society chose to supply a copy of their report to the plaintiff.
This is the nub of the case. If a surveyor's inspection is competently carried out, a potential purchaser who chooses not to commission his own inspection, despite the warning notice, will obtain the benefit of the report. But, Mr. Hague argues, he cannot justifiably complain if the D inspection fails to reveal some defect which a reasonably competent inspection should have revealed. It is my opinion that this argument fails because its basic premise is incorrect. While it is true that the surveyor carried out his inspection and wrote his report and valuation because he was commissioned to do so by the building society, he knew that a copy of his report would be sent to the plaintiff and that most probably she E would rely on his report and valuation without obtaining any other advice. In my judgment a professional man, who knows that a potential purchaser of a house, herself possessed of no special skill, will most probably rely on his skill and competence, should not be allowed to relieve himself of liability if he fails to exercise a reasonable degree of skill and competence in the task on which he is engaged.

F In agreement with Dillon L.J. I would thus hold that, in so far as the disclaimer excluded liability for negligence in the carrying out of the limited sort of inspection Mr. Cannell was engaged to do and was purporting to do, the notice of disclaimer did not satisfy the requirement of reasonableness within sections 2(2) and 11(3) of the Act of 1977. For this reason I, too, would dismiss the appeal.

G SIR EDWARD EVELEIGH. Section 2(2) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 prevents the defendant firm from excluding "liability for negligence except in so far as the term or notice satisfies the requirement of reasonableness."

H In the present case it is first necessary to decide whether or not there would be liability for negligence apart from the notice which seeks to exclude that liability. The words in red displayed prominently in the report are not simply a disclaimer of liability. They also constitute a warning that the report is of limited value as a survey report. If the plaintiff had relied on the report to an extent which would be unreasonable bearing in mind the warning, there would be no liability on the defendants and no need to consider the efficacy of a notice excluding liability.

However, in so far as the words constitute a warning, they do not in my opinion warn a person to place no reliance at all on the report. They do not say that it is dangerous to rely on the report for what it purports to be or for what it says.

The report did not reveal what a valuation report would have revealed if properly prepared, albeit for its limited purpose. On the contrary, it asserted that the property was readily saleable for the purpose of owner occupation. The plaintiff relied on it in this respect but the report did not merit even that degree of confidence. The warning, in my opinion, was not such as to make it unreasonable for the plaintiff to rely on the report as she did. Therefore, the defendants will be liable to the plaintiff unless the notice is effective to exclude liability.

In this court counsel has not sought to argue that the defendants would not have been liable in the absence of a notice of disclaimer. None the less, I have analysed the position because I think it is important to bear in mind the basis of the defendants' liability when considering whether or not it would be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on the notice, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining when the liability arose.

A relevant part of the circumstances obtaining when liability arose was the fact that the report stated that the house was readily saleable for the purpose of owner occupation and was likely to remain so. There was no warning that this assertion was unreliable. It would have been perfectly simple to discover the dangerous state of the premises. No structural survey was needed for that. The least attention to the task that the plaintiff was entitled to expect from the defendants would have revealed the fault. The defendants' fault can hardly be regarded as a mere accidental error or omission.

I therefore am of the opinion that it would not be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on a disclaimer which might, I know not, be effective in other circumstances.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

NATIONAL EMPLOYERS' MUTUAL GENERAL INSURANCE
ASSOCIATION LTD. v. JONES1987 Feb. 2, 3; March 27May and Croom-Johnson L.JJ. and
Sir Denys Buckley

Sale of Goods—Title—Stolen vehicle—Possession of stolen car passing through series of sales to defendant—Whether defendant acquiring title to car—Whether title good against owner—Factors Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict., c. 45), ss. 2, 9—Sale of Goods Act 1979 (c. 54), ss. 2, 25(1), 61(1)

Section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 (and section 25(1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979) provides:

“Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods . . . the delivery or transfer, by that person or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods . . . under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof . . . to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods . . . with the consent of the owner.”

Thieves stole H.'s car and purported to sell it to L., who sold it to T. The car was sold by T. to A. Ltd. and that company subsequently sold it to M. Ltd., which sold it to the defendant. Both companies and the defendant bought the car in good faith and without notice of H.'s title. The plaintiff, H.'s insurer, bought out her interest in the car and asked the defendant to return it. The defendant refused and the plaintiff brought proceedings claiming, inter alia, delivery up of the car or, alternatively, its value. The defendant resisted the claim on the basis that he had acquired good title to the car by virtue of section 9 of the Factors Act 1889. The judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the value of the car plus interest.

On the defendant's appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeal (Sir Denys Buckley dissenting), that it was a condition precedent to the operation of section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 that the person, with whose consent the deliverer or transferor of goods had possession of them, should himself have had, or had authority to transmit, the general property in them, since he would not otherwise be a seller within the meaning of the Act, and the transferor would not have “bought or agreed to buy” the goods; that section 9 did not confer on a person whose possession of goods derived ultimately from a thief any title which was good against that of the true owner and such a person could not by virtue of that section confer any such title on any purported purchaser from him, notwithstanding that both of them acted in good faith and without notice of the true owner's title; and that, accordingly, the defendant had not acquired title to the car under section 9 of the Act of 1889, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the car from the defendant (post, pp. 915c–h, 917g–918b, 919a, 920c–e).

Per Sir Denys Buckley. The language of section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 is clear and unequivocal and is susceptible of only one interpretation. The section confers no protection upon a purchaser from a thief but would, however, enable that purchaser to confer on an innocent purchaser from him an unassailable title. The operation of the section is not to strike from the hand of the original true owner of the goods his title of ownership, but to place in the hand of him who has acquired those goods from the notional mercantile agent an impregnable shield which makes it impossible thenceforth for the original true owner to assert his title against him who has the goods (post, pp. 924B–C, G, 926E–F). APPEAL from Judge ap Robert sitting at Bridgend County Court.

By a summons and particulars of claim dated 28 September 1984, the plaintiff, National Employers' Mutual General Insurance Association

3 W.L.R.

National Employers' Insurance Ltd. v. Jones (C.A.)

A Ltd., claimed against the defendant, Robert William Jones, that a Ford Fiesta motor car which had been owned by Celia Hopkin but which had been assigned to the plaintiff by her for £2,750 on 21 March 1983, had been stolen on 3 February 1983 and, having passed through several hands, had been purportedly purchased by the defendant on 18 March 1983 from Mid-Glamorgan Motors (Bridgend) Ltd., and that the
B defendant had wrongfully failed and refused to deliver up the car on demand to the plaintiff, and had thereby wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of it, by reason whereof it had suffered loss and damage. The plaintiff claimed, inter alia, delivery up of the car, or alternatively £2,750, being its value, and damages for its detention.

C By his defence dated 29 October 1984 the defendant, inter alia, denied that he had wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the car and averred that he was the owner of the car and entitled to possession of it by virtue of section 9 of the Factors Act 1889. By its reply dated 15 March 1985 the plaintiff denied, inter alia, that section 9 of the Act of 1889 had any application to the transaction in which the defendant had purported to purchase the car.

D On 30 January 1986 Judge ap Robert in Bridgend County Court gave judgment for the plaintiff with costs on its claim in the sum of £2,650 plus £824 interest.

E By a notice of appeal dated 10 February 1986 the defendant appealed on the grounds (1) that, in view of the fact that all the evidence was agreed inter partes, the judge had failed to make any findings as to whether, in the event of his construing section 9 of the Act of 1889 and section 25(1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 in the sense urged by the defendant (viz. that they should be given their literal and/or ordinary and/or natural meaning), the defendant was a person receiving the car in good faith whose receiving would therefore have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer to him had been a mercantile agent in possession of it with the consent of the owner; (2) that the F judge had failed to construe section 9 of the Act of 1889 and section 25(1) of the Act of 1979 in accordance with their literal meaning and/or had failed to accord the words "owner" and "seller" therein their literal and/or ordinary and/or natural meaning, and in equating those words as both meaning "owner" had erred in law and applied a strained and erroneous meaning to the words and/or to the sections; and (3) that in the premises the judge had erred in failing to find that the defendant had received good title to the car by reason of the operation of section 9 of the Act of 1889 and section 25(1) of the Act of 1979.

G The facts are stated in the judgment of May L.J.

Cur. adv. vult.

H

27 March. The following judgments were handed down.

MAY L.J. This is a defendant's appeal against a judgment of Judge ap Robert of 30 January 1986 awarding the plaintiff £2,650 by way of damages, together with interest of £824 and costs. The defendant now seeks to have that judgment set aside and judgment entered in the action for him against the plaintiff.

All the facts in this case were agreed. A Miss Hopkin was the owner of a Ford Fiesta motor car which was stolen from her on 3 February 1983. On 23 September 1983 those thieves were convicted. Prior to this, however, they had sold the car to a person called Lacey on a date and at a price unknown. Lacey then sold on to one Roderick Thomas, again on a date and at a price unknown. On 7 February 1983 Thomas in his turn sold the car to Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd. for £2,100. Five weeks later, on 14 March 1983 Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd. sold the car to Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd. for £2,350. On 17 March 1983 Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd. sold the car to the defendant for £2,650. It was accepted that the defendant was completely honest when he bought the car. The plaintiff was Miss Hopkin's insurer which, having bought out its insured's interest after the theft for £2,750, thereby acquired rights to the car. It asked for the car back by letter of 6 January 1984 but the defendant refused to return it. The plaintiff accordingly began these proceedings in the Bridgend County Court on 27 September 1984 in which it succeeded, as I have indicated, in recovering damages representing the value of the car from the defendant. The short point which was argued below and before us is the extent to which, if at all, the operation of the maxim nemo dat quod non habet has been affected by the provisions of section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 and what is now section 25(1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, which is in very much the same terms.

As the relevant provisions of the two statutes are for present purposes identical, I quote those in the earlier statute for convenience. Section 1 of the Factors Act 1889 provides:

"For the purposes of this Act—(1) The expression 'mercantile agent' shall mean a mercantile agent having in the customary course of his business as such agent authority either to sell goods, or to consign goods for the purpose of sale, or to buy goods, or to raise money on the security of goods: . . ."

Section 2(1) provides:

"Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same."

Sections 8 and 9 of the Act are as follows:

"8. Where a person, having sold goods, continues, or is, in possession of the goods or of the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, or under any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same.

3 W.L.R.

National Employers' Insurance Ltd. v. Jones (C.A.)

May L.J.

A "9. Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer, by that person or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, or under any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition B thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner."

C The judge held that the operation of the maxim was not affected by, in particular, section 9 of the Act of 1889 and that in effect one had to construe the section as if the word "owner" had the same meaning as "seller." The argument in brief on behalf of the defendant, which was the argument advanced before the judge below, was that one should look at the actual words of section 9 and interpret them literally. If one did so on the facts of the instant case, it followed, it was contended, that D the defendant acquired a good title to the car when he bought it from Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd., as indeed may some or all of the earlier sub-purchasers of it, other than the purchaser from the thieves themselves.

E The argument advanced on behalf of the defendant was direct and uncomplicated. Counsel submitted that there was no reason why one should not give section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 its literal and clear meaning. If one did so and, for instance, in relation to the sale by Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd. to Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd., substituted the names of the appropriate parties for their descriptions in the relevant words of section 9, it would read: "Where Mid-Glamorgan, having bought or agreed to buy goods [the car], obtains with the consent of Autochoice possession of the car, the delivery or transfer, by Mid-F Glamorgan, of the car, under any sale, to the defendant receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of Autochoice in respect of the car, shall have the same effect as if Mid-Glamorgan were a mercantile agent in possession of the car with the consent of Miss Hopkin." Then, the argument continued, by virtue of section 2 of the Act of 1889, the delivery or transfer of the car by Mid-Glamorgan to the defendant under the sale agreed between them was as valid as if the former had been expressly authorised by Miss Hopkin, as the owner of the car, to make the sale. Thus at least on the facts of this case, the defendant acquired a good title to the car and Miss Hopkin's insurer ought not to have succeeded against the defendant in the court below.

H Counsel supported this argument by a number of collateral submissions. First, he contended that, other things being equal, the court should always adopt a literal approach to the construction of statutes. The court's task was to see what Parliament had said, giving words their ordinary and natural meaning, and then to give effect to this in respect of the facts of a given case. It was only when the words of a statute in their ordinary meaning were unclear, or gave rise to an ambiguity, that the court in construing them should depart from the literal approach.

Secondly, unless there was any clear reason to the contrary, a court should give the same meaning to the same word where it is used in different places in a statute. Thus "the owner" of goods in section 2 clearly referred to the true owner, to the person having the general property in the goods. Unless there was any reason to the contrary, therefore, which counsel submitted there was not, the court should give the same meaning to the same words in section 9. On this basis any argument that one should read the word "owner" in section 9 as equivalent to "seller," or perhaps to "original seller," could not be correct. Further, where in the same section of an Act the draftsman had used specific and different words, the clear inference was that Parliament had intended them to mean different things. Thus where in section 9 the draftsman had specifically referred to the seller and to the original seller, and thereafter to the owner, it again could not be right to equate one with the other. The care with which the section was drafted was demonstrated by the use of the phrase "the original seller" at one point; this was used to make it quite clear that the reference was back to the seller referred to in the seventeenth word of the section and to avoid any possible confusion.

Thirdly, if the original seller in a section 9 situation already has the proprietary title to the relevant goods, then section 9 is not needed to pass that title to the ultimate buyer.

In further support of his argument, counsel traced the legislative history of the relevant provisions. Section 2 of the Factors Act 1889 had its general origin in section 1 of the Factors Act 1823. That enacted that where goods were entrusted by their owner to an agent for the purpose of sale, then if that agent shipped the goods in his own name he should be deemed to be the true owner to any consignee of the goods who took them in good faith and without notice of any adverse interest in them.

This basic principle was amended and extended by the Factors Acts of 1825 and 1842, by the Factors Act (Amendment) Act 1877 and ultimately by the Factors Act 1889 itself, where it was given effect by section 2. Throughout, in order that an agent in possession of goods could pass a good title under this particular legislation, he had to have been entrusted with the goods, with the consent of their owner, as a mercantile agent and those taking from that agent must have done so in good faith and without notice of any other interest.

The extension of a similar principle to transactions by sellers permitted to remain in possession of the goods sold or buyers allowed to have possession of the goods bought, now embodied in sections 8 and 9 of the Act of 1889 and sections 24 and 25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, was first brought about by sections 3 and 4 of the amending Act of 1877. Under those two sections the criterion to be complied with to enable an ultimate bona fide transferee without notice to obtain a good title was that after a sale the respective vendor or vendee should retain or obtain, as the case might be, the possession of the goods. Given that possession, then a subsequent delivery or transfer of the goods to such a transferee passed a good title. On the facts of the instant case, it was submitted, clearly Mid-Glamorgan had the necessary possession of the car, with the consent of Autochoice, and thus the sale by the latter to the defendant passed a good title to him.

So far as I am aware there are no English cases which are directly in point on this argument, that the simple and literal construction of section 9 of the Act of 1889 or section 25 of the Act of 1979 is to be

May L.J.

A preferred, contended for on behalf of the defendant. There are, however, one New Zealand and one Canadian decision at first instance against such a construction, to which I shall refer later.

B In support of his argument, nevertheless, counsel for the defendant referred us to a number of decisions which have a substantial bearing on the points in issue in this appeal. The earliest to which I think I need refer is Folkes v. King [1923] 1 K.B. 282. In that case the owner of a motor car delivered it to a mercantile agent for sale on certain conditions. Dishonestly and in breach of those conditions the agent sold it to a purchaser who bought it in good faith and without notice of the agent's fraud. It was held by this court that the purchaser acquired a good title by virtue of section 2 of the Act of 1889. It was also held that the agent had not been guilty of the old larceny by a trick, since he was authorised by the erstwhile owner to pass the property in the car to a purchaser. Yet further, Bankes and Scrutton L.JJ. expressed the view that as the plaintiff had in fact consented to the mercantile agent having possession of the car, it was immaterial whether the latter had committed larceny by a trick. Folkes v. King was of course a case decided on section 2 and not section 9 of the Act of 1889, but counsel was able to make the general observation, so far as it went, that even though goods may have been stolen, title to them may pass where possession is or is deemed to be with the consent of the owners.

D Next, in Pearson v. Rose & Young Ltd. [1951] 1 K.B. 275, another motor car case, it was held that title did not pass to the ultimate transferee because a mercantile agent could not sell a car "in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent" unless he sold the registration book with the car. However, on the facts of that case, at the time of the purported sale to the transferee of both car and registration book the dishonest agent's possession of the latter was not "with the consent of the owner." Nevertheless, although obiter, the opening passage of the judgment of Denning L.J. is of interest in the context of the present appeal. He said, at pp. 286-287:

F "In the early days of the common law the governing principle of our law of property was that no person could give a better title than he himself had. But the needs of commerce have led to a progressive modification of this principle so as to protect innocent purchasers. We have had cases in this court quite recently about sales in market overt and sales by a sheriff; and now we have the present case about sales by a mercantile agent. The cases show how difficult it is to strike the right balance between the claims of true owners and the claims of innocent purchasers. The way that Parliament has done it in the case of mercantile agents is this: Parliament has protected the true owner by making it clear that he does not lose his right to goods when they are taken from him without his consent, as for instance when they have been stolen from his house by a burglar who has handed them over to a mercantile agent. The true owner can in that case claim them back from any person into whose hands they came, even from an innocent purchaser who has bought from a mercantile agent. But Parliament has not protected a true owner, if he has himself consented to a mercantile agent having possession of them: because, by leaving them in the agent's possession, he has clothed the agent with apparent authority to sell them; and he should not therefore be allowed to claim them back from an innocent purchaser.” A

A case whose facts were very close to that of the instant one was Du Jardin v. Beadman Bros. Ltd. [1952] 2 Q.B. 712. The essential ones for present purposes were that a rogue (Greenaway) agreed to buy a motor car from the defendants. He gave a cheque in payment and left another car with the defendants as security. They allowed him to take the first car and its registration book away with him. Subsequently the rogue surreptitiously took back the second car he had given as security. Three days later he sold the first car to the plaintiff, who received it in good faith and without notice of any defect in the rogue's title. However, his cheque was worthless and after he had been convicted of fraud that first car was returned to the defendants. The plaintiff then sued them for its return. The defendants denied that the car had at any material time belonged to the plaintiff. Having stated these facts, Sellers J. said, at p. 715: B C

“In these circumstances, notwithstanding the fraudulent conduct of Greenaway throughout, unless authority requires me to hold otherwise, I would find that Greenaway, having agreed to buy the Standard car, obtained possession of it with the consent of the defendants, the sellers, and that he sold and delivered it to the plaintiff, who received it in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the defendants, the original sellers, in respect of the car. If these findings are correct, then the plaintiff obtained a good title under section 9 of the Factors Act 1889.” D

The judge then considered whether he was in law entitled to hold that the rogue's possession of the car had indeed been with the consent of the defendants, having regard to the fact that this had been brought about by the rogue's larceny by a trick. Having referred to the earlier authorities the judge held that he was so entitled, saying that he saw no reason to interpret “consent” in the Factors Act 1889 in an artificial way in order to bring it into harmony with the criminal law which, in so far as larceny by a trick was concerned, was itself based upon artificiality. The judge finally held, therefore, that the plaintiff had established a good title to the motor car which he claimed and made an order for its return to him. E F

As will appear, however, I think that the crucial distinction between Du Jardin's case and the one presently under appeal is that whereas in the former the root title to the motor car had been a good one in the defendants, nevertheless the relevant string of transactions in the present case began with a party with no title at all, namely the thieves who stole the Ford Fiesta from Miss Hopkin. G

A similar point can be made in relation to the decision in Pacific Motor Auctions Pty. Ltd. v. Motor Credits (Hire Finance) Ltd. [1965] A.C. 867. That was an appeal to the Privy Council from the High Court of Australia concerning section 28(1) of the New South Wales Sale of Goods Act 1923 which was in the same terms as section 8 of the Factors Act 1889 and what is now section 24 of the English Sale of Goods Act 1979. The opinion of the Privy Council, delivered by Lord Pearce, contained this paragraph, at p. 882: H

“The English statutory provision which was the origin of section 28(1) was introduced in 1877 with the object of mitigating the

May L.J.

A asperity of the common law towards an innocent party purchasing goods from a person who has all the trappings of ownership but in truth has no proper title to the goods. Nemo dat quod non habet."

B Later passages in the opinion delivered in this case stress the necessity to give the words of the relevant section their natural and ordinary meaning. For instance Lord Pearce said of the section under consideration in that case, at p. 886:

C "One may, perhaps, say in loose terms that a person having sold goods continues in possession as long as he is holding because of and only because of the sale; but what justification is there for imposing such an elaborate and artificial construction on the natural meaning of the words? The object of the section is to protect an innocent purchaser who is deceived by the vendor's physical possession of the goods or documents and who is inevitably unaware of legal rights which fetter the apparent power to dispose. Where a vendor retains uninterrupted physical possession of the goods why should an unknown arrangement, which substitutes a bailment for ownership, disentitle the innocent purchaser to protection from a danger which is just as great as that from which the section is D admittedly intended to protect him?"

E In this part of this judgment I turn finally to Newtons of Wembley Ltd. v. Williams [1964] 1 W.L.R. 1028, tried at first instance by Davies L.J. In that case the plaintiffs sold a car to a rogue for which he paid by cheque. This was dishonoured. The plaintiffs then took all possible steps to trace the rogue and told the Hire Purchase Information Bureau that they claimed that the car still belonged to them. By so doing they took all sufficient steps to avoid their contract of sale with the rogue in accordance with the principles laid down in Car and Universal Finance Co. Ltd. v. Caldwell [1965] 1 Q.B. 525. A little later the rogue sold the car in Warren Street for cash and his purchaser resold it to the defendant, who took the car in good faith and without F notice of any defect in his vendor's title to the car. The plaintiffs demanded it back, but the defendant refused to return it. The trial judge dismissed the plaintiffs' claim. He said, at pp. 1033–1034:

G "On the facts of this case, Andrew [the rogue], having bought the car, obtained possession of it with the consent of the plaintiffs. It is well established that consent in such circumstances obtained by fraud is nevertheless consent: Pearson v. Rose & Young Ltd. [1951] 1 K.B. 275, 288, 289, per Denning L.J.; Du Jardin v. Beadman Brothers Ltd. [1952] 2 Q.B. 712. From the decision in Car & Universal Finance Co. Ltd. v. Caldwell [1964] 2 W.L.R. 600, mentioned above, it must be taken that the plaintiffs withdrew their consent. But this makes no difference: section 2(2) of the Factors Act; and see Cahn v. Pockett's Bristol Channel Steam Packet Co. Ltd. [1899] 1 Q.B. 643, 658, per Collins L.J. It follows, therefore, H that the sale by Biss to Biss was covered by sections 9 and 2 of the Factors Act 1889. It had the same effect as though Andrew were a mercantile agent in possession of the car with the consent of the plaintiffs: that is to say, that if the sale was in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent it was effective to transfer title provided that Biss acted in good faith without notice of any rights of the plaintiffs in respect of the car and without notice that Andrew had no authority to sell.”

He then raised the question whether the sale by the rogue could be said to have been in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, but held that it should be so described on the evidence before him that in Warren Street and its neighbourhood there was a well-established street market for cash dealing in used cars.

The whole decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Newtons of Wembley Ltd. v. Williams [1965] 1 Q.B. 560. That court was principally concerned with the difficult question of construction about the effect of the words in section 2(1) of the Act of 1889—“made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent”—in a case under section 9 of a buyer obtaining possession and then making a disposition. However this need not trouble us in the present appeal since both Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd. and Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd. were recognised dealers and each sold the Ford Fiesta in the course of their business as such.

“Before one takes too favourable a view for the sub-buyer and too harsh a view against the true owner of the goods as to the cases where section 9 can be invoked, one must remember that it is taking away the right which would have existed at common law, and for myself I should not be prepared to enlarge it more than the words clearly permitted and required. It seems to me that all that section 9 can be said clearly to do is to place the buyer in possession in the position of a mercantile agent when he has in fact in his possession the goods of somebody else, and it does no more than clothe him with that fictitious or notional position on any disposition of those goods.”

On this material the contention of counsel for the defendant in our present case can be summarised in this way. Apart from the New Zealand and Alberta decisions at first instance (to which I myself have not as yet referred, but will do hereafter) there is no case directly deciding that the literal construction of section 9 of the Act of 1889 is wrong. Prima facie such a construction should be the preferred one. At least on their own facts such a clear construction was the one adopted in Du Jardin v. Beadman Brothers Ltd. [1952] 2 Q.B. 712 and Newtons of Wembley Ltd. v. Williams [1964] 1 W.L.R. 1028; [1965] 1 Q.B. 560, in each of which the decision of the trial judge was upheld in this court. It has been applied in cases where the title passed by the original vendor has been no more than a voidable one, and indeed when on the facts that title has been avoided before the rogue passed the goods on. To adopt such a construction does “mitigate the asperity of the common law” in this type of case. Although in the early development of the Factors Acts the important consideration was that the goods subsequently sold had been entrusted to an agent by the true owner, their later development stressed the importance of the possession of the goods through which the ultimate title was derived. Such an approach had received the approval of the Privy Council in Pacific Motor Auctions Pty. Ltd. v. Motor Credits (Hire Finance) Ltd. [1965] A.C. 867 and it took care of the mischief against which the material statutory provisions

May L.J.

A were directed, namely, the protection of innocent purchasers. On policy grounds there was no reason not to adopt the construction contended for: as between the two innocent parties, the original true owner and the ultimate innocent purchaser, it let the loss lie where it had fallen; it made for certainty; it avoided unnecessary litigation; the interests of the public were well protected by the requirement that to be protected the purchaser should have acquired the goods for value and without notice.

B The judge in the court below rejected the argument based on the literal construction of section 9 of the Act of 1889 and section 25 of the Act of 1979. In his opinion common sense dictated that "dominium . . . cannot arise or begin with the possession of a thief" and that the draftsman intended that in these two sections the words "owner" and "seller" should "have one and the same meaning." With respect to the C judge, however, unless I am forced to this somewhat artificial construction of the two sections, I would prefer not to adopt it.

There has been some academic interest on this point. Some commentators have favoured the literal construction contended for by the defendant. Others have argued for various constructions, which respectfully I have found artificial, in order to avoid the result that an ultimate purchaser of goods can obtain a good title through a thief—and D not merely one guilty of larceny by a trick: see W. R. Cornish, "Rescission Without Notice" (1964) 27 M.L.R. 472; G. Battersby and A. D. Preston, "The Concepts of 'Property', 'Title' and 'Owner' used in the Sale of Goods Act 1893" (1972) 35 M.L.R. 268; D. G. Powles, "Stolen Goods and the Sale of Goods Act 1893 section 25(2)" (1974) 37 M.L.R. 213; G. Battersby and A. D. Preston, "Stolen Goods and the Sale of Goods Act 1893 section 25(2)—A Rejoinder" (1975) 38 M.L.R. 77 and D. G. Powles, "Stolen Goods and the Sale of Goods Act 1893
E section 25(2)—A Surrejoinder," 38 M.L.R. 83.

However, as Professor Atiyah has written in his treatise, The Sale of Goods, 7th ed. (1985), pp. 302–303, if the conclusion contended for by the defendant is correct it is a startling one

F "which at first sight seems so contrary to everything one knows about the law that it cannot be right. If this indeed is the law, there can be little doubt that a large number of cases have been wrongly decided and many innocent buyers of motor vehicles have been wrongfully deprived of their vehicles, because it never seems to have occurred to anybody that a buyer from a thief has a greater power to pass title than the thief himself has."

G As Professor Atiyah also says, however, the argument in favour of a literal construction and the consequent result is not easy to refute. In the instant appeal, counsel for the plaintiff sought to do so by submitting that section 9 of the Act of 1889 and section 25 of the Act of 1979 had to be construed as applying solely to the one transaction to which one is seeking to apply them. The "owner" in the two sections means merely H the owner of the title which is the subject matter of the particular transaction which one is considering. In support he quoted and adopted a passage from Goode, Commercial Law, 2nd ed. (1982), pp. 413–414:

"One other problem remains. Though the consent to possession necessary to attract section 9 is the consent of the seller, the delivery or transfer is given the same effect as if the person making it were a mercantile agent in possession with the consent of the owner. From this it has been deduced that section 9 can operate even if the original seller lacked title. Such an interpretation would produce the result, absurd in policy terms, that whilst a thief could not pass title in the stolen goods to his purchaser, yet that purchaser could pass title on a resale. This conclusion has rightly been rejected by courts in Kenya, Canada and New Zealand, though they have been hard put to it to escape from the language of the section. One can see how, as a matter of drafting, the problem has arisen. The draftsman, whose compression of language has caused difficulty elsewhere, evidently felt that rather than spell out the effect of section 9 in extenso he could achieve the same result more elegantly by incorporating by reference the effect of section 2. But this section, dealing with a different problem, refers to the consent of the owner, so that the concluding words of section 9 necessarily had to refer to the consent of the owner, for a reference to the consent of the seller would have been meaningless when translated back into section 2. There is no wholly satisfactory method of reading the language of section 9; but the most satisfactory explanation is that advanced by Professor Battersby and Mr. Preston, that 'owner' is to be read as meaning 'the relevant owner,' that is, the owner of the title which is the subject of the transaction, i.e. the title vested in S. If this is the best title, then that is what passes on the buyer's disposition. If it is merely a possessory title, then the innocent third party acquires a mere possessory title, good against anyone except the true owner. In producing this last result, section 9 is admittedly otiose, for the third party would anyway acquire a possessory title under the general law. An alternative approach, which does somewhat more violence to the language of the section but produces much the same result, is to read 'seller' as meaning 'seller who is the owner.' This has the effect that only an indefeasible title could pass under section 9; but if S had a mere possessory title, this would still pass to the sub-purchaser at common law."

E

Counsel for the plaintiff contended that at common law the principle embodied in the maxim nemo dat quod non habet was a fundamental one; that it would be surprising to find it disappplied merely by the somewhat ambiguous words of section 9 of the Act of 1889; that an indication of the invalidity of this particular construction of the relevant sections is the fact that for over 100 years no one is reported to have advanced it before this case, or if they have then in no case has it succeeded.

F

In so far as the mischief referred to by counsel for the defendant as justifying his literal approach to the relevant sections is concerned, counsel for the plaintiff echoed arguendo the comment by Lord Donovan towards the end of his Reservation to the Twelfth Report of the Law Reform Committee, on the Transfer of Title to Chattels (1966) (Cmnd. 2958) to the effect that only a small proportion of stolen property is ever recovered, and that it does not seem that the successful disposal of such property is particularly difficult or that the innocent purchasers of it are being dispossessed on a scale which calls for their protection.

G

H

Counsel then referred us to the two Commonwealth decisions which I have mentioned. In Elwin v. O'Regan and Maxwell [1971] N.Z.L.R. 1124, Beattie J. had before him in the Supreme Court in Wellington, first, a claim by the ultimate purchaser of a motor car against the agent of a finance company which had purported to repossess the car. The

3 W.L.R.

National Employers' Insurance Ltd. v. Jones (C.A.)

May L.J.

A allegation was that a person who had originally taken the car on hire-purchase from the finance company had sold it without their consent, and that after a number of subsequent sales it had been bought by the plaintiff in good faith and without notice of any defect in the title of his seller. The plaintiff relied on the same argument as that raised by the defendant in this appeal, based upon a literal reading of section 27(2) of the New Zealand Sale of Goods Act 1908 which was in the same terms as section 9 of the English Factors Act 1889 or section 25 of our Sales of Goods Act 1979.

B Before Beattie J. counsel submitted that the deliberate wording of the section had always been regarded as putting the point beyond doubt and that it could not be assumed that the use of the word "owner" at the end of the section was a slip. However the judge then quoted from C Atiyah, The Sale of Goods, 3rd ed. (1966), p. 163 in which a similar passage to that which I have quoted appeared, and then said, at p. 1131:

"I am inclined to think that what Atiyah has said seems to accord with common sense and what has apparently been the practice adhered to in the past. By use of the word 'seller' it seems to me that the section clearly envisages a contract of sale."

D The judge then referred to Butterworth v. Kingsway Motors [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1286 and quoted a passage from the judgment of Pearson J., at p. 1295 in which the latter clearly thought that the maxim nemo dat quod non habet applied in similar circumstances to those in the New Zealand case, at least until the original purported seller who had been in breach of her hire-purchase agreement perfected her title by paying the finance company the outstanding sum due. Beattie J. then continued, E [1971] N.Z.L.R. 1124, 1132:

"It seems to me that these comments of Pearson J. lend some weight to the interpretation of the section by Atiyah and I cannot accept, for example, that stolen goods finding a haven with a third or fourth purchaser would give title, yet on the argument for the plaintiff it appears they would. I say this against an argument before F me that it is one thing for the 'owner' of a chattel to maintain title against the purchaser for value without notice who had purchased direct from a fraudulent 'seller' who had no title, but it is quite a different thing for the owner to assert title against a purchaser for value without notice who has purchased, in turn, from a purchaser for value without notice. Counsel contended that, viewed in this G light, the policy of the section seems to indicate that when there is a chain of transactions as here, there must be a point at which the 'owner's' title is extinguished at which moment the most recent purchaser in the chain acquires an unassailable title. While I can appreciate the hardship that is demonstrated by finding against this argument and the difficulty that later purchasers in the chain are confronted with concerning making of fruitful inquiries, regrettably H it seems to me the principle . . . 'nemo dat quod non habet' is applicable."

In Brandon v. Leckie (1972) 29 D.L.R. (3d) 633 in the Alberta Supreme Court, Moore J. in his turn had before him for trial two actions in which two plaintiffs sought to recover caravans which had been stolen from them, but which had later been sold through a mercantile agent to the defendants who were each bona fide purchasers for value without notice of any defect in their sellers' titles. Section 27(2) of the Alberta Sale of Goods Act 1970 is in the same terms as section 25(1) of the English Act of 1979 and the defendants relied upon its literal construction in the same way as does the defendant before us. A

In his judgment on this point, Moore J. also referred to Professor Atiyah's comments which I have quoted and then later in his judgment said, at pp. 637-638:

"Section 27(2) of the Sale of Goods Act makes no reference to the rights of the true and lawful owner or for that matter to the rights of anyone other than the seller. Section 3(1) of the Factors Act states that the sale is 'as valid' as if the mercantile agent were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same. It does not remove any right accruing in the true owner, either by statement or by implication. It therefore follows that the section applies on the face only to rights between a buyer and a seller and not against the true owner. It simply does not seem logical that the Legislature of this Province, in its wisdom, would enact legislation, the effect of which would be to preclude a true owner, who has done no wrongful act, from attempting to regain and in act regaining a chattel stolen from him. Never at any time from the moment of the original theft of each motor home has title passed from the original owners. As counsel for the plaintiff argued—nemo dat quod non habet. Nobody can give good title to what he does not possess. . . . B C D

"George Young [the rogue in the case] never had title to give to Calgary Automotive and consequently neither [of the defendants] could receive good title from Calgary Automotive. The rule nemo dat quod non habet must prevail in the absence of overriding statutory provisions. One can paraphrase sections of statutes with magnificent results. However, in the instant case George Young had nothing to sell—thus the end of the paraphrasing. There is no need to distinguish 'seller' and 'owner' other than to say that Young never fell into either category as he could never sell something he did not have the right to sell and obviously he was never the owner of either motor home. Nor is there any need to comment on the fact that Calgary Automotive was admitted to be a mercantile agent at the outset of the trial. Calgary Automotive could not in any way, shape or form pass on good title." E F

For my part, I agree with Professor Atiyah's comment that the defendant's argument in the instant appeal is at first sight, and indeed on further consideration so contrary to everything one knows or has been taught about the law that it cannot be right. On the other hand I would prefer not to have to adopt any artificial construction of either section 25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 or the other statutory provisions with which we are concerned in this appeal. Although the drafting of the sections is not entirely clear, if the draftsman in 1889 used the word "owner" in section 9 of the Act of that year in error for the word "seller," I find it surprising that he repeated the error in 1893 and still more surprising that he repeated it again in 1979. G H

Ever mindful of Lord Halsbury L.C.'s warning in Leader v. Duffey (1888) 13 App.Cas. 294, 301, to which Sir Denys Buckley refers, nevertheless in my respectful opinion the resolution of the problem lies in large measure in adopting the approaches of Beattie J. in Elwin v.

A O'Regan and Maxwell [1971] N.Z.L.R. 1124 and of Moore J. in Brandon v. Leckie, 29 D.L.R. (3d) 633 and concentrating more on the earlier part of section 25 than on the latter—to which alone the argument for the defendant herein has in truth been addressed.

B By section 2(1) of the Act of 1979, “A contract of sale of goods is a contract by which the seller transfers or agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a money consideration, called the price.” By
 C section 2(4), the Act provides: “Where under a contract of sale the property in the goods is transferred from the seller to the buyer the contract is called a sale.” By section 61(1) of the Act, “‘property’ means the general property in goods, and not merely a special property.” Thus the essence of sale is the transfer of the ownership or general property in goods from a seller to a buyer for a price. By the same subsection,
 D “‘buyer’ means a person who buys or agrees to buy goods;” and a “seller” is similarly defined mutatis mutandis. Thus in my opinion the opening words of section 25(1), those which lay down the condition precedent for the consequences provided for by the later words of the section, only contemplate a transaction in which the general property in the relevant goods has been acquired or it has been agreed should be acquired. A transaction whereby a thief purports to sell goods to A, in which he purports to but cannot pass the general property in the goods to A because it is not vested in him, is not one which can bring section 25(1) into operation at all.

E Similarly where A, ex hypothesi having no property in the goods, purports to sell them on to B who receives them in good faith and without notice of the absence in A of any property in them, the transaction is not a “sale” within the definition in the Act, nor can A or B respectively properly be described as “seller” or “buyer.” Thus the condition precedent to the subsequent operation of the later part of section 25 has not been satisfied.

F The same result, or non-result, follows on any purported further sales from B to C, or C to D and so on. If the original transferor is a thief from the true owner, then he has never acquired property in the goods and no purported “sale” by him or by anyone to whom he may have purported to “sell” the goods can attract the consequences of section 9 of the Act of 1889 or section 25 of the Act of 1979.

G Where however a rogue buys a motor car from its true owner and sells it on, whether before or more particularly after the true owner has rescinded the contract between him and the rogue, there is at least for a time a “sale” in law and thus scope for the subsequent operation of the second half of section 25 on later transactions involving the car between innocent parties.

H If this is the correct approach to the construction of section 25, then there is no need to construe the word “owner” in the section in any other sense than its literal, ordinary meaning. However there is only scope for section 25 to operate at all where the general property in the goods passed at some stage, at least temporarily to a transferee from him.

In my opinion, therefore, the judge in this case reached the correct conclusion, although by a somewhat different route from the one I have followed. I would therefore dismiss this appeal.

CROOM-JOHNSON L.J. The agreed facts are that Miss Hopkin was the owner of a Ford car number DUH 635V which was stolen on 3 February 1983. On 23 September 1983 the thieves were convicted. The thieves sold it to a person called Lacey. Lacey then sold it to Roderick Thomas. On 7 February 1983 Mr. Thomas sold to Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd. for £2,100. On 14 March 1983 Autochoice sold it to Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd. for £2,350. On 17 March 1983 Mid-Glamorgan sold it to the defendant for £2,650. It is agreed that the defendant is completely honest. The plaintiff bought Miss Hopkin's interest for £2,750 and acquired her rights to the car. It wrote to the defendant asking for the car back. He did not return it, and was sued to judgment for £2,650 plus interest. The defendant now appeals.

The plaintiff says that once the car was stolen no subsequent purchaser acquired any title to the car because nemo dat quod non habet. It relies on section 21(1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979:

"Subject to this Act, where goods are sold by a person who is not their owner, and who does not sell them under the authority or with the consent of the owner, the buyer acquires no better title to the goods than the seller had, unless the owner of the goods is by his conduct precluded from denying the seller's authority to sell."

No question arises of any estoppel against the plaintiff or Miss Hopkin. Section 21(2) provides:

"Nothing in this Act affects—(a) the provisions of the Factors Acts or any enactment enabling the apparent owner of goods to dispose of them as if he were the true owner; . . ."

The defendant relies, as he did before the judge, on section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 which was included (with one immaterial omission) in the Sale of Goods Act 1893 as section 25(2). It has now been re-enacted as section 25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979. Since its interpretation requires consideration of other provisions of the Factors Act 1889, it is convenient to quote section 9, which is still in force. It deals with the position of a buyer who obtains possession:

"Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer, by that person or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof . . . to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner."

"Mercantile agent" is defined in section 1 of the Act of 1889:

"For the purposes of this Act—(1) The expression 'mercantile agent' shall mean a mercantile agent having in the customary course of his business as such agent authority either to sell goods, or to consign goods for the purpose of sale, or to buy goods, or to raise money on the security of goods . . ."

The powers of such a mercantile agent are set out in section 2(1):

"Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting

A in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same."

B By section 1(2) a person shall be deemed to be in possession of goods or of the documents of title where the goods or documents are in his actual custody or subject to his control.

C The defendant's submission is that section 9 gives him a good title to the car which defeats that of Miss Hopkin and therefore that of the plaintiff. This is because if one gives the words of the section their ordinary and natural meaning it means that Mid-Glamorgan bought the car from the seller Autochoice, that they obtained possession of it with the consent of Autochoice and delivered it to the defendant. The result is that the delivery to him had the same effect as if Mid-Glamorgan were a mercantile agent in possession of the car with the consent of the owner. "Owner" it is said means "true owner" whoever that may be, in this case Miss Hopkin. It is submitted that this process of reasoning D applies to everyone in the chain after the purchaser from the thief. It is submitted that Lacey, who bought from the thief, would not get a good title himself but would be able to give one to Thomas, who in turn gave one to Autochoice and so on down the line.

E Before the trial judge the plaintiff argued that in section 9 "owner" and "seller" are to be equated, an argument which the judge accepted. As a matter of construction that has great difficulties, because the statute could hardly be using, within one section, two different words to describe the same person. Before this court the argument was put in a different way, on the basis that "owner" is not referring to the "true owner" (Miss Hopkin) but to the owner of the mere possessory title which is being transferred in the particular transaction. The meaning of "owner" in section 9 has been the subject of much discussion by legal F writers. Professor Goode, in his Commercial Law, 2nd ed. (1982), p. 414 suggests that "owner" here means "relevant owner," which again means the seller.

G One difficulty in giving the word "owner" the suggested special meaning lies in the context in which it is found. The delivery of the goods has the same effect "as if" the deliverer were a mercantile agent as defined in section 1. Newtons of Wembley Ltd. v. Williams [1965] 1 Q.B. 560 requires that the notional mercantile agent can only exercise the powers given to a real one by section 2(1). This requires him to be in possession of the goods with the consent of the owner. "Possession" is given a wide definition in the Act. There is no definition of "owner," which must therefore be given its ordinary meaning.

H Section 9 comes into operation where someone has bought or agreed to buy goods. Buying and selling in a commercial context means the transfer of title, of ownership. Agreeing to buy or sell means a binding agreement to the same effect. On this interpretation, the section requires an effective transaction, even though it may later be avoided by one of the parties on sufficient grounds. At any rate, it must be a transaction capable of transferring the true title. If that is what "bought" means in the section it follows that both the seller and his buyer must have been parties to such a transaction. This does not mean that the "owner" is always the same person as the seller, although in many cases he will be. The seller is the person who consents to the buyer having the possession of the goods but the seller might be a duly authorised agent of the true owner. Nevertheless, the "owner" who is bound by the transaction is the true owner.

The proper approach where there is a chain of transactions is to start with the initial defect in the title, in this case the thief. Lacey, who bought from the thief, got no title. Nor could he give one. The situation was the same as in Butterworth v. Kingsway Motors [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1286 where a Miss Rudolph, who had hired the car, sold it on. It went through several further sales. None of the purchasers acquired a title until it so happened that Miss Rudolph belatedly completed her own hire-purchase transaction and obtained thereby a title which was transmitted down the line and "fed" the title of the later purchasers. But until that happened only the hire-purchase company were the true owners.

The first Factors Act was passed in 1823. Others were passed in 1825 and 1842. They were concerned with protecting innocent purchasers or pledgees of goods or documents of title where they had been "entrusted" by the owner to a mercantile agent. The Act of 1889 was both an amending and a consolidating Act. It substituted for the concept of entrusting that of obtaining possession with consent. The pre-1889 Acts were in 1899 declared to be in force in New South Wales. Section 9 of the Act of 1889 was later paralleled in the New South Wales' Sale of Goods Act 1923 as section 28(2), and section 2(1) of the Act of 1889 in almost identical language became section 5 of the Factors (Mercantile Agents) Act 1923 of New South Wales.

In Cook v. Rodgers (1946) 46 S.R.(N.S.W.) 229, a case in the Supreme Court of New South Wales, Roper J. had to consider claims to a car both by the true owner and by a possessor at the end of a chain of transactions which included a sale by the hirer under a hire-purchase agreement. The possessor relied on section 5 of the New South Wales Factors (Mercantile Agents) Act 1923. Roper J. referred to a number of English decisions on the pre-1889 Acts, where the matters at issue were whether the goods had been "entrusted" and whether the agent in question was a mercantile agent so as to come within the terms of the Acts. He observed that they were all cases where the "entrusting" arose from the acts of, or acts binding on, the true owner. He referred in particular to Van Casteel v. Booker (1848) 2 Ex. 691, 698 where Parke B. indicated in argument that to bring the transaction within the Factors Acts of 1825 and 1842 the entrusting must be by the true owner. He recognised that in section 2(1) of the Act of 1889 the wording now required that the mercantile agent should be in possession of the goods "with the consent of the owner," while in section 5 of the New South Wales' Factors (Mercantile Agents) Act 1923 the wording was "entrusted" with the possession, but he adopted the words of Channell J. in Oppenheimer v. Attenborough & Son [1907] 1 K.B. 510, 516, that there was no real difference between the two expressions. He decided that to obtain title from a mercantile agent the possession (in the English Act) and the entrusting with possession (in the New South Wales Act) required the possession to come from or be with the consent of the true owner of the goods.

Nevertheless, the wording in the new section 9 is different, and it would be right to consider its meaning afresh, and not to rely on that

A part of the approach of Roper J. For the reasons which I have already given, I conclude that the buying and the selling referred to in section 9 presuppose a valid transaction by or on behalf of the true owner at some stage.

B In the present case the judge followed Elwin v. O'Regan and Maxwell [1971] N.Z.L.R. 1124. The plaintiff bought a car from Maxwell. Maxwell had purchased it from a company which in turn had purchased it from a man called Nevin. Nevin had obtained it in New South Wales under a hire-purchase agreement and wrongfully sold it on. O'Regan had seized possession of the car on behalf of the true owners, the finance company. It was held that notwithstanding that there was a chain of purchasers for value without notice of any defect of title, the principle of nemo dat quod non habet applied, and the true owner could assert his right to the car. Reliance was placed by the plaintiff on section 27(2) of the New Zealand Sale of Goods Act 1908, which is identical to section 28(2) of the New South Wales' Sale of Goods Act 1923, section relied on in Cook v. Rodgers, 46 S.R. (N.S.W.) 229. They are both identical to section 9 of the Factors Act 1889. The conclusion to which Beattie J. came was that in the section "owner" means "seller," in reliance on a dictum of Scrutton L.J. in Marten v. Whale [1917] 2 K.B. 480, 486, where he equated the two.

D But Beattie J. also adopted a dictum of Pearson J. in Butterworth v. Kingsway Motors Ltd. [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1286, 1295:

E "The various purported sales all took place at times when Bowmaker Ltd. were still the owners of the car, so that all the purported sellers in this rather long chain had no title to it at the times when the . . . purported sales . . . were made."

Beattie J. appears to have adopted as an alternative finding that the "seller" in section 9 of the Act of 1889 must be someone who can give a title.

F The only other case in which this problem seems to have been decided is Brandon v. Leckie and Avco Corporation v. Borgal (1973) 29 D.L.R. (3d) 633, consolidated actions tried in the Alberta Supreme Court. These, like the present, were cases where the goods were stolen. In each case the thief, a man called Young, sold to a mercantile agent who in turn sold on to a bona fide purchaser. The question was whether the purchaser could rely on section 10(1) of the Alberta Factors Act 1970 which again is the same as section 9 of the Act of 1889. That section involved reading into it section 3(1) of the Alberta Factors Act, which was the equivalent of section 2(1) of the Act of 1889. Again the point was taken that "seller" means the same thing as "owner."

G The trial judge, Moore J., put the matter simply. For simplicity I am indicating in square brackets the English equivalent of the Alberta legislation. He said, at p. 637:

H "Section 27(2) of the Sale of Goods Act [section 9 of the Act of 1889] makes no reference to the rights of the true and lawful owner or for that matter to the rights of anyone other than the seller. Section 3(1) of the Factors Act [section 2(1)] states that the sale is 'as valid' as if the mercantile agent were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same. It does not remove any right accruing in the true owner, either by statement or by implication. It therefore follows that the section applies on the face only to rights between a buyer and a seller and not against the true owner."

After referring with approval to a decision of Judge Sargent of the British Columbia County Court in Bremmer v. Johnson [1946] 3 W.W.R. 39, he said, at p. 638:

"The rule nemo dat quod non habet must prevail in the absence of overriding statutory provisions. . . . in the instant case George Young had nothing to sell . . . There is no need to distinguish 'seller' and 'owner' other than to say that Young never fell into either category as he could never sell something he did not have the right to sell and obviously he was never the owner of either motor home. Nor is there any need to comment on the fact that Calgary Automotive [the purchasers from Young] was admitted to be a mercantile agent at the outset of the trial. Calgary Automotive could not in any way, shape or form pass on good title."

These cases are not directly in point with the present case on their facts, because there was no "seller" to Calgary Automotive who put them in possession of the motor homes. There was no equivalent to Roderick Thomas. But the principle is clear. Just as the thief could not give title to Lacey, so Lacey could not be a "seller" to Thomas, or Thomas a "seller" to Autochoice, or Autochoice to Mid-Glamorgan.

My conclusion is that section 9 of the Act of 1889 did not by a sidewind change the law as it had been up to that time. "Owner" in that section means the true owner, but the effect of the section is not to give title where the seller's own possession is derived from unlawful possession, as from a thief. I base this conclusion on the construction of sections 9 and 2(1) read together, on the history of the Factors Acts, and on the authorities such as they are. The dearth of case law on this point is only an example of the saying that the more self-evident a proposition is, the harder it is to find authority for it.

I would dismiss the appeal.

SIR DENYS BUCKLEY. When a court is required to interpret a statute its function is to discover the intention of the legislature in enacting the particular statutory provision under consideration. The material from which that intention must primarily be discovered is the language used in the particular provision, read in the context of the statute as a whole. If that language is clear and unequivocal, the court must interpret and give effect to the provision in the sense of that clear and unequivocal language, unless to do so would be incongruent with some other part of the statute, or produce an irrational result thus engendering uncertainty about the legislature's true intention. If authority is required in these respects, it is to be found in Leader v. Duffey (1888) 13 App.Cas. 294, 301, per Lord Halsbury L.C.; Attorney-General v. Milne [1914] A.C. 765, 771, per Viscount Haldane L.C.; Attorney-General for Canada v. Hallett & Carey Ltd. [1952] A.C. 427, 449, per Lord Radcliffe; Westminster Bank Ltd. v. Zang [1966] A.C. 182, 222, per Lord Reid, and many other authorities cited in the notes to paragraphs 856 and 857 in Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 44 (1987).

The question in the present case is whether the defendant can successfully assert that he has in the events which happened an indefeasible title as owner of the relevant motor car. The amount at stake is not great, but the question is one of general public interest.

The answer depends upon the true interpretation and effect of section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 and section 25 of the Sale of Goods

3 W.L.R. National Employers' Insurance Ltd. v. Jones (C.A.) Sir Denys Buckley

A Act 1979. Those sections are for present purposes in identical terms. I shall refer to section 9 only, but precisely similar considerations apply to section 25.

B For the sake of clarity and ease of reference I will set out the words used in the sections, omitting all words which can be regarded as surplusage in relation to the facts of the present case, and introducing letters to identify the persons referred to in the various parts of the sections. When so treated section 9 reads:

C "Where a person [B], having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller [A] possession of the goods, . . . the delivery or transfer, by that person [B], . . . of the goods, . . . under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof . . . to any person [C] receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller [A] in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer [B] were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods . . . with the consent of the owner."

D It will be observed that everything in that passage which follows the words "as if" sets up a fictitious hypothesis upon which the section is to operate. I will call this "the section 9 hypothesis." To understand the effect of it, one must then turn to section 2(1) of the Factors Act 1889 which provides:

E "Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods . . . any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same."

F This section clearly infers that a mercantile agent to whom it applies has not in fact full authority to make the disposition in question, for, if he were duly authorised, the section would be otiose. Section 2 consequently, when read in conjunction with section 9, introduces a further hypothetical element to the operation of section 9, viz. that the person who makes the disposition is doing so in the purported exercise of an authority with which he is not clothed.

G Having regard to the section 9 hypothesis, it is not necessary for the purpose of applying section 9 to establish that B was in fact a mercantile agent at the relevant time or (if in fact he was so) that he was acting as a mercantile agent in his relevant transaction with C: nor is it necessary to establish that he was in possession of the goods with the consent of the owner. These matters are to be assumed. Nor, in my judgment, is it necessary to consider who is the owner whose consent is to be assumed. In a case to which section 2 alone applies, the fact of the owner's consent must be established, in which connection the identity of the owner must be ascertained; but in a case in which section 2 is called into play only as a feature or consequence of the section 9 hypothesis, it is the quality of the assumed consent that is significant, not the identity of the person whose consent is to be assumed. In other words, the owner referred to in the section 9 hypothesis is as hypothetical as are the mercantile agent and the consent.

The hypothetical basis of the operation of section 9 was remarked on by Sellers and Pearson L.J.J. in Newtons of Wembley Ltd. v. Williams [1965] 1 Q.B. 560. As was recognised in that case, some difficulty arises in applying section 2 as part of the section 9 hypothesis because section 2 requires that the disposer of the goods shall have disposed of them when acting in the ordinary course of business as a mercantile agent. This is not a feature which is expressly required to be assumed as part of the section 9 hypothesis. In the Newtons of Wembley case the party answering to B in my exposition of section 9 had bought a car and obtained possession of it with the consent of A, the vendor. The vendor subsequently rescinded the contract, but the car was still in B's possession when he sold it at a later date to C. The sale by B to C took place in a kerbside market in Warren Street, London, but it was not suggested that this constituted a sale in market overt. B by then had no subsisting title to the car, but section 9 was held to enable C to resist a claim by A for the return of the car. B seems not in fact to have been selling as a mercantile agent, but this court treated the conditions of section 2 as satisfied upon the ground, as was expressed by Pearson L.J. at p. 579, either (i) that B's hypothetical business should be assumed to be that of a mercantile agent or (ii) that B upon his sale to C was doing something which would constitute acting in the ordinary course of business if he were a mercantile agent.

I must now consider the circumstances in which the section 9 hypothesis is to operate. These are set out in that part of section 9 which precedes the words "as if," the requirements of which must historically have been fully satisfied for the section to apply. These requirements can be analysed as follows: (a) B must have bought or agreed to buy the relevant goods from A; (b) B must have obtained possession of the goods with A's consent; (c) B must have delivered or transferred the goods to C; (d) that delivery or transfer must have been effected under a sale, pledge or other disposition of the goods; and (e) C must have received the goods in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right "of the original seller." It is, in my view, clear that the transaction between A and B must be a sale, or an agreement to sell, in which A is the seller and B the purchaser. It is also clear that the transaction between B and C must be a sale or a pledge or some other kind of disposition by B to C.

The objective of the section is clearly, in my judgment, to confer on C an unassailable title to the ownership of the goods notwithstanding some circumstance which would otherwise prevent him having such a title. The circumstance in the present case which might have that effect is the fact that the car was stolen from Miss Hopkin. The contention of the plaintiff is that the thief, having no title to the ownership of the car could pass no such title to Lacey, and that that disability continued through the chain of successive sub-purchasers, so that the defendant could acquire no title to the ownership of the car from Mid-Glamorgan Motors. This, it was submitted, is the consequence of the ancient maxim of the common law nemo dat quod non habet. The question for consideration appears to me to be whether section 9 on its true construction confers a statutory title to the ownership of the goods overriding the title of the original owner.

A Suppose that goods in the ownership of O are stolen by a thief, T. T acquires no legal right to either the ownership or possession of the goods. T, having the goods de facto in his possession or under his control, sells or agrees to sell them to X, or purports to do so. Having no title to the goods, T cannot pass any title in them to X, who accordingly acquires no title to them at common law. The transaction between T and X is not affected by section 9 because T has not bought or agreed to buy the goods, and so cannot be equated with B in my exposition of section 9; so X acquires no statutory title to the goods. So far I am entirely in agreement with this analysis. X obtains possession of the goods with T's consent and sells them to Y. At that point (if T, X and Y are to be equated with A, B and C in my exposition of section 9) the section will come into play, provided that Y has acted in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of "the original seller." In that case O would, in my judgment, be barred by the section from recovering the goods from Y, who would consequently become entitled to the ownership of the goods against all the world. The fact that T had stolen the goods from O must thereupon, in my judgment, cease to have any relevance to the ownership of the goods.

D Who then is to be understood to be referred to by the description "the original seller?" One cannot go back further than T, for O was not a seller. If T can be regarded as a seller, he is not, I apprehend, a seller who could assert a lien or other right in the goods because, having stolen them, he could not claim to have had any title to them or interest in them. I for my part think that the most acceptable interpretation of "the original seller" is to relate it to that party who answers to A in my exposition of section 9. That party is the first seller referred to in the section, that is to say, the earliest seller whose sale is relevant to the operation of the section.

E But, as in the present case, the goods may have been the subject of a considerable series of sub-sales before O attempts to recover them. I must consider how the section works in such a case.

F The list of persons through whom the possession of the car passed in the present case is Miss Hopkin—the thieves—Lacey—Thomas—Autochoice—Mid-Glamorgan Motors—the defendant. We are without information about the transfers from the thieves to Lacey and from Lacey to Thomas. Accordingly none of the requirements of section 9 can be shown to be satisfied by anyone before Autochoice. We do know that Autochoice bought the car from Thomas in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right existing in any other person, and obtained possession of it with Thomas's consent. Autochoice consequently, in my view, fulfills the requirements relating to party B in section 9. We also know that Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd. bought the car from Autochoice in good faith and without any such notice, and obtained possession of it with the consent of Autochoice. Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd. consequently, in my view, fulfils the requirements relating to party G C in section 9. Where, as in this case, there are several successive possessors in the chain, the section, in my judgment, only requires consideration of the circumstances relating to the last three members of the chain, the last of whom will be the party invoking the protection of the section, that is to say in the present case the defendant. It follows in my judgment that, unless the presence of the thieves in the chain of successive possession somehow excludes the operation of the section, the plaintiff cannot succeed in this action.

Counsel for the plaintiff have contended that section 9 can confer upon the last person in the chain (i.e. the party from whom the true owner seeks to recover the goods) no better title than that of the "original seller," who in the present case, he says, was either the thieves, or some subsequent possessor of the goods who could have no better title than the thieves. They submitted that, where the goods have been stolen, the section has no effect upon the title of the true owner from whom they have been stolen. In this respect they submitted that section 9 only affects the rights inter se of the parties whom I have called A, B and C and has no effect upon the title of the original true owner.

Counsel for the defendant relied upon a literal construction of section 9. With deference to those who think otherwise, I consider that the language of section 9 is clear and unequivocal, free from ambiguity and uncertainty. It is, in my opinion, susceptible of only one interpretation. The difficulty involved in applying the language of section 2 to the section 9 hypothesis is, in my view, disposed of, so far as this court is concerned, by the decision in Newtons of Wembley Ltd. v. Williams [1965] 1 Q.B. 560. Indeed the present case is, I think, a stronger case than that because, as is common ground, Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd. does carry on a business of selling cars as a mercantile agent and its sale to the defendant was carried out at its business premises and in just such a manner as a sale in the course of its business as mercantile agents would have been.

Those who take the contrary view, and hold that section 9 should be considered in some sense other than what its language appears literally to say, seem to me, with great deference, to fall into the error against which Lord Halsbury L.C. gave a warning in Leader v. Duffey, 13 App.Cas. 294, 301:

"But it appears to me to be arguing in a vicious circle to begin by assuming an intention apart from the language of the instrument itself, and having made that fallacious assumption to bend the language in favour of the assumption so made."

I do not find anything elsewhere in the Factors Act 1889 which conflicts with section 9 construed in its literal sense. Nor, in my view, does a literal construction of section 9 produce an unreasonable or unsensible result. The Factors Act 1889 was the latest of a series of Acts of Parliament for the protection of innocent purchasers which at each stage increased the amount of protection afforded. The section as I would construe it confers no protection upon a purchaser from a thief. Such a purchaser might by diligent inquiry have been able to discover that his vendor was a thief. The section, so construed, would, however, enable that purchaser to confer on an innocent purchaser from him an unassailable title. The latter purchaser would be unlikely to be aware of any circumstances that would put him on inquiry whether his vendor's vendor had stolen the goods. In such a case it would not, in my view, be at all irrational that the legislature should consider that it would be right to let the loss resulting from the theft rest where it falls upon the original owner, who would, as was pointed out in argument, very probably be insured, rather than upon the innocent purchaser.

May L.J. has placed reliance upon the definition of "a contract of sale of goods" contained in section 2(1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 and upon sections 2(4) and 61(1) of the same Act. With very great

Sir Denys Buckley

A diffidence, I do not think that a solution can be found by this route. When a thief contracts to sell stolen property, the fact that he cannot transmit a good title in that property to the purchaser does not, as I understand the law, mean that he has not contracted to sell it. He has contracted to sell it, and can be made liable in damages if and when the purchaser suffers damage by reason of the thief's breach of contract by selling without a good title. In the present case, on the assumed facts, B the thieves, in my view, agreed to sell and sold the car to Lacey within the meaning of section 9, and each successive sub-purchaser did the same. Moreover, in my opinion, by handing over the car to Lacey the thieves conferred on him a possessory title good against the thieves and indeed everyone except the true owner. So in my respectful opinion, C each of the transactions in the chain in the present case was a contract to sell the car resulting in a sale of the car, notwithstanding any defect there may have been in the vendor's capacity to transmit a good title to it. The first requirement of section 9 is thus satisfied.

D It is certainly surprising that the argument in favour of a literal construction of section 9 which has been presented in the present case by the defendant does not seem to have been presented in any reported case except to some extent in Newtons of Wembley Ltd. v. Williams [1965] 1 Q.B. 560. We have been referred to a considerable number of English authorities. I hope I shall not be thought discourteous to counsel's arguments if I do not discuss these cases in detail. Some were decisions on section 2 of the Factors Act 1889 and were not concerned with section 9. I do not find these of assistance in construing section 9.

E Two Commonwealth cases were referred to in which arguments, which were evidently on similar lines to the defendant's argument in the instant case, were presented and rejected in each case. Each of those cases was concerned with statutory provisions in identical terms with sections 2(1) and 9 of the Factors Act 1889. Those decisions, although not binding on us, are worthy of great respect. Brandon v. Leckie, 29 D.L.R. (3d.) 633 related to stolen vehicles which were sold F by the thief to a concern called Calgary Automotive Brokerage Ltd. (a mercantile agent) by whom the vehicles were sold to members of the public. Moore J. of the Alberta Supreme Court took the view that the sections with which he was concerned made no reference to the rights of the true and lawful owners from whom the vehicles had been stolen, nor to the rights of anyone other than the seller, and did not remove any rights of the true owners. He held that the rule nemo dat quod non G habet must prevail in the absence of overriding statutory provisions; that the thief could not sell something he did not have the right to sell; and that the mercantile agent could not pass on a good title. With respect to the judge, I consider that, for reasons which I have already indicated, section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 is a statutory provision which is designed to override the nemo dat principle and effectively does so, not H by expressly destroying the rights of the true and lawful owner, but by conferring on the purchasers from the hypothetical mercantile agent a statutory title which is unassailable by that owner.

Elwin v. O'Regan and Maxwell [1971] N.Z.L.R. 1124 is concerned with a car which was initially the subject matter of a hire-purchase agreement. The hire-purchaser sold the car, while there were still instalments unpaid, to Broadlands Finance Ltd., who sold it to the defendant Maxwell, who sold it to the plaintiff. The defendant O'Regan was an agent of the true owners of the car, that is to say the hire-purchase company, who had repossessed the car. Beattie J. in the New Zealand Supreme Court held with regret that the principle nemo dat quod non habet applied. He consequently upheld the claim of the hire-purchase company. In the course of his judgment the judge referred to the decision of Pearson J. in Butterworth v. Kingsway Motors [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1286, which was also a case of a car subject to a hire-purchase agreement. In that case also the hire-purchaser purported to sell the car while there were still instalments unpaid, and there were three further sub-sales. Pearson J. said, at p. 1295:

"The next question is as to the present ownership of the car. The various purported sales all took place at times when Bowmaker Ltd. [the hire-purchase company] were still the owners of the car, so that all the purported sellers in this rather long chain had no title to it at the times when the sales, or purported sales, were made; But on or about 25 July 1952, Miss Rudolph [the hire-purchaser] acquired a good title from Bowmaker Ltd. or, at any rate, made a payment to Bowmaker Ltd. which extinguished their title and induced them to relinquish any claim which they had to the car. I think that the right view is that Miss Rudolph did acquire the title as between her and Bowmaker Ltd., but I further hold on authority that the title so acquired went to feed the previously defective titles of the subsequent buyers and enured to their benefit."

It is perfectly clear that the judge there assumed that section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 had not conferred a good title to the car upon any of the sub-purchasers, but it was unnecessary for him to decide that question or even to give it close consideration, in view of the effect of the payment off of the arrears under the hire-purchase agreement.

In my judgment, once the factual requirements of section 9 of the Factors Act 1889 have been satisfied, the operation of this section is not to strike from the hand of the original true owner of the goods his title of ownership, but to place in the hand of him who has acquired those goods from the notional mercantile agent an impregnable shield which makes it impossible thenceforth for the original true owner to assert his original title against him who has the goods.

For these reasons I for my part would allow this appeal.

The employee was a part-time teacher who, since 1969, had taught concurrently in three departments at the employers' colleges of further education, her work in each department being governed by a series of fixed term contracts following each other at intervals of varying length. In June 1983 she was informed by her employers that she would not be offered a contract for the autumn term 1983 and she made a complaint of unfair dismissal or redundancy. A preliminary issue arose as to whether the employee had a sufficient period of continuous employment under the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 to bring her complaint. The employee accepted that no one contract met either the requirements of paragraph 4 (as modified by paragraph 6) of Schedule 13 to the Act¹ as to the normal weekly requirement of hours to be worked or the requirements of the Act as to the minimum periods of 12 months' continuous employment for unfair dismissal or two years for redundancy; but submitted that the separate concurrent contracts should be looked at together and their hours of work aggregated, and that sequentially the contracts should be amalgamated to form an unbroken period of employment. The industrial tribunal held that the whole of the employee's work pattern during her employment in the colleges had to be taken into account and that the periods between terms and thus between contracts when she did not work for the employers, were not sufficient to break the continuity of her employment, and paragraph 9(1)(b) of the Schedule operated to preserve that continuity. The tribunal therefore found that she had been continuously employed for a period of five years or more; that during all that time she had been governed by contracts of employment which normally involved employment for eight hours or more per week; and that, accordingly, she was entitled to have her complaint considered. The appeal tribunal allowed an appeal by the employers. On appeal by the employee, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and remitted the matter to the industrial tribunal.

On appeal by the employers:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that in calculating the number of hours of employment per week normally involved in a contract of employment for the purposes of paragraphs 4 and 6 of Schedule 13 to the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 regard could only be had to the particular contract of employment in relation to which the complaint of unfair dismissal or redundancy had been made, and that it was impermissible to aggregate the hours worked per week under separate concurrent contracts with the same employer since the total absence of any reference to aggregation or guidance on how it was to be carried out was the clearest indication that aggregation was not contemplated by the Act (post, pp. 929A, 931C–F, H—932A, 938D, 939E–F, 942A).

Per curiam. Even if aggregation were permissible under paragraphs 4 and 6 of Schedule 13, there was no valid claim in the present case since paragraph 9(1)(b) in the circumstances did not avail the employee (post, pp. 940H—941A).

3 W.L.R.

Surrey C.C. v. Lewis (H.L.(E.))

A Their Lordships took time for consideration.

15 October. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches to be delivered by my noble and learned friends Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone and Lord Ackner. I agree with them both and for the reasons they give I would allow the appeal.

B

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST. MARYLEBONE. My Lords, by a series of statutes now consolidated in the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, as subsequently amended, Parliament conferred two important new rights on employees against their employers which arise independently of any rights or obligations contained in their contracts of employment.

C

The first is a right not to be unfairly dismissed and if unfairly dismissed to receive an award either of reinstatement or compensation: sections 54 and 67 to 69. The second gives a right to an employee to receive redundancy payments in case of dismissal on the grounds of redundancy: section 81. By section 55 of the Act of 1978 dismissal includes termination without renewal of a fixed term contract of employment. Both rights are enforceable by originating application through the industrial tribunal network with appeal (on a question of law only) to the Employment Appeal Tribunal and thence to the Court of Appeal with a further appeal by leave to your Lordships' House. The present proceedings have run the whole course.

D

Like most such rights which have marked the move from contract to status characterising so much modern social legislation, these rights arise independently of the rights and obligations arising under the terms of the relevant contract of employment, and, by section 140, may not be excluded or abridged by anything in the contract which is inconsistent with their exercise.

E

In order to qualify for either right the employee must be able to show a period of "continuous employment" of one year (section 64 as amended) in the case of the right not to be unfairly dismissed and of two years in the case of the right to receive redundancy payments. Subject to a presumption in favour of continuity section 151 and Schedule 13, paragraph 1(3) the qualifying periods of one year and two years (measured as calendar years or months) are computed week by week of weeks that "count" in accordance with the somewhat elaborate provisions of Schedule 13 to the Act: section 151 and Schedule 13. In order to show that he has qualified, and subject to the presumption of continuity referred to above, the employee must establish (a) that the employment is "of a kind counting towards a period of continuous employment" and (b) that the periods, consecutive or otherwise but calculated week by week, are to be treated as "forming a single period of continuous employment:" section 151 and Schedule 13, paragraph 4. Only those weeks "during the whole or part of which the employee's relations with the employer are governed by a contract of employment which normally involves employment for 16 hours or more" (eight hours in the case where the period of continuous employment has subsisted for five years) "count" for the purpose of computing the period of continuous employment: Schedule 13, paragraphs 4, 6. Subject to special provisions applying, inter alia, to absence from work on account of a "temporary cessation of work" (Schedule 13, paragraph 9(1)(b)) a break of a single whole week in the weeks which "count" in estimating the period of continuous employment may deprive the employee of his rights under section 54 and section 84: section 64(1).

In the present appeal the employee (respondent) was employed by the employer (appellant) more or less continuously (as to which see later) from January 1969 to June 1983, a period of about 14 years, when her last employment (a fixed term) terminated in circumstances which amount to "dismissal" for the purposes of section 55. In fact it was a contractual period for a fixed term which was not renewed as the result of a change of policy on the part of the employer. By her originating application in September 1983 the respondent claimed both compensation under section 54 and section 64 in respect of alleged unfair dismissal and redundancy payments under section 84. She was, however, immediately met by a preliminary objection on the part of her employer (respondent to the application but appellant in this appeal) that she could not establish the relevant qualifying periods respectively of one and two years of continuous employment. Since the relevant facts are not in dispute there is no room here for the presumption of continuity. The question is one of the legal implication of admitted facts, and this preliminary objection on the part of the appellant constitutes the sole matter of debate in this appeal. The respondent won before the industrial tribunal, lost before the Employment Appeal Tribunal, won before the Court of Appeal, and the matter now falls to be determined by your Lordships. In passing, the process which began in 1983 and is still current in 1987 may seem a somewhat lengthy one in the light of the fact that the system designed by Parliament for the decision of such matters was intended to be speedy, inexpensive, informal, and lacking in complexity.

The respondent is a teacher of photography. Throughout her periods of engagement she was employed by the appellant on a series of fixed term and part time contracts at one or more of their educational establishments, situated respectively at Guildford, Farnham, and Epsom and latterly only at Epsom and Farnham. At the relevant time the contracts were by the term, or by the course at the relevant institution and department, and in consequence were intermitted amongst other interruptions by the usual vacations. Nothing would turn on these periods of intermission if the employee were entitled to add each terminal fixed term contract to its predecessors or successors for the purposes of the calculation: see Ford v. Warwickshire County Council [1983] 2 A.C. 71. But each was a separate contract. None of the "contracts" (if that be the right description for some fairly imprecise documents) was in any way colourable, improper, or designed in any way to defeat the purposes of the Act of 1978 properly construed; either by finding of the industrial tribunal (which is unchallengeable) or by concession or admission by or on behalf of the respondent (which after hearing argument on the point I believe to have been binding, as was the ultimate view formed by the Court of Appeal) the concurrent contracts were separate from and independent of one another, and though in practice operated so that the obligations under one did not conflict with the obligations under any other in time or place, did not form part of a single composite whole. Had this not been the case and had there been supporting evidence to enable one to conclude that, although expressed in different documents, there was in existence a single implied contract of service or a composite contract contained in

3 W.L.R.

Surrey C.C. v. Lewis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Hailsham
of St. Marylebone

A the several documents, I might very well have taken a contrary view to that which I am now constrained to express.

The respondent's difficulty resides in the fact that she can only establish the requisite periods of continuous employment whether for deciding that "the whole or part of the employee's relations with the employer was governed by a contract of employment which normally involved employment for 16 hours or more weekly" (Schedule 13, paragraph 4) or for the purpose of considering whether "the periods" (consecutive or otherwise) are to be treated as forming a single period of continuous employment if she is permitted to add both the hours and periods of work actually done under one engagement respectively to the hours and periods of work actually performed under one or more of the others. In my opinion neither computation will avail the respondent if it is once established that the engagements are quite separate and distinct from one another, and do not, in one way or another, form a part of a single composite whole—entitling the employee to add one to the other for both purposes. I give full weight to the provisions of section 6 of the Interpretation Act 1978 in which, unless the contrary intention is implied, the singular embraces the plural and vice versa in the language of a statute. But in my view, once it is established that the "contracts" involved were distinct and separate arrangements and did not form part of a single composite relationship. I do not believe that the Interpretation Act can avail the respondent. The whole structure of the Employment Protection Act 1978 read with Schedule 13 is built on the supposition that to create the qualifying period there must be a single relationship contained in a single contractual complex, whether oral, in writing, or implied, and whether or not contained in a single document or a number of documents, and there is no room therefore for importing into paragraph 4 of Schedule 13 any such phrase as would give the meaning "a contract or contracts of employment which normally, whether singly or collectively involve employment for 16 hours." In my view the whole structure of the Act precludes this interpretation and accordingly neither the Interpretation Act 1978 nor the ambivalence, in English, of the indefinite article, to which I referred in the argument before your Lordships, is available to the respondent. It must follow that the appeal must be allowed and the judgment of the Employment Appeal Tribunal restored.

I feel bound to add that I arrive at this conclusion after considerable hesitation and not a little regret. After 14 years of what in the ordinary course might have been regarded as continuous service the respondent's contracts were allowed to lapse without imputed fault on her part and she is entitled to nothing either by her contracts or by virtue of the statute. The best that can be said is that, without the statute, the legal result would have been the same.

Since preparing the above I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, Lord Ackner. Although I have approached the matter from a slightly different angle, I am happy to say that I agree with his more detailed analysis of the facts and chain of reasoning, which I believe to be wholly compatible with my own conclusions.

LORD ROSKILL. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches delivered by my noble and learned friends Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone and Lord Ackner. I agree that the appeal should be allowed for the reasons which they have given.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, this appeal raises two points of construction of certain provisions of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 as amended. The questions are very narrow and arise from a decision on a preliminary issue on a set of facts, either as found by the industrial tribunal or admitted by Mrs. Lewis, the respondent. These facts, to which I will make more detailed reference hereafter, seem to me, and I believe to your Lordships, somewhat surprising if not unreal. I much doubt whether they are likely to be repeated again in a substantially similar form.

The facts

Mrs. Lewis was first employed by the Surrey County Council, the respondents, in January 1969 to teach photography (which included graphics), on a part-time basis at the Guildford School of Art. For the first year or two, the contract was a yearly one covering the academic year but thereafter she was employed by a series of consecutive contracts each being for the duration of a term.

In 1975 the Guildford School amalgamated with the Farnham College of Further Education to become the West Surrey College of Art and Design. Thereafter Mrs. Lewis worked at Farnham. In 1980 the "foundation" element of the course, that is the introductory part, which takes place only in the spring term, was separated out and was no longer taught by her in the Department of Audio Visual Studies of the Farnham College but was taught in their Foundation Department. Thereafter she was provided with separate contracts for each of those two departments. In the autumn of 1981 the graphics part of her teaching was transferred to the Epsom College of Further Education and she was provided with further consecutive contracts for a term's duration for that part of her work.

Thus, from the autumn 1981 onwards Mrs. Lewis's engagement at each department was regulated by three separate series of consecutive contracts. Each single contract was confined to the duties to be performed at the work place of the particular department involved. Each single contract was evidenced by a separate letter of engagement, introducing the new contract, to apply to each college term at the relevant department. It was a feature common to all the contracts that the weekly work requirement in terms of hours was not specified in the letter of agreement. All such letters spoke only of a global number of hours, the totality of which had to be worked during that particular college term within the department in question. The allocation of those contractual hours to particular weeks was left for the individual department to arrange, and this, no doubt, it did according to the programme which met the needs of each of the departments.

The particular points I would wish to stress as showing the very restricted nature of the facts of Mrs. Lewis's case are:

1. It might well have been argued before the industrial tribunal and the Employment Appeal Tribunal, but it was not, that this division of Mrs. Lewis's activities between the two departments of the Farnham College (the Audio Visual Department and the Foundation Department) and the one department in the Epsom College (the Graphics Department) and the issue of separate contracts in respect of each department, was

A occasioned solely by organisational or budgetary reasons. Accordingly, so it might have been argued, the reality of the relationship between Mrs. Lewis and the county council was that of an employee and employer under a single series of consecutive contracts, each single contract in the series embracing all the work to be performed by Mrs. Lewis under one contract at the county council's three different departments of further education in any one term. This argument could B have been advanced without any attack on the bona fides of the county council.

2. It was, however, common ground at the hearing before the industrial tribunal and the Employment Appeal Tribunal, that the separate and distinct contracts which I have described, under which over the years Mrs. Lewis worked, were quite genuine independent contracts.
C In neither tribunal was it sought to contend that the numerous contracts which governed Mrs. Lewis's engagement represented a mere facade designed to deprive her of the protection rights to which she would have been entitled, had her whole engagement been incorporated in a single contract of employment. On 14 June 1983 Mrs. Lewis was informed by the clerk to the governors of the West Surrey College of Art and Design that the college did not intend to offer her a part-time teaching contract
D for the next term, adding "we may be offering you contracts on a block basis for specific topics, but it is very unlikely that we shall be able to offer you regular, termly part-time contracts as in the past." Mrs. Lewis treated that as a notice entitling her to make an application for compensation for unfair dismissal/redundancy and accordingly made the appropriate application to the industrial tribunal. The county council in their answer to this application made the following allegations. (i) Mrs.
E Lewis had been employed under a series of termly fixed-term contracts with different further education colleges in the county since 17 March 1969. (ii) The employment in respect of which her originating application had been submitted was at West Surrey College of Art and Design ("W.S.C.A.D."), Farnham under two separate contracts of employment in the summer of 1983, the latter of which ended on 14 June, and also at F Epsom School of Art and Design in the spring term 1983 which ended on 25 February. It was assumed that the claim related only to the employment at W.S.C.A.D.

3. Mrs. Lewis was employed by W.S.C.A.D. as a photography lecturer (Grade A) in the Audio Visual Studies Department under a fixed-term contract during the summer term 1983 working normally six
G hours per week, usually one day per week, starting on 27 April and ending on 14 June. Separately, she worked in the Foundation Studies Department as a casual photography lecturer (Grade B) working normally for six hours per week between 20 April and 31 May. Neither employment was renewed when it ceased.

4. Mrs. Lewis had not therefore completed one year's continuous service of 16 hours or more per week necessary to establish a right to the remedies for unfair dismissal. Additionally, she was not employed
H under a contract of employment normally involving employment for eight or more hours per week which would similarly be required, if continuous service had lasted for five or more years.

The issue

The question in this appeal is whether at the date of termination of her employment Mrs. Lewis had been continuously employed by the county council for long enough to qualify for the statutory right to receive a redundancy payment and/or to be protected against unfair dismissal. The answer to this question depends initially upon whether the hours worked by Mrs. Lewis under these distinct and separate concurrent contracts as they were so held to be, can be aggregated for the purpose of determining whether, in a given week, she was employed under a contract which normally involved the minimum hours specified in the Act. It was common ground that during the period of five years immediately prior to the termination of her employment fewer than eight hours teaching per week were normally involved under her contracts taken separately, but more than eight hours work taken jointly.

If such aggregation is permissible the further question arises, namely, whether an interval between these separate contracts, as opposed to the interval between the successor and predecessor contract in the same series, breaks the continuity of employment.

The relevant statutory provisions

Unfair dismissal is dealt with in Part V of the Act. The basic provisions are contained in section 54 which provides that "In every employment to which this section applies every employee shall have the right not to be unfairly dismissed by his employer." "Employee" is defined by section 153(1) as meaning "an individual who has entered into or works under (or, where the employment has ceased, worked under) a contract of employment." In the same section "contract of employment" is defined as "a contract of service or apprenticeship, whether express or implied, and (if it is express) whether it is oral or in writing." Under section 55(2)(b) of the Act, an employee shall be treated as dismissed where her contract of employment is for a fixed term which expires without being renewed by her employer. However, by section 64(1)(a) the right not to be unfairly dismissed is excluded unless at the time of dismissal the employee has been continuously employed for not less than one year and the employee may not claim a redundancy payment unless at that time she has been continuously employed for at least two years: section 81(1) and (4). The computation of periods of continuous employment is the subject matter of section 151 which provides in the first subsection that references in any provision of the Act to a period of continuous employment are, except where provision is expressly made to the contrary, to a period computed in accordance with the provisions of the section and Schedule 13.

Schedule 13 lies at the heart of the problem with which your Lordships are concerned. Paragraph 1(1) as amended by paragraph 7(2) of Schedule 2 to the Employment Act 1982 provides that a week which does not count under the provisions of paragraphs 3 to 12 breaks the continuity of the period of employment, except as otherwise provided. The exceptions have no relevance to this case. Paragraph 1(3) provides that a person's employment during any period shall, unless the contrary is shown be presumed to have been continuous. Paragraph 3 deals with normal working weeks and provides that "Any week in which the employee is employed for 16 hours or more shall count in computing a period of employment." Apart from this presumption of continuity, in order to decide whether an employee has been continuously employed for the requisite periods, the vital paragraphs of the Schedule are paragraphs 4, 6 and 9 and it is convenient to set these out in full:

A “4. Any week during the whole or part of which the employee’s relations with the employer are governed by a contract of employment which normally involves employment for 16 hours or more weekly shall count in computing a period of employment.”

B “6(1) An employee whose relations with his employer are governed, or have been from time to time governed, by a contract of employment which normally involves employment for eight hours or more, but less than 16 hours, weekly shall nevertheless, if he satisfies the condition referred to in sub-paragraph (2), be treated for the purposes of this Schedule (apart from this paragraph) as if his contract normally involved employment for 16 hours or more weekly, and had at all times at which there was a contract during the period of employment of five years or more referred to in sub-paragraph (2) normally involved employment for 16 hours or more weekly. (2) Sub-paragraph (1) shall apply if the employee, on the date by reference to which the length of any period of employment falls to be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of this Schedule, has been continuously employed within the meaning of sub-paragraph (3) for a period of five years or more. (3) In computing for the purposes of sub-paragraph (2) an employee’s period of employment, the provisions of this Schedule (apart from this paragraph) shall apply but as if, in paragraphs, 3 and 4, for the words ‘16 hours’ wherever they occur, there were substituted the words ‘eight hours.’”

E “9(1) If in any week the employee is, for the whole or part of the week—(a) incapable of work in consequence of sickness or injury, or (b) absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work, or (c) absent from work in circumstances such that, by arrangement or custom, he is regarded as continuing in the employment of his employer for all or any purposes, or (d) absent from work wholly or partly because of pregnancy or confinement, that week shall, notwithstanding that it does not fall under paragraph 3, 4 or 5, count as a period of employment. (2) Not more than 26 weeks shall count under paragraph (a) or, subject to paragraph 10, under paragraph (d) of sub-paragraph (1) between any periods falling under paragraph 3, 4 or 5.” (Emphasis added.)

The matter for construction

G 1. The question whether the hours worked by Mrs. Lewis under her distinct and separate concurrent contracts can be aggregated for the purpose of determining whether, in a given week, she was employed under a contract which qualifies her to claim that she has been unfairly dismissed or to claim redundancy payments depends upon the proper construction of the words “a contract of employment which normally involves . . .” in paragraphs 4 and 6 of Schedule 13.

H 2. The question whether an interval between these separate contracts, as opposed to an interval between the successor and predecessor contract in the same series, breaks the continuity of employment depends upon the proper interpretation of the words “a temporary cessation of work” in paragraph 9(1)(b) of Schedule 13.

The first question

The industrial tribunal approached the matter on the basis that the whole of Mrs. Lewis’s work pattern, during her entire employment by the county council must be taken into account. Having considered the evidence that in some weeks in the last two years she had worked for less than eight hours they said:

“There is no doubt but that, looking back at the applicant’s employment as a whole, she normally worked for more than eight hours a week and often for more than sixteen, and we find that that was her normal pattern of work . . . the use of the word ‘normally’ in Schedule 13 allows for the possibility that an employee may not always work for the requisite number of hours, and we are satisfied that the weeks in which the applicant fell short do not, when compared with much more numerous weeks in which she worked for more than eight hours, break the continuity of her employment . . . all the applicant’s contracts of employment envisage the possibility of at least eight hours work during the weeks when the courses for which she was responsible were continuous . . .”

The Employment Appeal Tribunal concluded that the industrial tribunal fell into the error of simply calculating the hours worked per week and striking an average as opposed to the process of inferential analysis of the normal contractual working week. It was common ground before your Lordships that to equate hours actually worked with the normal work requirement and merely striking an average of hours worked would be an error.

Before the Employment Appeal Tribunal it was argued on behalf of Mrs. Lewis that industrial good sense and realism required paragraph 4 to be applied in such a way that the weekly hours of work found by the industrial tribunal to be involved normally under one contract should be added to the equivalent hours found in relation to another concurrent contract. It was submitted that this aggregation was not only required by general considerations of fairness but was permitted by a proper interpretation of the legislation and by the terms of paragraph 4 of Schedule 13 in particular. It was submitted that Parliament must advisedly have made use of the indefinite article and deliberately avoided a reference to any specific contract of employment as being material for consideration. However, the Employment Appeal Tribunal in a carefully reasoned judgment given by Waite J. [1986] I.C.R. 404, were unable to accept this submission. Waite J. said, at p. 413:

“The statutory code defining the requirements of continuity of employment, although it is undoubtedly complex and elaborate in its detail, appears to us to be clear and straightforward in its general terms. It is designed to place a defined limit on the otherwise unqualified right given to any employee to claim that his dismissal has been unfair or to make the corresponding claim in redundancy. At the heart of that right lies loss of employment under the particular contract of employment in relation to which the complaint of termination is made. The whole code is geared to a consideration of that particular contract. We can find no warrant for putting a gloss on the language used by Parliament which would justify any industrial tribunal in taking into account, when calculating the normal hours of work requirement for the purposes of paragraph 4 of Schedule 13 to the Act of 1978, hours worked or required to be worked under some other contract whether or not such other contract involves the same employer.”

3 W.L.R.

Surrey C.C. v. Lewis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A In the Court of Appeal [1987] I.C.R. 232, where Mr. Sedley appeared in this appeal for the first time, his main argument was based on section 6 of the Interpretation Act 1978 which provides: "In any Act, unless the contrary intention appears . . . (c) words in the singular include the plural . . ." He submitted that applying this to section 153 of the Act, "employment means employment under a contract or contracts of employment" and the same phraseology can be read into paragraphs B 4 and 6 of Schedule 13. Thus, the question is, so he submitted, was the employee an employee under contracts of employment which at any one time normally involved employment for eight hours or more? This submission raises two separate questions:

C 1. Does it appear from the Act that there is an intention that section 6(c) of the Interpretation Act 1978 should not apply? and

2. Even if section 6(c) of the Interpretation Act 1978 is to apply would that solve Mrs. Lewis's problem?

D The Court of Appeal were satisfied that the contrary intention, negating the provisions of section 6(c) of the Interpretation Act 1978 did not appear in the Act. Glidewell L.J., in giving the leading judgment, recognised that in relation to some sections of the Act, the reference to an individual contract means employment under a single contract. He referred specifically to section 54(1) where the words are "In every employment" and section 64 where the words are "dismissal of an employee from any employment . . ." and he accepted that the use of the word "any" indicated a contrary intention to the word being used in the plural. Moreover he accepted that the phrase "the period of employment" in paragraph 1(1) of Schedule 13 could most probably only be read in the singular. Nevertheless, he was of the view that the phraseology of paragraphs 4 and 6 of Schedule 13 did not disclose an intention that the phrase "a contract of employment" should be read only in the singular and not in the plural. Purchas L.J. in expressing his agreement with the conclusion of Glidewell L.J. appeared to indicate F that there is an area in which the industrial tribunal has a discretion in deciding whether or not to aggregate hours worked under separate concurrent contracts for the purpose of satisfying the minimum hours requirement of Schedule 13. He said, at p. 244:

G "I wish to emphasise that the circumstances in which an employee may have more than one contract with an employer will vary widely from case to case. In considering other contracts of employment in relation to the particular employment in respect of the termination of which relief is being sought under the Act for the purposes of paragraphs 4, 6 and 9 of Schedule 13, the industrial tribunal will have to decide whether or not any such collateral contract forms part of the relevant relationship for the purpose of the contract under consideration. There may well be cases, particularly in the H case of vertical aggregation of employment for the purpose of paragraph 9, where separate and unconnected contracts of employment may have been made between the same employer and employee, which the industrial tribunal may consider to be irrelevant. Such considerations must depend upon the facts of each case and will be essentially matters falling within the province of the industrial tribunal. Bearing in mind the expertise enjoyed by the industrial tribunal and their access to the details of each contract of employment, decisions as to the relevance of, and, if relevant, the true effect of, other and collateral contracts between the same employee and employer can be safely left to the tribunal.”

Purchas L.J. gave no clue as to the principles upon which this discretion should be exercised, and certainly no guidance is to be found in the Act. Indeed, Mr. Sedley did not contend for such a discretion, accepting that whether “a contract of employment” in paragraphs 4 and 6 can be pluralised is a question of law which admits of a single answer in all situations. Of course, if there was here, contrary to what was decided in the industrial tribunal and accepted in the Employment Appeal Tribunal, a single contractual relationship, the contract being for the discharge of an identified professional task on a single set of terms and conditions, the work being distributed over one or more departments or locations, no problem would have arisen and no element of discretion would have entered into the decision. There would have been no need to aggregate, the totality of the hours having all been worked under one contract, or one series of single termly contracts.

I agree with the judgment of the Employment Appeal Tribunal that at the heart of the right to claim that a dismissal has been unfair or to make the corresponding claim in redundancy lies the loss of employment under the particular contract of employment in relation to which the complaint of termination is made. The relevant provisions all focus upon that particular contract. In the case of unfair dismissal, dismissal occurs when the contract in respect of which complaint is made is terminated: section 55. That complaint must be presented within three months of the termination of that contract: section 67. Moreover, if the complaint succeeds, the applicant receives a basic award which reflects the hours worked under the contract in respect of which the complaint is made: Schedule 14. Schedule 13 lays down a detailed code to which reference has to be made in order to discover whether following the termination of a particular contract, the necessary qualifying period has been established, or to compute the length of such employment for the purposes of compensation. Accordingly, references to employment or contract of employment in Schedule 13 are focussed upon the particular contract of employment in respect of which relief is claimed under the appropriate provision of the Act.

Mr. Tabachnik in his helpful submissions on behalf of the county council placed considerable emphasis in support of his argument upon section 146(4), which section does not appear to have been considered by the Court of Appeal. It reads as follows:

“Subject to subsections (5), (6) and (7), the following provisions of this Act (which confer rights which do not depend upon an employee having a qualifying period of continuous employment) do not apply to employment under a contract which normally involves employment for less than 16 hours weekly, that is to say, sections 1, 4, 8, 27, 28 and 29.”

Section 1 imposes the obligation on the employer to give the employee written particulars of his terms of employment. Section 4 obliges the employer, where there is a change in the terms of

3 W.L.R.

Surrey C.C. v. Lewis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A employment, to provide a written statement within a limited time of the nature of the alteration. Section 8 deals with the right to itemised pay statements. Sections 27, 28 and 29 deal with provisions relating to time off work. Thus section 146(4) makes it clear that, subject to subsections (5), (6) and (7), where the employment normally involves less than 16
B hours a week, the rights conferred by sections 1, 4, 8, 27, 28 and 29 do not apply. To allow aggregation of the hours of a number of concurrent short term periodic contracts involving less than 16 hours but in the aggregate more than 16 hours thereby imposing the obligations contained in these sections upon each and every such short term contract would be clearly contrary to the whole scheme and purpose of section 146(4).

C Mr. Tabachnik was, in my judgment, wholly justified in pointing to the anomalous position which would arise if aggregation were to be permitted. Paragraph 4 of Schedule 13 contemplates that a contract will only qualify if it is a contract for a normal working week of 16 hours (subject, of course, to paragraph 6). If aggregation is allowed a contract which does not qualify, because it does not satisfy the minimum hour requirement, would nevertheless qualify if there is in existence a D concurrent contract which also does not qualify, providing the hours which each normally involves, when aggregated, do qualify. Thus, an employee who is dismissed from a four hour per week contract (e.g. lecturing to an evening class) could complain of unfair dismissal by virtue of having a concurrent 12 hour week with the same employer (e.g. teaching in a school) even though he had not been dismissed from the 12 hour employment. Moreover, further complications arise if aggregation is permitted, in cases where contracts of employment are E not operating contemporaneously. Is one to look at each separately and add the result together? How far, if at all, are periods carried over, where the pattern of employment changes as in this case, in relation to the very limited periods of teaching on the foundation course. In my judgment, if Parliament had intended that hours worked under separate concurrent contracts were to be aggregated for the purposes of F paragraphs 4 and 6 of Schedule 13 it would have provided guidance as to how this was to be done. The total absence of any reference to aggregation seems to me to be the clearest indication that aggregation is not permissible.

G But even if section 6(c) of the Interpretation Act 1978 was to permit “pluralisation” with the result that paragraph 4 would read “by contracts of employment which normally involve employment for . . .” this would clearly create an ambiguity. Does the minimum hours requirement relate to each such contract or to the contracts taken together. The only solution for avoiding this ambiguity would be to add the further words “taken cumulatively.” For reasons I have given I can see no justification for that implication.

H The second question

In the light of my decision on the first question, namely that there is no entitlement to aggregate the hours worked on separate and distinct contracts, the question as to whether there was continuity of employment over a sufficient period of time does not arise. However, in deference to the submissions addressed to your Lordships, I will shortly give my view on this aspect of the appeal. The scope and operation of the words “a temporary cessation of work" in paragraph 9(1)(b) of Schedule 13 was considered by your Lordships' House in Ford v. Warwickshire County Council [1983] 2 A.C. 71. Mrs. Ford was also a teacher. She had been employed by the county council on a series of consecutive fixed-term contracts, each for an academic year, for a total of eight years. There was no question of her being employed under separate and concurrent contracts. In her case there was a break each summer between the end of one contract and the beginning of the next contract. Your Lordships held that paragraph 9(1)(b) of Schedule 13 could apply to preserve the continuity of her employment. In his speech Lord Diplock said, at p. 81:

"My Lords, since paragraph 9 only applies to an interval of time between the coming to an end of one contract of employment and the beginning of a fresh contract of employment, the expression 'absent from work' where it appears in paragraph 9(1)(b), (c) and (d), must mean not only that the employee is not doing any actual work for his employer but that there is no contract of employment subsisting between him and his employer that would entitle the latter to require him to do any work. So, in this context, the phrase 'the employee is . . . absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work' as descriptive of a period of time, as it would seem to me, must refer to the interval between (1) the date on which the employee would otherwise be continuing to work under an existing contract of employment is dismissed because for the time being his employer has no work for him to do, and (2) the date on which work for him to do having become again available, he is re-engaged under a fresh contract of employment to do it; . . ."

At a later stage in his speech, Lord Diplock said, at pp. 83-84:

"In harmony with what this House held in Fitzgerald's case [1970] A.C. 984, paragraph 9(1)(b), in cases of employment under a succession of fixed term contracts of employment with intervals in between, requires one to look back from the date of the expiry of the fixed term contract in respect of the non-renewal of which the employee's claim is made over the whole period during which the employee has been intermittently employed by the same employer, in order to see whether the interval between one fixed term contract and the fixed term contract that next preceded it was short in duration relative to the combined duration of those two fixed term contracts during which work had continued; for the whole scheme of the Act there appears to me to show that it is in the sense of 'transient', i.e. lasting only for a relatively short time, that the word 'temporary' is used in paragraph 9(1)(b). So, the continuity of employment for the purposes of the Act in relation to unfair dismissal and redundancy payments is not broken unless and until, looking backwards from the date of the expiry of the fixed term contract on which the employee's claim is based, there is to be found between one fixed term contract and its immediate predecessor an interval that cannot be characterised as short relatively to the combined duration of the two fixed term contracts."

Thus, paragraph 9 is dealing only with periods which are not to be treated as interrupting a continuous period of employment under a

3 W.L.R.

Surrey C.C. v. Lewis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A contract of employment, notwithstanding that during the period of interruption there is in law no subsisting contract of employment. This is to be contrasted with the situation where there is a subsisting contract of employment and which is catered for by paragraphs 4 to 7 of the same Schedule 13. As Mr. Tabachnik rightly submits, there is thus a dovetailing between paragraphs 4 to 7 on the one hand, and paragraph 9 on the other and to “aggregate” would disrupt this scheme. Moreover, to assess “temporary cessation” by reference to contracts other than the successor and predecessor contracts in the same series would give rise to comparable anomalies. Moreover, following the decision in Ford’s case [1983] 2 A.C. 71, the continuity of a succession of fixed term contracts of employment with intervals between them, which would satisfy the continuity test required by paragraph 9(1)(b), would, however, fail if there was a concurrent contract for say a two hour per week evening class continuing throughout the year, unless the series of fixed term contracts are to be viewed in isolation. Further, as was pointed out during submissions, unless one series of contracts is considered in isolation from another, there would be anomalous consequences for the employer, since an interval which does not amount to a temporary cessation and which would therefore break continuity, would be disregarded simply because another series of contracts subsist during the interval. To my mind the whole thrust of the decision in Ford’s case suggests that employment which is not pursuant to contracts in the same series is irrelevant in assessing whether an interval constitutes a “temporary cessation.”

I would therefore, with reluctance, allow this appeal. My reluctance is not to be ascribed to any hesitation to accept the validity of the interpretation which I have put upon the relevant provisions of the Act, but to the consequences to Mrs. Lewis. As I have sought to underline in the course of expressing my views, this result follows from the finding, which your Lordships are obliged to accept, that she was employed under and pursuant to a series of separate and distinct concurrent contracts. The Employment Appeal Tribunal were well alive to the possibility that a case might occur in which, to quote the words of Waite J. [1986] I.C.R. 404, 409–410:

“an unscrupulous employer, served by an employee in diverse capacities or in different workplaces, would be found deliberately to have subjected the employment relationship to a mosaic of separate contracts dealing individually with each function, or each workplace, for the purpose of depriving the employee of the protection rights to which he would have been entitled had his whole engagement been incorporated in a single employment contract.”

The Employment Appeal Tribunal rightly took the view that the industrial tribunal could be safely trusted to penetrate the superficial disguise, to look to the substance of the arrangements and not to the form and to arrive (in pursuance of the fact-finding mission which is their exclusive function) at a conclusion that the purported multiple contracts were in reality one single contract. I would add that if the facts fitted, it would also be open to an industrial tribunal to find that, even though there were separate contracts, there was also a unifying contract of employment collateral to the separate contracts, of the type which has been referred to as an “umbrella contract” of employment (see O’Kelly

Contempt of Court—Pending proceedings—Third party—Action to preserve confidential information—Interim injunctions granted prohibiting publication pending trial—Third party publishing information—Whether third party in contempt of court

In 1985, the Attorney-General brought an action in Australia to restrain a retired officer of the British Security Service from publishing his memoirs in breach of his duty of confidentiality to the Crown. Pending the trial, the officer and his publishers gave an undertaking in court not to publish. In 1986, the Attorney-General brought actions in England to restrain the "Observer" and "The Guardian" newspapers from publishing material from the memoirs. Pending the English proceedings, in which interim injunctions against the publication had been granted, extensive extracts and summaries of the memoirs appeared in "The Independent" and two other English newspapers. On an application to commit the three newspapers for contempt of court, the Vice-Chancellor held, in a preliminary ruling, that since the respondents were neither parties to the actions nor subject to the injunctions, their conduct in publishing the memoirs with knowledge of the outstanding injunctions did not constitute a criminal contempt of court.

On appeal by the Attorney-General:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the purpose of granting the injunctions in the Guardian and Observer actions was to preserve the confidential nature of the information pending the trial of the actions in circumstances where any prior publication

A would destroy the subject matter of those actions; that the destruction of the subject matter of a pending action impeded or prejudiced the administration of justice and, therefore, a third party who published information alleged to be confidential, knowing that it was the subject matter of a pending action and the subject of a court order prohibiting its publication, committed the actus reus of contempt of court; and that, accordingly, the matter would be remitted to the High Court for that court to determine whether the respondents intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice (post, pp. 975A, 976D-E, 977D, H—978A, C-D, 982B-C, G—983A, 985A, H, 988D, H—989D).

C Per Balcombe L.J. It would be preferable, where it is apparent that the subject matter of an action could be destroyed by its publication by any person, whether a party to the action or not, for the court to make its initial protective order in terms which make it clear to third parties that they, too, must not destroy the subject matter (post, p. 989E-F).

SUMMONS

The Attorney-General brought proceedings against, inter alia, Guardian Newspapers Ltd. and Observer Ltd. for injunctions restraining publication of extracts of Peter Maurice Wright's book Spycatcher in "The Guardian" and "Observer" newspapers on the ground that the book included confidential information obtained by Mr. Wright as an employee in the British Security Service. On 25 July 1986, the Court of Appeal granted an injunction restraining publication of extracts from the book in those two newspapers until trial of the actions.

On 27 April 1987, articles appeared in "The Independent" newspaper which included information obtained from Mr. Wright's manuscript of Spycatcher and that was followed by similar articles in "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News." By notice of motion dated 11 May 1987, the Attorney-General alleged contempt of court against the six respondents, the publisher of "The Independent," Newspaper Publishing Plc., its editor, Andreas Whittam Smith, the publisher of "The London Evening Standard," Evening Standard Co. Ltd., its editor, John Leese, and the publisher of "The London Daily News," London Daily News Ltd., and its editor, Magnus Linklater. The grounds of the application were that the conduct of the respondents in publishing the articles was intended or calculated to impede, obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice in that they were severally intended or calculated and in any event likely to thwart orders of the Court of Appeal made on 25 July 1986 in the High Court proceedings brought by the Attorney-General against Guardian Newspapers Ltd. and Observer Ltd. The relief sought was that the respondent publishers should be fined and that the respondent editors be committed to prison for their contempt.

The facts are stated in the judgments of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. and Sir John Donaldson M.R.

2 JUNE. SIR NICOLAS BROWNE-WILKINSON V.-C. read the following judgment. This is a motion brought by the Attorney-General alleging that the proprietors and editors of three newspapers, "The Independent," "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News" have committed contempts of court. The alleged contempts lie in the publication on 27 April 1987 of certain articles referring to the memoirs of Peter Maurice Wright and to information contained in such memoirs. The actual point for decision, although difficult and important, is a narrow one. But I must first explain the background.

Mr. Wright was for many years a member of the British Security Service, holding senior positions with access to highly classified and sensitive information. He retired in 1976 and went to live in Tasmania. He considered that the Security Service had been penetrated by foreign agents and called for an inquiry. When no inquiry was held, he decided to publish his memoirs disclosing facts supporting not only the allegation of penetration of the Security Service by foreign agents but also making other allegations of unlawful conduct by members of the Security Service. In 1985 it was proposed to publish Mr. Wright's memoirs in Australia. On discovering the proposed publication the Attorney-General took proceedings in the Supreme Court of New South Wales against Mr. Wright and the publishers claiming an injunction restraining publication on the ground that the publication would be a breach of the duty of confidentiality owed to the Crown as Mr. Wright's former employers. The defendants in the Australian proceedings gave undertakings pending trial not to disclose information obtained by Mr. Wright as an officer of the British Security Service.

On 22 and 23 June 1986 (before the trial of the Australian proceedings) the "Observer" and "The Guardian" newspapers published articles outlining a number of the allegations which were said to be contained in the Wright memoirs. The Attorney-General then applied in the High Court in England for injunctions against the "Observer" and "The Guardian" restraining them from making any publication. His claim was again based on the principle that the information in the memoirs is confidential. Ex-parte injunctions were granted. The matter then came before Millett J. inter partes. On 11 July 1986 Millett J. granted interlocutory injunctions against "The Guardian" and the "Observer" until trial or further order ("the 1986 injunctions"). The proceedings before me relate to the 1986 injunctions which, so far as relevant, read:

"The defendants and each of them be restrained until trial or further order from doing whether by himself or itself or by his or its servants or agents or any of them or otherwise howsoever the following acts or any of them that is to say: 1. Disclosing or

- A publishing or causing or permitting to be disclosed or published to any person any information obtained by Peter Maurice Wright in his capacity as a member of the British Security Service and which they know or have reasonable grounds to believe to have come or been obtained whether directly or indirectly from the said Peter Maurice Wright. 2. Attributing in any disclosure or publication made by them to any person any information concerning the British Security Service to the said Peter Maurice Wright whether by name or otherwise."
- B

C There were two provisos: the first permitted quotation of attributions to Mr. Wright contained in works or broadcasts previously published; the second provided that disclosure of any information to be disclosed in the Supreme Court of New South Wales would not be a breach of the order.

D "The Guardian" and the "Observer" appealed to the Court of Appeal. Millett J.'s decision was upheld save that a further proviso permitting the reporting of proceedings in the United Kingdom Parliament and law courts was added. The Court of Appeal refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords but leave was subsequently granted by the House of Lords. That appeal is due to be heard before the end of July.

E The reasons given by both Millett J. and the Court of Appeal for their decision to grant the 1986 injunctions were broadly the same. Mr. Wright as a member of the Security Service owed the highest duty of confidentiality to the Crown, which duty would be breached by his publication of any memoir based on his experience in the service. It is essential for the proper working of the Security Service that all its dealings are totally confidential and are seen to be such; if former members are free to publish memoirs of their experiences, the Security Service would not appear to be leak proof which would gravely harm its relations with the security services of other friendly powers. In addition, although the memoirs were based on matters no more than 10 years old, the memoirs were said to contain information which was still extremely sensitive and might harm the operations of the British Security Service if disclosed. These facts, on which the decisions were based, were all derived from affidavits sworn by the Secretary to the Cabinet, Sir Robert Armstrong, which, as the Court of Appeal emphasised, were uncontroverted in the evidence before the court. The court held that on an interlocutory application the public interest in preserving the confidentiality of the Security Service outweighed the public interest relied upon by "The Guardian" and the "Observer," namely, the general freedom of newspapers to publish news and the need to disclose the allegations of unlawful conduct by the Security Service. Both courts were influenced, amongst other things, by the fact that the unlawful conduct alleged took place so long ago and by the lack of evidence that there was any overwhelming need to publish the allegations immediately instead of waiting until after the hearing of the action. This is an inadequate précis of the very full judgments delivered; but it is sufficient for present purposes.

H

The Australian case was tried by Powell J. at the end of 1986. It lasted for many weeks. Sir Robert Armstrong was cross-examined. Both that cross-examination and the whole of the proceedings received exceptionally detailed reporting in the media, not only in this country but world-wide. Powell J. gave judgment on 13 March 1987 dismissing the Attorney-General's claim in Australia for injunctions against the publication of Mr. Wright's memoirs. The judgment runs to some 286 pages but it is unnecessary to refer to it save to mention that Powell J. found the evidence given by Sir Robert Armstrong in some respects unsatisfactory and unreliable. The Attorney-General has appealed in the Australian courts against the decision of Powell J. That appeal is due to be heard in July. The defendants in Australia have given undertakings pending the hearing of the appeal not to publish Mr. Wright's memoirs.

This was the position which obtained when, on 27 April 1987, "The Independent" published the articles complained of. The articles took up the whole of the front page of "The Independent." They stated that the newspaper had received a copy of the manuscript of Mr. Wright's memoirs and then published the gist of a number of allegations contained in the book expressly ascribing them to Mr. Wright. The articles contained passages purporting to be verbatim quotations from the memoirs. In addition they contained details of the facts alleged in the Wright memoirs in support of the allegations made by Mr. Wright that the Security Service had been guilty of unlawful conduct. On the same day, "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News" quoted those stories from "The Independent" although in considerably less detail. Although not in terms admitted, it appears that "The Independent" and the other two newspapers had done exactly what "The Guardian" and the "Observer" were restrained from doing by the 1986 injunctions.

The Attorney-General's response was to make an immediate application to the Queen's Bench Divisional Court for leave to move against the three newspapers for contempt of court. Leave was granted on 29 April. Although the Attorney-General was anxious to have the application determined speedily (as was "The London Daily News") "The Independent" wished to conduct considerable research before putting in evidence in answer: no direction for speedy trial was made. On the same day that leave was granted to bring the contempt proceedings, 29 April, "The Guardian" and the "Observer" gave notice of motion in the Chancery Division to discharge or vary the 1986 injunctions. The motion came before me on 7 May 1987. There were two grounds for the application: the first relied on what had transpired in the Australian courts and in particular on the evidence given by Sir Robert Armstrong under cross-examination; the second relied on the publication of the articles in the three newspapers which had been followed by a large number of other reports (both here and abroad) revealing the allegations made and ascribing them to Mr. Wright. This second ground gave rise to the formidable argument: how can it be right to continue an injunction which prevents only "The Guardian" and the "Observer" from publishing matters which the rest of the world are freely publishing?

It seemed to me that the validity of the second ground on which "The Guardian" and the "Observer" were relying largely depended on whether or not the publications by other papers were contempts of court and could therefore be punished or restrained. Doubts had arisen whether the contempt proceedings were properly brought in the Queen's Bench Division since they relate to an order made in the Chancery Division. I therefore suggested (and I must take full responsibility for the suggestion if it is thought to be mistaken) that the contempt proceedings against the three newspapers should be brought before me

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (Ch.D.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A by a fresh notice of motion so that I could first determine the preliminary point of law whether the publication could be a contempt of court, given that the three newspapers (as opposed to "The Guardian" and "Observer") were not subject to any order restraining them from publishing the material. This suggestion was adopted and I directed a preliminary point of law in these terms:

B "Whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding injunction against another party, and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof, constitutes a criminal contempt of court upon the footing that it assaults or interferes with the process of justice in relation to the said injunction."

This is my judgment on that preliminary point of law.

C In outline the parties' submissions are as follows. Mr. Laws, for the Attorney-General, accepts that the publication by the three newspapers did not constitute a breach of the 1986 injunctions since the publication was not made by the only persons restrained by the 1986 order but independently by the three newspapers. However, says Mr. Laws, there are two types of contempt. The first is civil contempt which consists of a breach by a party to proceedings of an order made against him; that is not the present case. The second type is a criminal contempt which consists of conduct which frustrates or impedes the due administration of justice: that, says Mr. Laws, is the present case. The conduct of the three newspapers in publishing the very material publication of which, to the knowledge of the newspapers, Millett J. and the Court of Appeal have held to be contrary to the public interest constitutes a criminal contempt in that it thwarts and frustrates the 1986 injunctions. They were made for the purpose of preserving the right of the Crown to preserve the confidentiality of the matters contained in Mr. Wright's memoirs. If those memoirs or excerpts therefrom are published by others, that very confidentiality has gone, robbing the 1986 injunctions of their utility and indeed destroying the very subject matter of the action i.e. the confidentiality of the information. What is more, in frustrating an interlocutory order by publication, the three newspapers have deprived or impaired the Crown's right to a trial on the merits of the main hearing of the action against "The Guardian" and "Observer;" the sole, or main, purpose of such hearing would be to obtain a permanent injunction so as to preserve the secrecy of the information relating to the Security Service which, in the public interest, must remain confidential. So runs the argument for the Crown.

G On the other side, the three newspapers contend that the Attorney-General is seeking to widen the law of criminal contempt and that any extension of the criminal law is nowadays a matter for Parliament, not the judges. To hold that a third party, who is not subject to the order, is bound to give effect to its purpose would run contrary to the whole basis of English law: the court decides the issues between the parties before it and makes orders which bind the parties only. The court acts in personam not in rem. To hold the three newspapers guilty of contempt by breaking the spirit, but not the letter, of the 1986 injunctions would offend all the basic principles of natural justice: they would be held guilty of a crime in treating as not applicable to them an order not directed to them, made by a court which had not given them an opportunity to be heard and which made its order in ignorance of the facts and circumstances applicable to the three newspapers. Moreover, once the Crown accepts that there is no breach of the 1986 injunctions, what constitutes contempt by acting contrary to the purpose or spirit of that order becomes wholly uncertain.

Before dealing with these arguments, there are two fundamental factors which have to be borne in mind. First, this case arises out of facts affecting national security and state secrets which have attracted massive attention from the media. But that background must not obscure the fact that the only right asserted by the Crown before Millett J. and the Court of Appeal and the only right protected by the 1986 injunctions is a private right of action under the civil law viz. the right of an employer to restrain a former employee from disclosing confidential information. Of necessity, the public interest in preserving national security was a major factor in assessing the degree of confidentiality required of a member of the Security Service and in considering the balance of convenience. But the basic right protected by the 1986 injunctions is exactly the same as the right of a manufacturer to stop an employee disclosing trade secrets or of one spouse to restrain the other from revealing "pillow-talk." The court in granting the 1986 injunctions was not enforcing any public right referable to the preservation of official secrets or the public welfare.

The second factor flows from the first. Since the 1986 injunctions are protecting a private, not a public, right of the Crown, the question I have to determine will affect many other types of case involving private litigants in which the Crown is not a party. In such cases no question of national interest or national security will apply. It is therefore important not to allow the decision in this case to be overborne by the desire to preserve state secrets. If the Attorney-General is right in the principle he asserts in this case it will be applicable in many other cases as between private individuals where no question of security arises. It is important not to distort the general law of contempt so as to make it applicable in such cases in a manner which would be capricious, unfair or unworkable. As I have said, the three newspapers allege that the Attorney-General is extending the law of contempt. Mr. Laws, whilst denying that he is seeking any extension of the law, accepts that I am being asked to elucidate the application of a general principle to a new state of facts. Either way, I must first consider how the law presently stands.

The basic principles of criminal contempt are not in dispute. It has often been said that contempt of court is an unhappy phrase, suggesting as it does that a judge is concerned to protect his personal or judicial dignity. That is far from the case. One of the foundations of a free society is that there should be courts to which all can have access, in which the justice dispensed is impartial and whose orders are obeyed. The law of contempt is the means by which these vital requirements are preserved. Thus to seek to prevent or dissuade a litigant or witness from coming to court is a criminal contempt. So is any interference with the impartiality of the judge or jury. So is any interference with the course of the trial. Disobedience to a court order by a party to the proceedings against whom the order has been made is a civil contempt. I accept fully that the public interest in ensuring far and effective justice is very great. However, I am not prepared to go as far as Mr. Laws submitted in holding that a judge should prefer that public interest to any other public interest with which it may come in conflict: there are many cases where such preference has not been given, for example, in allowing the

- A public interest in preserving the confidentiality of certain documents to outweigh the requirements of justice that they should be available as evidence in a trial.

The English authorities demonstrate that hitherto actions by a third party which interfere with a court order have only been held to constitute a criminal contempt of court if both (a) the action by the third party complained of constituted a breach of the express terms of the order; and (b) the third party has aided and abetted or been privy or party to a breach of the order by the person enjoined by the order. In this judgment I will refer to the plaintiff in the proceedings as "A," the defendant in the proceedings who is enjoined from doing the act complained of as "B" and the third party who is not a defendant and is not enjoined by the express terms of the order from doing the act, as "C."

The authorities establish that if B breaches the order he is guilty of a civil contempt which the court will punish in proceedings brought by A: see Seaward v. Paterson [1897] 1 Ch. 545. If C aids and abets B to do the act which B is enjoined from doing, he does not commit a breach of the order. In Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (1848) 11 Beav. 180 the agent of Lord Mornington who cut down the trees which Lord Mornington was forbidden to fell was held not guilty of the civil contempt of disobedience of the order against Lord Mornington. However, one month later, the agent was held liable in criminal contempt in knowingly aiding and abetting a breach of the order: see Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (No. 2) (1848) 11 Beav. 181. Lord Langdale M.R., at p. 183, said that the agent

"in the position in which he was, and knowing the duty of the Earl of Mornington, ought to have taken care not to do any acts, in violation of the order of the court."

The same conclusion was reached in Seaward v. Paterson [1897] 1 Ch. 545. The rationale behind holding C liable for criminal contempt was set out by Lindley L.J. in Seaward v. Paterson, at p. 554:

"Now let us consider what jurisdiction the court has to make an order against [C]. There is no injunction against him—he is no more bound by the injunction granted against [B] than any other member of the public. He is bound, like other members of the public, not to interfere with, and not to obstruct, the course of justice; and the case, if any, made against him must be this—not that he has technically infringed the injunction, which was not granted against him in any sense of the word, but that he has been aiding and abetting others in setting the court at defiance, and deliberately treating the order of the court as unworthy of notice. If he has so conducted himself, it is perfectly idle to say that there is no jurisdiction to attach him for contempt as distinguished from a breach of the injunction, which has a technical meaning. . . . It has always been familiar doctrine . . . that the orders of the court ought to be obeyed, and could not be set at naught and violated by any member of the public, either by interfering with the officers of the court, or by assisting those who are bound by its orders."

Mr. Laws submits that, although the actual decision does not cover the present case, the rationale extends to a case such as the present where C has not aided and abetted B and there has been no breach of the express terms of the order. It is to be noted that in those two cases (and indeed in all the other cases cited to me) although C is said to be in criminal contempt, the proceedings to punish such criminal contempt have been brought by A (the plaintiff in the main proceedings) and not by the Attorney-General.

Mr. Laws also relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Z Ltd. v. A-Z and AA-LL [1982] Q.B. 558. In that case the Court of Appeal considered the impact of a Mareva injunction on banks holding the assets of the defendant against whom the order was made. In particular, it considered the position where the bank, but not the defendant who was enjoined, had been served with the order. It was argued that in such a case the bank could not be guilty of contempt of court by disposing of the defendant's assets under its control since the defendant could not himself be in contempt: the bank could not be aiding and abetting someone who was not himself in contempt. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument. Lord Denning M.R., at pp. 572-573, founded his decision that the bank could be in contempt on the ground that a Mareva order operated in rem in the same way as an Admiralty order arresting a ship. With respect, I am unable to accept this as being correct. The Court of Appeal in an earlier case, Cretanor Maritime Co. Ltd. v. Irish Marine Management Ltd. [1978] 1 W.L.R. 966 (which was not cited in the Z Ltd. case) expressly held that a Mareva injunction does not operate in rem but in personam: see per Buckley L.J. at pp. 974c and 976g.

Reverting to the Z Ltd. case [1982] Q.B. 558, Eveleigh L.J. did not adopt the same reasoning as Lord Denning M.R. He said, at p. 578:

"I think that the following propositions may be stated as to the consequences which ensue when there are acts or omissions which are contrary to the terms of an injunction. (1) The person against whom the order is made will be liable for contempt of court if he acts in breach of the order after having notice of it. (2) A third party will also be liable if he knowingly assists in the breach, that is to say if knowing the terms of the injunction he wilfully assists the person to whom it was directed to disobey it. This will be so whether or not the person enjoined has had notice of the injunction. . . . I will give my reasons for the second proposition and take first the question of prior notice to the defendant. It was argued that the liability of a third party arose because he was treated as aiding and abetting the defendant (i.e. he was an accessory) and as the defendant could himself not be in breach unless he had notice it followed that there was no offence to which the third party could be an accessory. In my opinion this argument misunderstands the true nature of the liability of the third party. He is liable for contempt of court committed by himself. It is true that his conduct may very often be seen as possessing a dual character of contempt of court by himself and aiding and abetting the contempt by another, but the conduct will always amount to contempt of court by himself. It will be conduct which knowingly interferes with the administration of justice by causing the order of the court to be thwarted."

As those words made clear, Eveleigh L.J. was considering a case where the act of C (the bank) did constitute a breach of the order. Although B (the defendant) could not be liable for contempt until he had notice of the order, the order took immediate effect. Therefore if a bank in

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (Ch.D.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A handling B's money disposes of it, the bank is a party to a breach of the precise terms of the order. The Z Ltd. case shows that an act by C can be a criminal contempt even if, in terms of strict criminal law, C is not aiding and abetting B to commit the breach. But it is no authority for the proposition that C can be liable for doing or being party to any act which does not constitute a breach of the precise terms of the order.

B Mr. Laws also relied on a recent decision of Henry J. in United Kingdom Nirex Ltd. v. Barton, The Times, 14 October 1986 in which, at the end of a judgment in which he varied two injunctions granted against named defendants in a representative capacity so as to exclude such representative capacity, he said that if anyone were knowingly to do the acts which the named defendants were enjoined from doing that would prima facie be a wrongful interference with the administration of justice and would be a contempt. For this proposition he relied on the C Z Ltd. case [1982] Q.B. 558. Although this directly supports Mr. Laws's main submissions, those remarks were obiter dicta and, so far as the judgment shows, were made without much argument being directed to the point.

D Certain Canadian authorities were referred to in argument. The guidance they offer is limited and confused. In English law an order should only restrain the defendant, B from doing an act: it should not be framed so as to enjoin any person who is not a party: see Marengo v. Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd. [1948] 1 All E.R. 406. In Canada the practice is apparently different. In Bassel's Lunch Ltd. v. Kick (No. 1) [1936] O.R. 445, an order had been made restraining named defendants "and anyone assisting or aiding them" from picketing. It was E held by the Court of Appeal of Ontario that persons not parties to the proceedings who had picketed were in contempt: it was said, in reliance on Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington, 11 Beav. 180, that anyone who knows of an injunction forbidding a person doing a specified act and who himself acts in contravention thereof can be committed for contempt in intermeddling. However in Bassel's Lunch Ltd. v. Kick (No. 2) [1937] 1 D.L.R. 235 a differently constituted Court of Appeal of F Ontario apparently reached a different conclusion in relation to alleged contempt by different third parties in acting contrary to the same order. They said, at p. 235:

G "An injunction restraining A from doing some act is not an injunction restraining B or C from doing it. In many instances, also, the fact that B or C do the act prohibited to A, does not amount to any assisting or aiding of A by B or C; the latter may be acting quite independently of A. On the other hand it is sophistry to argue that, because A refrains from doing the act, therefore B or C's doing it in his place is not assisting or aiding him. Where B and C act not independently but because of their interest in A, it may well be held that they are assisting or aiding him; at least they are H intermeddling and so may be found guilty."

This later decision, accepting as it does that the third party may not be liable for contempt even though his actions thwart the effect of the order, is strongly against Mr. Laws's submissions.

In Tilco Plastics Ltd. v. Skurjat (1966) 57 D.L.R. (2d) 596 an order had been made restraining the defendants "or person or persons having notice of the order" from industrial picketing. It was held that persons other than the defendants who with knowledge of the order picketed were in contempt of court. The earlier decisions of the Ontario Court of Appeal were not cited. The judge sitting in the Ontario court at first instance expressly said, at p. 619:

“Any person who is aware of the substance or nature of a court order cannot flout it simply because he is not expressly named in that order.”

This again strongly supports Mr. Laws's argument. That decision was followed, on very similar facts, in Catkey Construction Ltd. v. Moran (1969) 8 D.L.R. (3d) 413. The state of the authorities under the law of Canada seems to be confused. However one thing is clear: in every case the act by the third party which was held to be a contempt constituted a breach of the precise terms of the order, albeit the order was made in a form which could not properly be made under English law.

Finally I should notice an Irish case, Smith-Barry v. Dawson (1891) 27 L.R.Ir. 558. The plaintiff in that case was entitled to a right of market. He had obtained an order against the defendants restraining them from disturbing it. Certain persons (not the defendants) had with knowledge of the order done acts which, if done by the defendants, would have been breaches of the order. They were held to be in contempt of court. Hedges Chatterton V.-C. based his decision on earlier Irish authorities: none of the English authorities were cited. There was no appearance or argument to those against whom committal was sought. I do not find this a compelling authority.

In my judgment the authorities show the present state of the law to be as follows. (a) In no case (apart from Smith-Barry v. Dawson, the Irish case) has a third party, C, been held to be in contempt of an order restraining a named person, B, from doing an act unless C has been privy or party to the doing of an act which is a breach of the precise terms of the order. (b) Under English law an injunction can only properly restrain a party to the proceedings from doing an act, although it may restrain him from doing the act “by himself, his servant or agent.” (c) As a result of (a) and (b) above, there is no English case in which a third party, C, has been held in contempt for doing any act which does not constitute a breach by the defendant enjoined, B, of the precise terms of the order. (d) The plaintiff in the proceedings, A, can apply for the committal of C even though the act of C is a criminal contempt. (e) The principle underlying the law that C is in criminal contempt if he is party to a breach of the order is that the court will not allow its order to be knowingly flouted, thwarted or frustrated by any person even though he be a stranger to the action.

The first four of those propositions support the three newspapers in their defence to these proceedings. They show that the law has never hitherto extended to cover a case such as this where the three newspapers have not aided or abetted “The Guardian” and “Observer” to breach the 1986 injunctions: there has been no breach of the 1986 injunctions since the only parties enjoined, the Guardian and Observer, have done nothing. On the other hand, the final proposition ((e) above) supports the Attorney-General since the underlying principle could be held to cover the present case: the publication by the three newspapers, with knowledge of the 1986 injunctions, may well render those injunctions valueless and thwart the establishment of the Crown's rights against “The Guardian” and “Observer.”

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (Ch.D.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A On this state of the authorities, it seems to me that the Attorney-General is seeking to widen the application of the law of criminal contempt, albeit in accordance with established principle. The three newspapers submit that it is for Parliament, not the courts, to make any extension to the law of contempt since it is a change in the criminal law. I do not accept this contention. Punishment for contempt of court is the means by which the judges preserve the judicial process. It is essentially a matter on which the judges have to decide, in accordance with principle, whether or not certain types of action (which may well change over the years) are consistent with the maintenance of a fair and proper judicial process. However, I do accept that, in deciding whether to apply the law of contempt in new circumstances, the courts should tread warily bearing in mind that the law of contempt of court is a restriction on freedom of action which a citizen would otherwise enjoy and a breach of the law may lead to the loss of his liberty.

C The strength of Mr. Laws's argument lies primarily in the facts of this case. Publication of the memoirs has been held by the courts in reasoned judgments to be contrary to national security: the 1986 injunctions were made to protect the public interest by preserving national security. Yet the three newspapers have, knowing of that decision, chosen to do what the court has held to be contrary to the public interest and published what was secret. How is the public interest to be protected if that is not a contempt of court? Even if, as is apparently the case, some people do not accept the decision of the court that the publication of the Wright memoirs would jeopardise national security, it is easy to postulate facts where the risks would be unarguable: for example, if newspapers were publishing highly secret information as to the disposition of the Polaris submarines. It is almost uncontroversial that in such a case there ought to be a legal sanction against publication. But the question I have to decide is whether, due to the chance that there is in existence an order of the court preventing "The Guardian" and the "Observer" from publishing, the appropriate sanction is contempt of court.

F I have reached the conclusion that it is not. So to hold would be to subvert the basic principles of our civil law and introduce into it uncertainty and unfairness. English civil courts act in personam, that is to say they adjudicate upon disputes between the parties to an action and make orders against those parties only. In certain instances where the court has assumed the care and administration of a person or property, the court does make orders which, in one sense, operate in rem. Any interference with the person or the property being administered constitutes a contempt of court; for example, acts in relation to a ward of court, a ship subject to attachment or property of which the court has appointed a receiver. But in other cases so far as I am aware injunctions can only properly be made to restrain a defendant to the proceedings, as opposed to a third party, from doing certain acts: see Marengo v. Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd. [1948] 1 All E.R. 406, and In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) [1984] 1 W.L.R. 1422. Even a declaration made by a court is not binding on persons who are not parties to the suit. In my judgment this is the basis of the present state of the law that, for a third party, C, to be liable for contempt, the acts complained of must constitute a breach of the actual terms of the order. The Attorney-General's contention, if correct, strikes at the root of this basic principle. An order of the court would, in effect, operate in rem, i.e., be enforceable against everyone who had notice of it. The practical implications of this in ordinary civil litigation would be far reaching and in many cases unjust.

I will give a number of examples. Say an employer obtained an injunction against an employee restraining that employee from disclosing or using certain trade secrets. All other employees of that employer who knew of the order would be at risk of committal for contempt of court if they used or disclosed information derived from their employment; it is notoriously difficult to distinguish between information which is a true trade secret and therefore protected and other information which an employee is free to use on his own account. It would follow that, by getting an order against one employee, the employer would have imposed an effective muzzle on all his employees and that muzzle might well give protection to information that the employer was not entitled to protect.

Again, take the case of a newspaper, B, publishing an article defamatory of A. A obtains an injunction against B, B lacking the information necessary to justify the libel. Such order would expose any other newspaper which published the libel to proceedings for contempt of court. If newspaper C did have the information necessary to justify the libel and wished to justify, the law of contempt would operate indirectly so as to prevent publication by C in circumstances in which A could not have obtained an injunction directly against C; no injunction can be granted to restrain publication of a libel which the defendant intends to justify. Faced with this example, Mr. Laws suggested that C could apply to the court for leave to publish. This would be a novel type of application. But even assuming that some procedure could be found which enabled C to make it, the need for C to make such application is quite inconsistent with the normal concepts of freedom of the press. Newspapers are free to publish unless restrained by an order; their right hitherto, has not depended on obtaining prior leave of the court. Nor in my judgment should such leave be required.

Again, say there were an industrial dispute and the employer obtained injunctions restraining named employees from picketing. Is that order to be enforceable by committal against all employees and others who have notice of the order thereby preventing anyone from picketing? That would be a grave inroad on private freedom and a power readily open to abuse. In a more commercial sphere, take the case of a takeover battle in which shareholder A is trying to maintain or secure a majority shareholding. A obtains an order restraining shareholder B from disposing of his shares to X, the rival bidder. Are all other shareholders to be at risk of committal for contempt if they sell their shares to X, whether or not A has any legal right to restrain them from selling? Yet the sale by other shareholders will thwart and frustrate the purpose of the injunction against B, i.e. to secure and maintain the majority shareholding for A.

Finally, take the case of a householder, A, whose house enjoys a view of certain trees on adjoining land belonging to B. A obtains an injunction restraining B from cutting down the trees because of some agreement between A and B. Will it be contempt of court if C (in exercise of some right which he has against B) cuts down the trees otherwise than in collusion with B? Yet the felling of the trees by C will wholly frustrate the effect of the order against B. These instances, which

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (Ch.D.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A are not merely fanciful, to my mind show that the principle contended for by the Attorney-General cannot be right.

There are other equally serious objections. Mr. Laws himself accepted that, in the case of some order against B, it would not be a contempt for C to do the act which B is prohibited from doing. He instanced the case of an injunction granted in a matrimonial dispute which restrained the husband B from assaulting the wife A. Mr. Laws accepts that if C assaults A, he would not be in contempt of court. The reason, says Mr. Laws, is that the order restraining B is plainly personal to B. But the borderline between such "plainly personal" orders and other orders must be very uncertain. All orders are expressed as being personal. Is an order restraining an act by B in breach of his contract with A personal? If so, can C safely do an act even if the result of such act will be to frustrate the order? For example, in the case I have given of the felling of the trees, will it not be a contempt of court by C to fell the trees because A's right to prevent B from felling the trees lay in the contract between A and B? In my judgment, the distinction between personal and other orders is unworkable. It would lead to a degree of uncertainty whether or not an act was a contempt which is incompatible with the imposition of a criminal sanction.

D The same vice of uncertainty would arise in a different way. Under the present law, committal for contempt of court is attended by very elaborate procedural safeguards. The order has to be personally served and in some cases carries a penal endorsement. When the proceedings are heard, great care is taken to ensure that the acts alleged do in fact constitute a breach of the express terms of the order; if they do not, then there is no contempt. Yet, if the Attorney-General's contention is correct, a third party will enjoy none of those protections. In particular the alleged contempt will consist of the doing of some act inconsistent, not with the terms but with the purpose of the order. In the present case, it is clear what was the purpose of the 1986 injunctions. But, in most cases it would be far from clear. In my judgment it would be unjust to expose third parties to criminal sanctions for doing an act when it is not clear in advance whether or not the doing of that act is or is not lawful.

If, as I think, the effect of the Attorney-General's contention would be to make enforceable against third parties an order made in their absence, such a result offends the basic principles of natural justice. If such an order were to be made by an inferior court or administrative body, it would be quashed by the High Court. This is again not merely a matter of principle but of substance. On an application by A for an interlocutory injunction against B, the judge has to consider the usual well known factors: viz. has A an arguable claim and B an arguable defence? Will any damages payable by B be an adequate remedy to A and has B the means to pay such damages? Will A's cross-undertaking in damages compensate B for any loss sustained by B if the injunction is not granted at the trial? What is the balance of convenience as between A and B?

H On the making of the interlocutory order restraining B (which C is to be held to have contemptuously thwarted) C's circumstances will not have been known to, or considered by, the judge. C may have a defence where B had none. Damages may be an adequate remedy to A and C may be able to pay them but B not. Most importantly, the giving by A to B of the cross-undertaking in damages is a necessary precondition to

Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

[1987]

the grant of any interlocutory injunction. But A will have given no such cross-undertaking to C and C will have no recourse if, for fear of committing a contempt, he has refrained from taking a particular course of action.

For all these reasons, in my judgment, the law of contempt should not be extended, or held to apply, to a case where the only act alleged against the contemnor is the doing of an act which is not a breach of the express terms of the order and where the alleged contemnor has not been a party or privy to a breach of the order by others. I therefore answer the preliminary question "No."

On the facts of this case (which have not been fully investigated before me) I reach the conclusion with some concern. There ought to be some sanction against the publication of matters which prejudice national security and the decision as to what does prejudice national security should not be left to the judgment of the editors of individual newspapers. I had assumed that the Official Secrets Act 1911 provided the necessary sanction. If it does not, then it is for Parliament, if it thinks fit, to provide the necessary sanction by providing a public law remedy linked directly to the protection of public rights. Private rights should not be bolstered by a distortion of the law of contempt in an attempt to produce a judge-made public law protecting official secrets.

APPEAL from Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

By notice of appeal dated 2 June 1987, the Attorney-General appealed against the decision of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. that the preliminary point of law "Whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding injunction against another party, and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof, constitutes a criminal contempt of court upon the footing that it assaults or interferes with the process of justice in relation to the said injunction," be answered in the negative and the dismissal of the Attorney-General's motion.

The grounds of appeal were that the Vice-Chancellor, having found that the publications by the respondents might well render the injunctions against "The Guardian" and the "Observer" valueless and thwart the establishment of the Crown's rights against those newspapers and having found that the Attorney-General's stance was "in accordance with established principles" (although he was also of the erroneous view that the Attorney-General was seeking to widen the application of the law of criminal contempt), should have found that the publications complained of were, or were capable of being, criminally contemptuous. The Vice-Chancellor wrongly posed the question "Whether, due to the chance that there is in existence an order of the court preventing "The Guardian" and the "Observer" from publishing, the appropriate sanction is contempt of court" and should have posed the question whether the publication complained of thwarted the court's orders and interfered

A with the process of justice in the proceedings against "The Guardian" and the "Observer," and answered it in the affirmative.

After the hearing of the appeal, Sir John Donaldson M.R. announced that the court allowed the appeal but reserved judgment giving the reasons of the court for doing so.

B John Laws and Philip Havers for the Attorney-General.

Christopher Clarke Q.C. and Adrienne Page for the publisher and editor of "The Independent."

John Mathew Q.C. and Jonathan Caplan for the publisher and editor of "The London Evening Standard."

Charles Gray Q.C. and David Pannick for the publisher and editor of "The London Daily News."

C SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. We propose to give full judgments at a later date but we are all aware that the public may have some difficulty in understanding what are the issues in this appeal, so let me explain.

D In June 1986 the Government sought and were granted orders forbidding "The Guardian" and the "Observer" newspapers from publishing information derived from or attributed to Mr. Peter Maurice Wright concerning the British Security Service. They were not final orders. They were intended to last until the trial of the action unless earlier revoked on the application of "The Guardian" or the "Observer." Those newspapers have in fact made such application, and it will be considered in the near future by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

E In April 1987 "The Independent," "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News" published information said to have been derived from Mr. Wright. The Attorney-General, acting in his official capacity as the person responsible for ensuring that there is no interference with the administration of justice in this country and not as a member of the Government, complained that these publications constituted a contempt of court. The newspapers replied that the court orders did not require them to refrain from publication: they only required "The Guardian" and the "Observer" to do so.

F The matter came before Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.C. All concerned thought at the time—although with the benefit of hindsight possibly mistakenly—that the most convenient course was not to inquire into the full facts surrounding these publications, but instead to consider whether the conduct of the newspapers could in any circumstances be held to be a contempt of court. The Vice-Chancellor held that it could not.

G The Attorney-General appealed. Once again, he was not acting on behalf of the Government. He was performing his duty to safeguard the administration of justice. This does not mean to say that he was right, but, believing as he did that there had been a serious contempt of court, he was doing no more than his duty in bringing it to the attention of the court. It is this appeal with which we have been concerned.

H On 12 July 1987 "The Sunday Times" published extracts from Mr. Wright's book. On 14 July 1987 the book was published in the United States and some copies were imported in a blaze of publicity. These are not matters which should or can concern us at present. It is for the Government to decide what it wishes to do about its action against "The Guardian" and the "Observer." It is for "The Guardian" and the "Observer" to ask the Vice-Chancellor to expedite their applications to be released from the injunctions which bind them at present, if that is what they wish. It is for the Attorney-General to decide whether to charge "The Sunday Times" with contempt of court.

Our concern is solely with the appeal from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. He held that the three newspapers could not be in contempt of court. In our judgment he was wrong. All three newspapers could indeed have been in contempt of court. So could "The Sunday Times" and any other newspaper which published information attributed to Mr. Wright. We say "could be" in contempt of court and not "were" in contempt of court because none has as yet had an opportunity of putting forward a defence. We should also make it clear that if any publisher has been advised that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor gave them a licence to publish without committing a contempt of court his adviser has made an elementary error of law. In reversing the decision of the Vice-Chancellor we are not changing the law—we are declaring what it has always been. If, for example, the publication by "The Sunday Times" would otherwise have been a contempt of court, the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor did not make it anything else.

The situation which has arisen is completely novel, but it could be repeated in quite different contexts. It is therefore important that we should give guidance on the relevant law. This concerns in particular the intentions of the person said to be in contempt of court. This is a complex problem. Since, subject to the views of the House of Lords, our judgments will determine the law which is to be applied not only in these cases but in any other similar cases, we wish to take time to consider our judgments and put them into writing. I should like to emphasise that the issues with which we are concerned do not depend in any way upon the continuance of the Government's claims against the "Observer" and "The Guardian." They are of permanent importance.

That said, the media need to know where they stand. The answer is that any publication of information derived from or attributed to Mr. Wright could be a contempt of court. Whether it will in the event be held to be a contempt of court will depend upon a number of factors upon which we shall seek to give guidance in our judgment. However, no one can be held guilty of being in contempt of court unless and until they have been given an opportunity of putting forward their defence. None of these three newspapers has as yet had that opportunity, which must await a further hearing in the Chancery Division of the High Court. Meanwhile, all we can say is that interference with the course of justice is a very serious matter, and publishers will no doubt wish to consider their duty with care before they do anything which could have this result.

Cur. adv. vult.

17 July. The following judgments were handed down.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. In this appeal the Attorney-General seeks to reverse the answer given by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. to a preliminary question of law formulated in contempt proceedings brought by the Attorney-General against the respondents. I can well understand the attraction of formulating such a preliminary point but, as so often happens, it can seem less obviously sensible at a later stage in the proceedings. Thus, in the present case, I personally do not think

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A that the question as framed permits of any answer other than "It all depends," which is not very helpful. However, all concerned know that the real issue is whether in the circumstances of this case, which are not substantially in dispute, the defendants could be guilty of contempt of court and the question can, if necessary, be rephrased to raise that issue: see Ismail v. Polish Ocean Lines [1976] Q.B. 893. The circumstances being all important, I must now advert to the background facts, although they are well known to all.

B Mr. Peter Maurice Wright, who lives in Tasmania, was for many years a servant of the Crown and a member of the British Security Service. He retired on 31 January 1976. Rightly or wrongly, he concluded that the activities of the service whilst he was a member had been unlawful and that this should be investigated and exposed. He therefore submitted a memorandum to the chairman of a select committee of the House of Commons. The result was, in his view, unsatisfactory and he decided to write and publish his memoirs in Australia. This came to the notice of the authorities in this country and in September 1985 the Attorney-General began proceedings in the Supreme Court of New South Wales against Mr. Wright and the proposed publishers, seeking to restrain publication.

D So much has been said about state secrets that I must stress that the basis of the Attorney-General's claim to be entitled to restrain publication was not that Mr. Wright might be in breach of the Official Secrets Act 1911. It was that by the terms of his employment with the Security Service he had a duty of confidentiality which would be breached if he published his memoirs. Confidentiality, not official secrecy, was and still is the central issue.

E Now, it is a fact of life that a major legal action takes time to prepare and justice cannot be done if it is ill-prepared. Meanwhile, the court does not know which party is right and it must therefore try to preserve the rights of both parties until the trial. This is plain common sense and basic justice. How this is done depends very much on the nature of the rights being asserted, the ability of each party to compensate the other if it is held to be in the wrong and the background circumstances of the case. Sometimes the court can allow the defendant, pending the trial, to continue with the action which is said to be unlawful, because it is satisfied that if indeed it is ultimately so held, the complainant, who has had to put up with the continuance of the unlawful action, can be compensated by an award of damages. In others it will decide that the rights of both parties are better preserved by forbidding the continuance of the allegedly unlawful action because, for example, if the action is ultimately held to have been lawful and the defendant has suffered damage by the suspension of his rights pending the trial, the complainant can be made to compensate him by an award of damages. This is not to say that a citizen can dash along to the court and get an order limiting the defendant's freedom of action simply on the basis of his, possibly paranoid, assertion that he will succeed at the trial. Far from it. The courts, whilst carefully refraining from reaching even a tentative conclusion on who is right, still have to make certain that the complainant citizen has a case which is sufficiently plausible to be taken seriously.

H In a word, if there is a genuine dispute which cannot be resolved at once, the court must hold the ring until this can be done. In that waiting period when each party is preparing for the trial, it must give each side the benefit of any doubts, it must assume that either party may win and it must seek to preserve the rights of both parties. In other words, it must undertake a damage limitation exercise for the benefit of whomsoever it may ultimately concern.

It is at this point that a special consideration arises when the dispute concerns information which is said to be confidential. If the parties are arguing about the ownership of a horse or a car, it may not matter who keeps the horse or car pending the trial. If, as things turn out, the court has given it to the wrong party, it can get it back and give it to the right party after the trial, together with damages to compensate for having been deprived of the horse or car for the time being. Not so with confidential information where, as here, one party says that it is his private property and the other says that he is entitled to publish it to the world. If, pending the trial, the court prohibits publication, the information can still be published after the trial if the defendant succeeds. But if, pending the trial, the court allows publication, there is no point in having a trial since the cloak of confidentiality can never be restored. Confidential information is like an ice cube. Give it to the party who undertakes to keep it in his refrigerator and you still have an ice cube by the time the matter comes to trial. Either party may then succeed in obtaining possession of the cube. Give it to the party who has no refrigerator or will not agree to keep it in one, and by the time of the trial you just have a pool of water which neither party wants. It is the inherently perishable nature of confidential information which gives rise to unique problems.

All this is totally elementary. So elementary is it that Mr. Wright and his Australian publishers readily undertook to the Australian courts that, pending the trial of the action, neither they nor anyone acting on their behalf would publish Mr. Wright's memoirs. Metaphorically, they would be kept in the refrigerator. Had they not given this undertaking, I do not doubt that the Australian court would have ordered them to refrain from publication.

Some time during the next nine months, the "Observer" and "The Guardian" newspapers obtained some knowledge of the contents of Mr. Wright's memoirs. Rightly or wrongly they came to the conclusion that even if this was confidential information which belonged to the Security Service, the allegations being made by Mr. Wright were so serious and so plausible that the public interest required that every citizen should know about them. The newspapers may or may not have been right, but the English courts became involved when the Attorney-General began an action to prevent them publishing information derived from or attributed to Mr. Wright in his memoirs. This is, of course, a paraphrase of the relief which was sought, but it suffices for present purposes.

What were the courts to do? They did not know whether the Attorney-General was right or whether the newspapers were right. What they did know was that there was a very serious issue to be tried and that if they forbade publication pending the trial there would still be confidential information which could be published after the trial, but that if they did not forbid publication there would no longer be any confidential information and it would be pointless even to have a trial. It was the ice cube problem once again. So the court forbade publication pending the trial.

Unlike Mr. Wright and the Australian publishers, "The Guardian" and the "Observer" did not accept the logic of this approach and

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A resisted the Attorney-General's applications both in the High Court and in the Court of Appeal. This was their right and I make no complaint. They also sought and obtained leave to appeal to the House of Lords. Again, this was their right and, again, I make no complaint, although I do not understand why, having obtained leave to appeal to the House of Lords, they do not appear to have taken any very vigorous steps to have that appeal heard. But what is interesting, and highly relevant, is that in this court, and possibly also in the High Court, the newspapers complained that it was unjust that they should be singled out for an order forbidding further publication of what they had already published, when their competitors in and around Fleet Street were not being subjected to any such order. This, they said, was grossly unfair. It was a fair point.

C The Attorney-General's answer was twofold. First, he said, no other newspaper had shown any inclination to publish this confidential information which, in his submission, was the private property of the state. He therefore had no grounds for obtaining similar orders against them. Second, he asked, how could he be expected to seek an injunction against every newspaper, every radio and television station and every publisher of books and magazines who might obtain this information and take it into their heads to publish it? Again, it was a fair point.

D My own view, which I expressed in my judgment in Attorney-General v. The Observer Ltd., The Times, 26 July 1986; Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 696 of 1986, was that the newspapers' contention was based upon a false premise. If "The Guardian" and the "Observer" were restrained from re-publishing this allegedly confidential information, other publishers were not free to do so. But I would be the first to admit that this was to some extent an instinctive reaction and the point was not very fully argued. I am, therefore, quite prepared to accept that I may have been wrong and I think that I am in no way bound by my previous expression of opinion.

F There matters rested until 27 April 1987. By that time the Australian court had concluded the trial of the action in which Mr. Wright and his publishers were defendants and had refused a final injunction against publication. That decision is currently under appeal, but the outcome of those proceedings, whilst possibly relevant to the continuation of the injunctions against the "Observer" and "The Guardian," is quite irrelevant for the purposes of the current proceedings or this appeal. What happened on 27 April was that "The Independent" published extensive extracts and summaries from Mr. Wright's book and was immediately followed by "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News," who appear to have been basing themselves upon "The Independent." "The Independent" itself claims to have received an unsolicited copy of Mr. Wright's manuscript and, after using it, to have destroyed it.

H The Attorney-General thereupon launched the present proceedings against the publishers and editors of "The Independent," "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News," alleging that the publications to which I have referred were "intended or calculated to impede obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice in that they were severally intended or calculated and in any event likely to thwart orders of the Court of Appeal made on 25 July 1986 in High Court proceedings brought by the applicant against the Observer Ltd. and others (1986 No. A.2507) and by the applicant against Guardian Newspapers Ltd. and others (1986 No. A.2509)" and claiming that accordingly the defendants were in contempt of court and should be punished.

The matter came before Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. on a preliminary point of law:

"Whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding injunction against another party and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof constitutes a criminal contempt of court upon the footing that it assaults or interferes with the process of justice in relation to the said injunction."

In a judgment of quite outstanding clarity the Vice-Chancellor reviewed the reported authorities both in this country and in Canada and concluded that this question was to be answered in the negative and that to answer it otherwise would be to "subvert the basic principles of our civil law and introduce into it uncertainty and unfairness." However, on the facts of the instant case he expressed concern at the conclusion which he had reached, saying, ante, at p. 958B-D:

"There ought to be some sanction against the publication of matters which prejudice national security and the decision as to what does prejudice national security should not be left to the judgment of the editors of individual newspapers. I had assumed that the Official Secrets Act 1911 provided the necessary sanction. If it does not, then it is for Parliament, if it thinks fit, to provide the necessary sanction by providing a public law remedy linked directly to the protection of public rights. Private rights should not be bolstered by a distortion of the law of contempt in an attempt to produce a judge-made public law protecting official secrets."

Whilst I agree that there ought to be some sanction against the publication of matters which prejudice national security, I should like to re-emphasise with all the power at my command that this case is not primarily about national security or official secrets. It is about the right of private citizens and public authorities to seek and obtain the protection of the courts for confidential information which they claim to be their property. The national security element in the present dispute is peripheral and is no more than one factor which the court had to take into account when deciding whether or not to preserve the confidentiality of the Wright information pending the trial of the Guardian/Observer action. Legislation could well take care of national security as the Vice-Chancellor suggested, but that would leave large numbers of people who claim rights of confidentiality wholly unprotected. Obvious examples are disclosures, sometimes sensational and of great interest to newspapers and their readers, by the personal staff of the famous.

Whilst I am loath to increase the length of this judgment, I do not think that I should do justice to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor if I attempted to summarise that part in which, having set out the facts and reviewed the authorities, he stated his essential reasoning and conclusions. [His Lordship set out part of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, ante, at pp. 954D—958B, and continued:] The situation with which we are faced is novel in the sense that there is no reported decision which provides any direct guidance. It is therefore appropriate to start with the first

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A principles of the law of contempt of court and indeed by distancing myself from that phrase itself. As Lord President Clyde pointed out in Johnson v. Grant, 1923 S.C. 789, 790:

B “The phrase ‘contempt of court’ does not in the least describe the true nature of the class of offence with which we are here concerned . . . The offence consists in interfering with the administration of the law; in impeding and perverting the course of justice. . . . It is not the dignity of the court which is offended—a petty and misleading view of the issues involved—it is the fundamental supremacy of the law which is challenged.”

According to Borrie and Lowe’s Law of Contempt, 2nd ed. (1983), p. 1:

C “It has been well said that the law of contempt is of ancient origin yet of fundamental contemporary importance. Contempt of court certainly has a long history—contemptus curiae is said to have been a recognised phrase in English law since the 12th century, and, as will be evidenced by the rest of this book, the law continues to play a key role in protecting the administration of justice. Essentially a creature of common law, contempt has been and continues to be developed and adapted to meet changing challenges to the ‘supremacy of the law.’ One result of this continuing development and concern to protect the many facets of the administration of justice is that there are many forms of contempt. One commentator has described contempt as ‘the Proteus of the legal world assuming an almost infinite diversity of forms,’ but equally it can be said that contempt of court is as diverse as are the means of interfering with the due course of justice.”

Despite its protean nature, contempt has been classified under two heads, namely, “civil contempt” and “criminal contempt.” Whatever the value of this classification in earlier times, I venture to think that it now tends to mislead rather than assist, because the standard of proof is the same, namely, the criminal standard, and there are now common rights of appeal. Of greater assistance is a re-classification as (a) conduct which involves a breach, or assisting in the breach, of a court order and (b) any other conduct which involves an interference with the due administration of justice, either in a particular case or, more generally, as a continuing process, the first category being a special form of the latter, such interference being a characteristic common to all contempts: per Lord Diplock in Attorney-General v. Leveller Magazine Ltd. [1979] A.C. 440, 449. What distinguishes the two categories is that in general conduct which involves a breach, or assisting in the breach, of a court order is treated as a matter for the parties to raise by complaint to the court, whereas other forms of contempt are in general considered to be a matter for the Attorney-General to raise. In doing so he acts not as a government minister or legal adviser, but as the guardian of the public interest in the due administration of justice. There is a further, but less important, distinction in that in the case of a failure to comply with some court orders, for example those relating to procedural timetables, the appropriate reaction of the court is not punishment in the form of committal, attachment or a fine, but an order striking out all or part of a claim, or refusing to entertain the whole or part of a defence.

Although it happens to be the case that the conduct complained of here is said to impinge upon the trial of an action in which the Attorney-General, acting as a minister and on behalf of the Crown, is the plaintiff, he brings the present proceedings in a quite different capacity independently of the government of the day, namely in that which I have described as "guardian of the public interest in the due administration of justice." In the light of the fact that there has been a change in the holder of the office of Attorney-General during the course of the proceedings, it should perhaps also be pointed out that they are brought not by an individual but by "the Attorney-General." Consistently with acting in this capacity, the Attorney-General's complaint is not that the respondent newspapers and their editors have breached or assisted in the breach of the orders which he obtained in the Guardian and Observer actions, but that the conduct complained of "was intended or calculated to impede, obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice."

This raises two issues. What is the conduct complained of? Can it be said to have been intended or calculated to impede, obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice? The latter is clearly a question which cannot be answered in the abstract, but depends upon the course which the administration of justice has taken and is intended by the court to take. It is for this reason, and this reason alone, that it is necessary to take account of the course which the Guardian and Observer actions had pursued, including the orders made restraining "The Guardian" and the "Observer," but no other newspapers, from publishing what I may describe as "Wright material," i.e. information obtained by Mr. Wright in his capacity as a member of the British Security Service and which was known or reasonably believed to have come or been obtained, whether directly or indirectly, from Mr. Wright or any information concerning the British Security Service which was attributed to Mr. Wright.

The Guardian and Observer actions began on 27 June 1986 with the grant by Macpherson J. of ex parte injunctions addressed to the two defendant newspapers restraining publication of Wright material. The newspapers applied to have them set aside and this application was heard and determined by Millett J. on 11 July 1986. For present purposes the variations which he made in the ex parte order are immaterial. What is material is the judge's reasons which were expressed in a judgment given in open court and were widely reported. It is therefore relevant to recall extracts of what he said:

"It has not been disputed before me that Mr. Wright's proposed book contains information acquired by him as a member of the Security Service, and that the disclosure of such information would constitute a breach of the duty of confidentiality which he owes to the Crown. Nor has this been challenged by Mr. Wright himself in the Australian proceedings. There, his defence is that the information which he seeks to disclose is (i) in the public domain and no longer confidential; and (ii) evidence of unlawful acts or serious misconduct on the part of members of the British Security Service which it is in the public interest should be published. In the application before me, these defences are repeated, but in support of a wider and more fundamental proposition. It is said: 'Where an interim injunction is sought to restrain publication by a newspaper of information which is of public importance and legitimate public

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A concern, only the most exceptional circumstances based upon cogent and compelling evidence will induce the courts to prevent publication. This is because of the fundamental importance of the right to free expression in a democratic society. It is of even greater importance where the party seeking to prevent expression is the state or its agents, and the nature of the information whose publication is sought to be suppressed concerns serious allegations of criminal misconduct and other gravely reprehensible behaviour by agents of the state.' Prior restraint of publication is a serious interference with the freedom of the press and the important constitutional right to freedom of speech. Those freedoms, however, are not absolute. . . .

B "pecuniary compensation to either party would be not merely inadequate but wholly inappropriate. In resolving the conflict, I must take all relevant considerations into account, and in my judgment these must include the facts that this is an interlocutory application and not the trial; that the injunctions sought are only temporary and not permanent; and that a refusal of injunctive relief may cause irreparable harm and effectively deprive the plaintiff of his right. . . .

C "It makes no difference that the claim to suppress publication is made by the government and not by a private litigant; the principles remain the same. Nor does the court abdicate its responsibility to decide where the public interest lies merely because national security is invoked by the Crown. The safeguard in a free society is that the conflict falls to be resolved not by the state itself but by an independent judiciary. . . .

D "the refusal of injunctive relief would permit indirect publication and effectively and permanently deprive the Attorney-General of his rights in advance of the trial."

E On appeal to this court, the same points were made in judgments which again received wide publicity and I need only cite two passages. The first is from my own judgment Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 696 of 1986:

F "Allied to this complaint is a plea that it is unjust that the defendants should be restrained from republishing allegations made by them whilst every other publisher is free to do so. The short answer to this is that if the original publications were unlawful, other publishers are not free to republish. It is true that the consequences of their doing so would be less serious, but that is another matter."

G We were told, and I accept, that this paragraph could be misunderstood by those who did not read it carefully and did not realise that I was speaking of "republishing" as contrasted with a publication of hitherto unpublished Wright material and that it was only republication whose consequences would be less serious than an initial publication. Any further publication by "The Guardian," the "Observer" or other newspapers would quite clearly add to any damage already done and so be more serious. The second is from the judgment of Nourse L.J. Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 696 of 1986:

H "Moreover, for the reasons given by Sir John Donaldson M.R., it is clear to me that confidential information which comes into the hands of a member of the Security Service is information which prima facie may not in any circumstances be used by the employee, either during or after the employment, except for the benefit of the employer. As for the newspapers and any other third party into whose hands the confidential information comes, an injunction can be granted against them on the simple ground that equity gives relief against all the world, including the innocent, save only a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. It is obvious that nobody could obtain the sort of information which is under consideration in this case without being on notice that it was confidential to the Crown.”

It is against this background that I ask myself whether at the end of July 1986, when the interim injunctive order was made against “The Guardian” and the “Observer,” a publication by “The Independent” of new, and apparently more authentic, Wright material, allegedly based upon possession of a copy of Mr. Wright’s manuscript, which neither “The Guardian” nor the “Observer” ever claimed or admitted having had, would “be calculated to impede obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice,” to quote the words of the Attorney-General’s application or “involve an interference with the due administration of justice,” to quote the words of Lord Diplock in Attorney-General v. Leveller Magazine Ltd. [1979] A.C. 440, 449. To that question I think that there can be only one answer, namely that it would. The issue in the Guardian and the Observer actions was not whether the information had been confidential to the Crown, but whether for one reason or another that confidentiality had evaporated or was overridden by a countervailing public interest. Millett J., and this court on appeal, had not only prohibited publication, including republication, by “The Guardian” and the “Observer,” but had held that, to quote Millett J., indirect publication of Mr. Wright’s memoirs, the direct publication of which was prohibited by the Australian courts, would “permanently deprive the Attorney-General of his rights in advance of the trial.” It could not have been made clearer. The court was making an order for the preservation of the confidentiality of the Wright material pending the trial. Publication meanwhile, whether by those defendants or others, would deprive the Attorney-General of his rights in advance of the trial, because information once published, at least on the scale achieved by publication in national newspapers, can never be truly confidential again.

I then ask myself whether this situation had changed in April 1987 when “The Independent,” “The London Evening Standard” and “The London Daily News” in fact published further Wright material. It is true that the Australian trial had concluded by then, and the judge had ruled that Mr. Wright was entitled to publish, but the decision was under appeal and the Guardian and the Observer actions still awaited a full trial. The answer is plain. The publication of Mr. Wright’s memoirs in full at that time would have prevented any effective adjudication upon the Attorney-General’s claim in the Guardian and the Observer actions and the publications complained of, whilst not going to this length, were very far from being of minimal effect. To the extent that they placed Wright material into the public domain, which had not previously been there, they deprived the Attorney-General of a part of the rights which he was asserting in these actions and to this extent made it impossible for the court to do justice between the parties.

I now return to the judgment of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A “(a) In no case (apart from Smith-Barry v. Dawson, the Irish case) has a third party, C, been held to be in contempt of an order restraining a named person, B, from doing an act unless C has been privy or party to the doing of an act which is a breach of precise terms of the order.”

B If Smith-Barry v. Dawson (1891) 27 L.R.Ir. 558 is accurately reported, there was some confusion between the species of contempt which consists of disobeying, or assisting in the disobedience of, an order of the court and that which consists of interfering with the due administration of justice, and this may have stemmed from the fact that no argument was addressed on behalf of the alleged contemnors. Mr. Smith-Barry had been declared by a final judgment, to which the alleged contemnors were not parties, to be entitled to possession and to quiet enjoyment of his patent rights to hold a market in the Fair Green. The C alleged contemnors had held a rival market in the Fair Green with knowledge of that decision and of the fact that an injunction had been granted against the defendant in the action prohibiting him from holding such a market. Hedges E. Chatterton said, at pp. 559–560 that the alleged contemnors were:

D “in my opinion, in just the same default as the original defendants would have been if they had done similar acts. [But] the cases cited clearly establish the right to have these attachments issued, and nothing can be more in point than the Killiney Foreshore case (unreported). But even without any of these authorities, ordinary common sense would show that persons cannot be allowed to set at defiance the order of the court because they do not happen to be named in the injunction.”

E If in an action between A and B for the possession of a dwelling house, B is ordered to give up possession and to refrain from retaking possession, A’s remedy, if someone, C, subsequently tries to dispossess him, is an action against C, not proceedings for contempt of court in disobeying an order to which C was never a party and in the breach of which he was not assisting. So long as the full importance of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.’s words “contempt of an order” are appreciated,
F I consider that this represents the law. The Attorney-General does not allege that the defendants are in contempt of the orders made in the Guardian and Observer actions or assisted in doing an act which is a “breach of the precise terms of the order,” i.e. terms which restrained conduct by the Guardian and the Observer, their servants, agents, etc.
G He claims that, given the fact that these orders had been made with a view to preserving the subject matter of the dispute, destruction of that subject matter is an interference with the due administration of justice and so a contempt of court.

H “(b) Under English law an injunction can only properly restrain a party to the proceedings from doing an act, although it may restrain him from doing the act ‘by himself, his servant or agent.’”

This appears to be a wholly correct statement of the law (Marengo v. Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd. [1948] 1 All E.R. 406), but it is capable of being misleading. The form of order now usually adopted which enjoins the defendant “by himself, his servant or agent” does not enjoin the servants or agents at all. All that the additional words do is to serve as a warning to such servants and agents that they should not assist in the doing of the prohibited act. If they do so, they will not have disobeyed the order, but they will have interfered with the due administration of justice and may be liable to be proceeded against on that account.

That this is the position is made even clearer by the two motions Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (1848) 11 Beav. 180, and Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (No. 2) (1848) 11 Beav. 181. There the injunctive order omitted any reference to servants or agents. Lord Langdale M.R. dismissed the first motion to commit Mr. Batley, the earl's land agent, who had cut down some trees which the earl had been forbidden to cut. He did so because the motion was based upon an allegation that Mr. Batley had acted in breach of the order. As Lord Langdale M.R. pointed out, the order was not addressed to Mr. Batley and he was not enjoined thereby. However, the second motion accused Mr. Batley not of breaching the order, but of knowingly assisting in a breach of the order and thereby obstructing the process of the court. As Lord Langdale M.R. put it, at p. 183:

"If the matter had been pressed, I should have found it my duty to commit Mr. Batley for his contempt in intermeddling with these matters; . . ."

"(c) As a result of (a) and (b) above, there is no English case in which a third party, C, has been held in contempt for doing any act which does not constitute a breach by the defendant enjoined, B, of the precise terms of the order."

I am not sure whether this adds anything to (a) and (b). Whilst it certainly records that no one has been able to find a reported decision involving a finding of contempt by C, where the act complained of was intimately related to an order against B but did not involve assisting in doing that precise act, I am not sure of its significance, save that it underlines the fact that this is a novel situation. There is at least one case in the books which, if C had acted differently, would have raised the point. This is Galaxia Maritime S.A. v. Mineralimportexport [1982] 1 W.L.R. 539, where A obtained a Mareva injunction against B ordering B not to remove his assets from the jurisdiction including, in particular, cargo loaded on C's ship. C for his own purposes—he wished to have the use of his ship and to allow the crew to get home for Christmas—and regardless of the wishes of B wished to remove his ship from the jurisdiction with or without the cargo. C applied successfully for the injunction to be discharged and seems to have assumed, as the court also assumed, that absent permission from the court or the discharge of the injunction, the ship could not sail. I think that C was right, but had the ship sailed with the cargo, it certainly could not have been said that he was in breach of the precise terms of the order which prohibited B exporting the cargo and still less that B would have been in breach.

"(d) The plaintiff in the proceedings, A, can apply for the committal of C even though the act of C is a criminal contempt."

This is an historical anomaly arising out of the classification of contempts as civil and criminal. If, instead, they are classified as contempts involving (a) disobedience or assisting in the disobedience of orders and (b) other conduct interfering with the administration of justice, there is no problem. A can apply in category (a) and the Attorney-General can apply in category (b). In any event it appears to cast no light upon what has to be decided in this appeal.

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A “(e) The principle underlying the law that C is in criminal contempt if he is party to a breach of the order is that the court will not allow its order to be knowingly flouted, thwarted or frustrated by any person even though he be a stranger to the action.”

B This is quite correct but, I think, nihil ad rem. The three newspapers were not parties to breaches of the actual orders in the Guardian and Observer actions which prohibited publication by those newspapers. In publishing as they did, they were intending to serve their own interests or their view of the public interest and certainly not the interests of the Guardian and Observer.

C Based on these propositions of law, Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. said that it seemed to him that the Attorney-General was seeking to widen the application of the law of criminal contempt, albeit in accordance with established principle. This I am unable to accept. The law of contempt is based upon the broadest of principles, namely, that the courts cannot and will not permit interference with the due administration of justice. Its application is universal. The fact that it is applied in novel circumstances, for example to the punishment of a witness after he had given evidence (Attorney-General v. Butterworth [1963] 1 Q.B. 696), is not a case of widening its application. It is merely a new example of its application. In that case, as here, the trial judge, Mocatta J., relied upon the fact that there was no such case in the books, but this court held that that was a distinction of fact, not principle: per Donovan L.J. at pp. 724-725.

D Next, and this is really the final stage in his reasoning apart from the practical considerations with which I must deal hereafter, Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. said, ante, p. 955E-F:

E “the question which I have to decide is whether, due to the chance that there is in existence an order of the court preventing the Guardian and the Observer from publishing, the appropriate sanction is contempt of court.”

F At the risk of appearing to be a carping critic—and I repeat my tribute to the clarity of his judgment—I think that the Vice-Chancellor misdirected himself in thus formulating the question. Contempt of court is not a sanction. Contempt of court is unlawful conduct, the sanction for which is imprisonment, attachment, a fine or an order to pay costs. So the question should at least be rephrased to read:

G “whether, due to the chance that there is in existence an order of the court preventing the Guardian and the Observer from publishing, the conduct of ‘The Independent,’ ‘The London Evening Standard’ and ‘The London Daily News’ was unlawful as constituting an interference with the due administration of justice.”

H But even this is not correct. “Chance” is not the right word. The existence of the restraining orders against the Guardian and the Observer was a fact. It was only a chance in the sense of being what I believe is known across the Atlantic as a “happenstance”—a past circumstance which was not created by any of the principal actors. So I would substitute “fact” for “chance,” whilst at the same time appreciating that I have to consider whether it is a very material fact, one which made any real difference.

This brings me to the very interesting and, as I think, crucial decision in In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) [1984] 1 W.L.R. 1422.

There Balcombe J. made an order prohibiting publication of information about the ward by the "News of the World," which was a party, and any other person who should have notice of the order. It was effective in fact and I am wholly satisfied that it was also effective in law. What is interesting is why it was effective in law.

As Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. pointed out, English civil courts act in personam. They adjudicate disputes between the parties to an action and make orders against those parties only. This is true even in proceedings under R.S.C., Ord. 113, which permits proceedings against "persons unknown." They become parties. What is not permissible is to make an order against a stranger to the action. In Iveson v. Harris (1802) 7 Ves.Jun. 251, 256, Lord Eldon L.C. said:

"I have no conception, that it is competent to this court to hold a man bound by an injunction, who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause."

Yet that is what Balcombe J. purported to do. To say that the jurisdiction of the court in wardship involves a peculiar parental or administrative responsibility to which the disposal of controverted questions is only incidental, is no explanation. This only means that this jurisdiction is unusual in the extent to which it involves extended judicial supervision throughout the wardship, which may last for years.

I sympathise with the position in which Balcombe J. found himself. The proper discharge of the wardship by the court in the exercise of the ancient duties of parens patriae made it essential that there should be no publication and he had to find a way of achieving this result. But had any newspaper, other than the "News of the World," published details of the ward and had the Attorney-General sought to commit it or its editor for contempt consisting of disobedience of the order, the motion would have been dismissed. It would have been a replay of Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington, 11 Beav. 180, which would have been indistinguishable. The fact that the order was addressed to the alleged contemnor would rightly have been disregarded as done without jurisdiction. But if the Attorney-General had moved instead upon the ground that the publication interfered with the administration of justice (Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (No. 2), 11 Beav. 181), he would have succeeded and the fact that publication had taken place notwithstanding the warning conveyed by the form of the order would have been an aggravating circumstance.

Now what of the "chance" or "fact" that the court had made an order against the "News of the World?" The court is entitled to administer justice in whatever way it considers appropriate, although this is, of course, governed by precedent and principle. Thus, exceptionally, it can conduct proceedings wholly in camera, including concealing the identity of the parties and the judgment: Reg. v. Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, Ex parte New Cross Building Society [1984] Q.B. 227. In the particular case Balcombe J. decided to administer justice by concealing details concerning the ward and announced this fact because it was unusual. He would have had no need to announce that the court would not permit its ward to be married without its consent, because this is well known. Having once determined how justice was to be administered, any interference with that course of action would be unlawful and punishable as a contempt. The order was thus very material. Without it any newspaper could have said, rightly,

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A that Balcombe J. was not administering justice in a way which involved concealment of information about the ward, otherwise than in the context of particular applications in the wardship.

B The instant case is almost exactly analogous. In fact the ex parte injunction was granted as soon as, or even before, the writ was issued and the proceedings begun. But suppose that there had been an interval of a week between the writ and the injunction, with publication of the Wright material meanwhile. This would not have been a contempt, because the court would not have indicated that it proposed to administer justice between the Attorney-General and "The Guardian" and the "Observer" by preserving the confidentiality of the Wright material pending the trial and no one would have had any reason to know that it did so intend. Knowledge of how the court is administering, or intends to administer, justice is of the essence of the unlawfulness of conduct which interferes with that administration, whether or not that conduct consists of disobedience to an order. Once the court had announced its intention of preserving the confidentiality of the Wright material, the position was quite different. The order itself, reinforced by the statement of Millett J. that:

D "the refusal of injunctive relief would permit indirect publication [of the Wright memoirs] and effectively and permanently deprive the Attorney-General of his rights in advance of the trial" and by my own statement that other newspapers would not be free to republish, had made it abundantly clear that the court was intending to preserve the confidentiality of the Wright material pending the trial. This was its chosen method of administering justice and "The Independent," "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News" can have been in no doubt that this was the case.

E I now turn to the practical considerations which moved Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. or confirmed him in his view.

F The take-over bid

It is difficult to comment on this without knowing more of the cause of action being alleged by B, but the short answer is that a sale by C to X could not interfere with the course of justice in any circumstances which I can foresee, because the sale, and everything done in consequence of it, could be reversed by court order if justice so required.

G Cutting down the trees

H In the example given, A alleges a right to prevent B from cutting down trees on B's land and C claims a right against B to cut them down. If there was any question of C's right being subject to A's right, as well there might be, this would be a contempt and C should apply to be joined in the action. If C's right was wholly independent, so that, in effect, A's right was admittedly subject to C not exercising his right, there would be no contempt, because the administration of justice between A and B would not be interfered with.

Defamation

Defamation is an assault on reputation analogous to a physical assault on the person. If B is enjoined not to assault A and C then assaults A, there is no interference with the administration of justice in the action A v. B. It is simply a further tort or crime. Similarly with defamation. The court will prohibit a second defamatory statement (or blow) by B, but the subsequent making of the same defamatory statement by C (i.e. an additional blow) will not interfere with the administration of justice as between A and B. It is simply an independent tort if, in the end, it cannot be successfully defended. This is not to say that the publication by C might not constitute a contempt of court, even if C was not enjoined and even if he claimed that he was in a position to justify his defamatory statement. It would all depend upon whether it would in fact interfere with the administration of justice: see Attorney-General v. News Group Newspapers Ltd. [1987] Q.B. 1, where this court made it clear that the rule in Bonnard v. Perryman [1891] 2 Ch. 269 was subordinate to the rule of law that conduct which interfered with the administration of justice was a contempt of court.

The trade secrets

This is another case upon which it is difficult to comment without knowing more of the facts. The issue would be whether the revelation of trade secrets by C, whether authorised or not, would thwart the administration of justice as between A and B. I can imagine differing scenarios in which different answers might be given and it certainly cannot be said that an injunction restraining B would automatically restrain C. Indeed I should be surprised if it did, if only because A's claim would usually relate to trade secrets entrusted by him to B and not those entrusted by him to C, even if they were the same. In the instant case, what is being asserted by all the newspapers concerned is a similar right to break the confidentiality of the Wright material. This is being determined in the Guardian and the Observer actions and any publication by anyone else meanwhile would frustrate the administration of justice in that action. The element of uncertainty stems only from not knowing the full facts of the hypothetical case.

The industrial dispute

An order restraining B from picketing A's premises would not render picketing by C a contempt of court, because it would not interfere with a determination of whether B was entitled to picket and the giving of remedies to A if it was unjustified. It is only if picketing by C would lead to the irreparable collapse of A's business rendering a resolution of his dispute with B impossible or irrelevant that there would begin to be an analogy with the present situation.

The Vice-Chancellor also expressed the view that if the Attorney-General's submissions were correct, third parties alleged to be in contempt would be deprived of what he described as "very elaborate procedural safeguards" and he instanced personal service of the order, the indorsement of a penal notice on the order and the care which is taken to ensure that the conduct complained of constitutes a breach of the express terms of the order. In particular, he said that if the Attorney-General's contentions were right, the alleged contempt could consist of doing some act inconsistent, not with the terms of the order, but with the purpose of the order. This confuses the category of contempt which consists of disobeying or assisting in the disobedience of an order with the general category of contempt, namely, interfering with

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A the due administration of justice. None of these procedural safeguards has ever been applied, or could apply, in the latter category. The test of contempt or no contempt in that category is not inconsistency with the purpose of the court's order; it is in every case, and whether or not there is an order, simply whether the alleged contemnor knowingly interfered with the due administration of justice by the court. In almost B all cases, given the facts the answer is obvious to anyone, as it is in this case, and, for my part, I can see nothing in the result which offends the basic principles of natural justice. What would offend those principles would be to hold that these newspapers were free to destroy the subject matter of the action between the Attorney-General and "The Guardian" and the "Observer" newspapers, incidentally whilst denying the defendants in that action the same right, thus depriving both the C Attorney-General and those newspapers of their right to have their dispute determined in accordance with law.

I am conscious that, despite the length of this judgment, I have not referred to the Canadian authorities. Suffice it, perhaps, to say that I, like the Vice-Chancellor, have found the guidance which they offer limited and confused.

D In general I think that there is force in Mr. Laws's submission that it would be unwise for courts to spell out in orders addressed to B what would or would not constitute a contempt by C, lest the failure to do so lead C to think that he was free to take any action not so specified, regardless of whether or not it would interfere with the due administration of justice. In the exceptional circumstances that one or more newspapers are forbidden to publish confidential information because to do so would E destroy any rights which the plaintiff may have and that any publication by other newspapers would have the same effect, it seems, with hindsight, that this might have been a sensible course to have adopted and one which, however irregular, would probably in fact have prevented the present situation arising. However, I am quite clear that the failure to do so does not render the newspapers' conduct any less capable of constituting a serious contempt of court.

F In seeking to do justice to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor I have strayed, albeit sometimes somewhat tentatively, down a number of byways. Now I shall return to what actually happened. The first to publish was "The Independent" which in a leading article dated 27 April 1987 stated:

G "The decision to publish material from the manuscript of Peter Wright's thus far unpublished book Spycatcher was not taken lightly.
The government's determined effort to prevent publication in Australia of Mr. Wright's memoirs speaks for itself. Our justification is simple. It is in the public interest that facts about the operation of M.I.5 become known in order that the debate about the proper oversight and supervision of the security and intelligence services can be better informed."

H The other two newspapers presumably were of the same view.

The preliminary question of law does not address itself to the question of what was the justification for the newspapers' actions or what were their intentions in publishing. The assumption being made was that, on the view of the law which was put forward by the newspapers and accepted by the Vice-Chancellor, these considerations were irrelevant. With all respect I cannot accept this. Test it this way.

Suppose, contrary to the facts, that the sole intention of the newspapers in publishing was to render nugatory the trial of the action brought by the government against the Guardian and the Observer. In my judgment there could not be a clearer contempt of court but, on the answer given by the Vice-Chancellor, the newspapers could say that no offence had been committed. That cannot be right.

Curiously, this point was never put to the Vice-Chancellor and was never raised in argument before us. It only occurred to us after we had adjourned to consider our judgments and it seemed so fundamental that we thought it right to invite further argument on whether intent "to impede or prejudice the administration of justice" (to quote section 6(c) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981) was or was not a relevant consideration and, if it was, what was the nature of the intention which had to be proved if a contempt of court was to be established.

Mr. Clarke, appearing for "The Independent," submitted that if the conduct of the newspapers does not constitute an actus reus, or criminal act, it matters not whether they have the necessary mens rea, or criminal intent. This is quite right and perhaps fortunate. If ordinary citizens could be convicted of offences which they intended to commit, but never got round to committing, the prisons would be even fuller than they are at present. But that is not this case. Indeed this is the converse of that case. Here the newspapers without doubt have interfered with the administration of justice by rendering the trial of the government's claims against the Guardian and the Observer less effective. They have therefore committed the actus reus. The real question is whether they had the necessary mens rea or criminal intent. It is to that question that I now turn.

Mens rea in the law of contempt is something of a minefield. The reason is that it is wholly the creature of the common law and has developed on a case by case basis, as no doubt it will continue to do. The Act of 1981 did not seek to systematise the approach of the courts. It simply defined by section 1 a term of art, namely, "the strict liability rule," as meaning:

"the rule of law whereby conduct may be treated as a contempt of court as tending to interfere with the course of justice in particular legal proceedings, regardless of intent to do so."

There may well be instances of conduct which would be treated as contempt of court regardless of intent to do so, but which do not fall within this defined term. One example may be Attorney-General v. Butterworth [1963] 1 Q.B. 696, because the act complained of—punishing a witness for having given evidence in proceedings after those proceedings had been concluded—was calculated to interfere with future proceedings in general and not "particular legal proceedings." Another would be the offence of marrying a ward of court or taking the ward out of the jurisdiction without in each case first obtaining the court's permission, because the gravamen of the charge is not interfering with the course of justice in proceedings.

The contempt alleged against the three newspapers quite clearly falls within the category of contempt to which the Act applies and accordingly the limitations and defences set out in sections 2 to 5 apply. The most important of these is section 2(3) which provides:

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

- A "The strict liability rule applies to a publication only if the proceedings in question are active within the meaning of this section at the time of the publication."

The proceedings between the Government and "The Guardian" and the "Observer" newspapers were not active in this sense when the three newspapers published the Wright material and accordingly they cannot be charged with contempt of court on a strict liability basis. This, Mr. Laws, for the Attorney-General, fully accepts. But this does not mean that they cannot be charged on a basis which involves having regard to intent and indeed section 6(c) expressly contemplates and saves such a possibility when it provides:

- C "Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this Act—. . . (c) restricts liability for contempt of court in respect of conduct intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice."

- D This at once raises the question, "What kind of intent?" Mr. Laws contending for a general or basic intent and the newspapers for a specific intent. In the light of the policy of Parliament as evidenced by section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, and the likelihood that in passing the Act of 1981 Parliament intended to accept the recommendations of the Phillimore Committee (Report of the Committee on Contempt of Court (1974) (Cmnd. 5794)), I am quite satisfied that what is contemplated, and what is "saved," is the power of the court to commit for contempt where the conduct complained of is specifically intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. Such an intent need not be expressly avowed or admitted, but can be inferred from all the circumstances, including the foreseeability of the consequences of the conduct. Nor need it be the sole intention of the contemnor. An intent is to be distinguished from motive or desire: see per Lord Bridge of Harwich in Reg. v. Moloney [1985] A.C. 905, 926.

Summary

- F Although it has been necessary to explore this matter in considerable detail and depth, I can summarise the position very shortly. (1) Confidential information, whatever its nature—personal, financial, technical or security—has one essential common characteristic. It is irremediably damaged in its confidential character by every publication and the more widespread the publication, the greater the damage. (2) If a prima facie claim to confidentiality can be established, but this is opposed by a claim of a right to publish, whether on grounds of the public interest or otherwise, these opposing and wholly inconsistent claims must be evaluated and balanced the one against the other. (3) The public interest in ensuring that disputes are resolved justly and by due process of law may require a different balance to be struck at different stages. Thus, pending the trial of the action, the balance will normally come down in favour of preserving confidentiality, for the very obvious reason that, if this is not done and publication is permitted, there will be nothing left to have a trial about. (4) It is for the courts, and not for either of the opposing parties, to decide where, in the public interest, that balance lies. (5) Third parties—strangers to the action—who know that the court has made orders or accepted undertakings designed to protect the confidentiality of the information pending the trial, commit a serious offence against justice itself if they take action which will damage or destroy the confidentiality which the court is seeking to protect and so render the due process of law ineffectual. (6) If such third parties, having a legitimate interest in so doing, wish to contest the court's decision to protect the confidentiality of the information on any grounds, including in particular that they have special rights or interests of which account has not been taken, they should apply to the court which will hear them and make any modification of its orders which may be appropriate. This is a well-established procedure which works speedily and well in the context of ex parte orders, such as those made in the exercise of the Mareva and Anton Piller jurisdictions. Similarly they should apply to the court if they have doubts whether the action which they contemplate taking is lawful. (7) It is for the courts, and not for third parties, to decide whether, balancing competing public and private interests including those of the third parties, confidentiality should continue to be preserved at any particular time.

I would answer the question raised on this appeal by holding that the conduct of the respondents could constitute a criminal contempt of court, but that it is impossible to say whether it did or did not do so until they have been given an opportunity of being further heard and the court has determined whether, in so conducting themselves, the respondents intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. I would allow the appeal and remit the matter to the High Court.

LLOYD L.J. On 27 April 1987, the day on which "The Independent" published material from the manuscript of Peter Wright's book Spycatcher, there appeared in the same paper a leader under the heading "When the Security Service turns to treason." The theme of the leader can be gathered from a single sentence:

"Mr. Wright's first-hand description of illegality and incompetence within the Security Service is deeply shocking and amounts to an unambiguous case for a form of scrutiny which goes beyond the present system of ministerial oversight."

"The Independent's" justification for publishing the material is equally succinct:

"It is in the public interest that facts about the operation of M.I.5 become known in order that the debate about the proper oversight and supervision of the security and intelligence services can be better informed."

It is obvious from these extracts that this case involves issues of the greatest public importance. It is, therefore, all the more important to be clear what this particular appeal is about, and what it is not about.

It is not about the oversight and supervision of the security and intelligence services. Nor, on this appeal, do we have to decide whether the articles in "The Independent," "The London Evening Standard" and "The London Daily News" were in contempt of court. Our sole task is to answer the preliminary question of law formulated by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C., namely, whether a person who is not party to an order of the court can nevertheless be in contempt of court if he does something which interferes with the course of justice by frustrating the purpose of that order. The Vice-Chancellor, in a judgment to which I

A too would pay my respectful tribute, has answered the question of law in favour of the respondents. The effect of answering the question that way will be, as I understand it, to bring these contempt proceedings to an end. Thus "The Independent" and the other newspapers would not be liable for contempt even if the facts turned out to show that they intended to interfere with the course of justice by frustrating the purpose of the order in "The Guardian" and the "Observer" cases.

B The grounds of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment can be summarised as follows. (i) In no case other than the Irish case of Smith-Barry v. Dawson (1891) 27 L.R.Ir. 558 has a third party, not subject to the order of the court, been held liable for contempt for doing an act which is prohibited by the order, unless he has aided and abetted a breach of the order by the person enjoined. Since there is no question here of "The Independent" having aided or abetted a breach by "The Guardian" or
C the "Observer," it would involve an extension of the law of criminal contempt to apply it in the present case. (ii) While it is open to the court to extend the law, nevertheless the court should be wary of doing so, since the liberty of the subject is involved. (iii) To apply the law of contempt to a person who is not party to the order in question would not only widen the application of the law, but also infringe a fundamental D principle that the courts do not make orders against all the world. The court acts in personam. Accordingly its orders only operate in personam, never in rem. (iv) To hold that a person who is not party to the order, and not party to the breach of the order as aider and abetter, may nevertheless be liable for contempt on the ground that he has contravened or frustrated the spirit of the order would be to introduce a degree of E uncertainty which is incompatible with the imposition of a criminal sanction. It would also be contrary to natural justice, since he would be bound by the effect of an order in respect of which he had no opportunity to be heard.

Now I agree entirely with the first two steps in the Vice-Chancellor's reasoning. Although there are dicta in Seaward v. Paterson [1897] 1 Ch. 545 and Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington, 11 Beav. 180 which may
F be said to support a wider principle, I regard those cases as having decided, and decided only, that a person may be liable in contempt if, with knowledge of the order, he aids and abets a breach of the order by the person enjoined. The same is true of Z Ltd. v. A-Z and AA-LL [1982] Q.B. 558. It was held in that case that the bank would be liable for contempt if, with knowledge of the Mareva injunction, it enabled its G customer to act in breach of the terms of the injunction, even though the injunction had not yet been served on the customer. The customer could not, of course, be liable in contempt himself until notice of the injunction had been properly served. But he could breach the injunction as soon as it was granted; and the bank could therefore be liable in contempt for aiding and abetting that breach.

H So the cases are of no help to Mr. Laws. I would only add, before leaving the cases, that it would be an improvement of this branch of the law if aiding and abetting a breach of a court order were re-classified as a civil contempt rather than a criminal contempt. The best course would no doubt be to abolish what remains of the distinction altogether, in accordance with the recommendations of the Phillimore Committee, Report of the Committee on Contempt of Court (Cmd. 5794). But if the distinction is to remain, it does not make sense that a stranger to the order, who aids and abets a breach, should be criminally liable while the person to whom the order is directed and who himself commits a breach should only be liable for civil contempt. That is the sort of nonsense which does no credit to the law, as was pointed out forcibly enough by Lord Atkinson nearly 75 years ago in Scott v. Scott [1913] A.C. 417.

It is when he comes to the third step in his reasoning that I begin with great respect, to part company from Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. I accept, of course, that it is a fundamental principle with certain very limited exceptions, of which the best established is wardship, that our courts act in personam. As Lord Eldon L.C. said in Iveson v. Harris (1802) 7 Ves.Jun. 251, 256:

“I have no conception, that it is competent to this court to hold a man bound by an injunction, who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause.”

That dictum was repeated with approval by Lord Uthwatt in Marengo v. Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd. [1948] 1 All E.R. 406, 407: see, also, Brydges v. Brydges and Wood [1909] P. 187, 191.

But the question here is not whether a third party is bound by the injunction, but whether he can be liable for contempt even though he is not bound by the injunction. He cannot be liable in contempt for breach of an order to which he is not a party; nor, on the facts of the present case, could the respondents be liable for aiding and abetting a breach. But it does not follow that they may not be liable for interfering with the course of justice. Thus, to take a wholly improbable example in order to illustrate the point, suppose a party to certain proceedings assaults or abuses the judge; suppose the judge makes an order against him in the proceedings prohibiting him from repeating his abusive conduct. If a stranger comes to court and abuses the judge in like manner, it will surely not be a defence to a charge of contempt that he was not a party to the order. His conduct amounts to a contempt of court independently of any order made in the proceedings. Nor would holding such a man liable for contempt create any undesirable uncertainty or injustice. He is assumed to know that abusing the judge is a contempt of court. Ignorance of the law will afford him no more excuse in this than in any other branch of the criminal law.

It may be said that abusing the judge is an obvious contempt, whereas interfering with the course of justice, in particular proceedings, is much less precise. This is true. Moreover I would accept that not all acts which are calculated to interfere with the course of justice will necessarily ground a charge of contempt. The act must be sufficiently serious and sufficiently closely connected with the particular proceedings. But in the present case the conduct relied on by the Attorney-General is not marginal. It is not a mere prejudging of the issue to be decided in the particular proceedings. It is not a mere usurpation of the court's function. It is the destruction, in whole or in part, of the subject matter of the action itself. The central issue in the Guardian action is whether “The Guardian” should be restrained from publishing confidential information attributable to Mr. Wright. Once the information has been published by another newspaper, the confidentiality evaporates. The point of the action is gone. It is difficult to imagine a more obvious and more serious interference with the course of justice than to destroy the thing in dispute.

That brings me to what I regard as the central difficulty in this case. If the destruction of the subject matter, that is to say the publication of

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspapers Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Lloyd L.J.

A the confidential material, is sufficient ~~to~~ constitute the actus reus of contempt, then the injunction against "The Guardian" becomes irrelevant. "The Independent," and the other newspapers, would be liable for contempt by reason of the destruction of the subject matter of the action, even if the court had never granted an interlocutory injunction against "The Guardian." Mr. Laws was unwilling to take his argument that far, and I can understand why not. To take another example mentioned in the course of the argument, suppose the subject matter of the action—the res litigiosa—were the ownership of a racehorse. If a third party, knowing of the litigation, were to shoot the horse for reasons of his own, or for no reason at all, could he be liable for contempt? Mr. Laws shied away from answering that question "Yes." Yet the subject matter of the action would have been destroyed just as surely as in the case of confidential information. So Mr. Laws was driven to accepting that the injunction against the Guardian is indeed an essential plank in the Attorney-General's proceedings for contempt. The injunction is not irrelevant, as in the example of the stranger who abuses the judge.

D But if the injunction is not irrelevant, if it is something more than the fifth wheel of the coach, then Mr. Laws is in the difficulty, which the Vice-Chancellor regarded as insuperable, that the injunction is being given at least some legal effect against a stranger who is not party to the proceedings and has not had an opportunity to be heard; the injunction is being treated as having at least some validity contra mundum.

E I am bound to say that I have not found the solution to this conundrum easy, and my mind has wavered during the course of the argument and since. The reasons marshalled by the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment, and the arguments advanced on behalf of the respondents in this court, are very powerful. But in the end I have come down in favour of the Attorney-General. Before stating my reasons, I wish to quote what I regard as a crucial paragraph from the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, in which he is dealing with the objections to the principle contended for by the Attorney-General, ante, p. 957A-D:

F "There are other equally serious objections. Mr. Laws himself accepted that, in the case of some orders against B, it would not be a contempt for C to do the act which B is prohibited from doing. He instanced the case of an injunction granted in a matrimonial dispute which restrained the husband B from assaulting the wife A. G Mr. Laws accepts that if C assaults A, he would not be in contempt of court. The reason, says Mr. Laws, is that the order restraining B is plainly personal to B. But the borderline between such 'plainly personal' orders and other orders must be very uncertain. All orders are expressed as being personal. Is an order restraining an act by B in breach of his contract with A personal? If so, can C safely do an act even if the result of such act will be to frustrate the order? For example, in the case I have given of the felling of the trees, will it not be a contempt of court by C to fell the trees because A's right to prevent B from felling the trees lay in the contract between A and B? In my judgment, the distinction between personal and other orders is unworkable. It would lead to a degree of uncertainty whether or not an act was a contempt which is incompatible with the imposition of a criminal sanction."

Now I accept that the distinction between “personal” and “other” orders (though I would not adopt the terminology) may be hard to state in theory. But the line is by no means hard to draw in practice, for it corresponds to a difference in real life. “Personal” orders are those which are made, usually at the conclusion of proceedings but often at an interlocutory stage, which affect the person to whom the order is directed, and those who aid and abet him, but nobody else. “Other” orders include orders by which the court regulates its own procedure, and determines how a case is to be tried. “Other” orders will, of course, bind the parties to the proceedings. But I see no reason why such orders should not also be regarded as having a wider effect in shaping, or determining, the way in which justice is to be achieved in the particular case. If a third party with knowledge of such an order does something which disables the court from conducting the case in the intended manner, then I see no reason why that should not be regarded as an ordinary interference with the process of justice. The third party would be liable for contempt, subject to proof of mens rea, not because he is in breach of the order, but because he has prevented the court from conducting the proceedings in accordance with its intention.

Thus if, to return to the example of the racehorse, the court were to make an order under R.S.C., Ord. 29, r. 2, for the interim preservation of the racehorse, pending the outcome of the proceedings, I can see no reason why a stranger who, with knowledge of the order, shoots the racehorse should not be liable for contempt on the ground that he has interfered with the course of justice, even though he may not be bound by the order as such.

There is, I think, a useful analogy to be drawn with the power of a court to order a hearing in camera. Putting aside section 12 of the Administration of Justice Act 1960, publication of proceedings held in camera may be a contempt, not because it is in breach of the order of the court but because it is an interference with the course of justice. In Arlidge and Eady, The Law of Contempt (1982) the authors, having discussed Scott v. Scott [1913] A.C. 417; In re F. (or se A.) (A Minor) (Publication of Information) [1977] Fam. 58 and Attorney-General v. Leveller Magazine Ltd. [1979] A.C. 440, conclude at p. 244, para. 4–151:

“Since the test of contempt is not breach of the order but interference with the administration of justice, it follows that at common law a contempt may be committed even if no specific order has been made by the court affecting anyone other than those involved in the proceedings. At common law, if the court makes an order regulating its own procedure and the purpose of the order is plainly to protect the administration of justice, then anyone who subverts that order will be guilty of contempt.”

In my judgment that represents an accurate statement of the law.

So my answer to the question of law, in general terms, would be in the affirmative. But in order to avoid any doubt as to what precisely I, for my part, am deciding, I would put it this way: “The publication of confidential information which is the subject matter of a pending action, and which (i) is made in knowledge of an outstanding injunction prohibiting the publication of that information and (ii) would have the effect of destroying the subject matter of that action, in whole or in part, may constitute the actus reus of contempt.” I too would allow the

A appeal. But since the underlying question whether these articles are in contempt of court will now have to be tried, it may be helpful if, like Sir John Donaldson M.R., I say a word or two on the question of mens rea.

Mr. Laws sought to persuade us that the strict liability rule, that is to say, the rule whereby a person may be liable for contempt of court regardless of whether he intends to interfere with the course of justice, never did apply to a case such as the present. I am not sure what Mr. Laws's purpose was in advancing that submission. But whatever his purpose, I was not persuaded. I can see no reason for distinguishing between an interference with the course of justice by, for example, prejudging the issue or bringing unfair pressure to bear on the parties, to which admittedly the strict liability rule always applied, and an interference with the course of justice by destruction of the subject matter. So the strict liability rule would, in my view, have applied to the present case prior to the passing of the Contempt of Court Act 1981.

C The purpose of section 2 of that Act was to confine strict liability as defined within narrow limits. Thus it was common ground that strict liability does not apply to the facts of the present case, because the proceedings against "The Guardian" were not active, within the statutory definition, at the time of publication. But the fact that "The Independent" could not be liable here under the strict liability rule does not mean that "The Independent" cannot be liable at all. Section 6(c) specifically provides that nothing in section 2 shall restrict liability in respect of conduct intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. The question is: what is the nature of that intent?

E There are three possibilities. The first is that the contemnor is liable if he intends to do the act in question, in this case publish the article, even though he does not intend to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. It is sufficient if the article in fact impedes or prejudices the administration of justice. The second possibility is that the contemnor is liable if he intends to interfere with the course of justice—I use that phrase for brevity—or is reckless whether or not he interferes with the course of justice. The third possibility is that the contemnor is only

F liable if he intends to interfere with the course of justice.

Mr. Laws did not seek to support the first possibility. But he argued strongly in favour of the second. There was, he says, nothing in the pre-existing law to suggest that contempt of court was ever a crime of specific intent. If therefore it was necessary to show a guilty mind on the part of the contemnor, in other words when the strict liability rule did not apply, it was sufficient to show either that he intended to interfere with the course of justice, or that he was reckless whether he did so or not. This would be in accordance with the ordinary principles of criminal law. Moreover, if it were necessary to show in every case that the contemnor intended to interfere with the course of justice, the protection afforded by the law of contempt to the administration of justice would be undermined. Mr. Laws relied on the following passage from Arlidge and Eady, The Law of Contempt, p. 82, para. 2–80:

H "The best view is that contempt of court is a crime of general intent. There is insufficient authority to indicate that it is a crime of specific intent and the purpose of the jurisdiction might be too easily defeated if it were."

He also relied on a later passage, at p. 177, para. 4–46, where the authors sound a less certain note:

“Since this type of offence has hitherto been absolute, there are no authorities which indicate the precise nature of the mens rea required in the case of prejudicial publications which fall outside the Act but which are nevertheless prima facie contempts. On principle the contemnor must know the publication contains matter capable of prejudicing particular proceedings; he must know the proceedings are pending or imminent; and he must intend to prejudice these proceedings. It may be that if he is reckless as to any or all of these requirements he will also be guilty.”

If reckless interference with the course of justice was a ground of liability before the Act, as Mr. Laws submits it was, then there is nothing in the Act itself which restricts that ground of liability. It is true that section 6(c) refers to conduct intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice, and there is nothing about recklessness. But section 6(c) was enacted for the avoidance of doubt. Since there is nothing in section 1 or 2 to restrict liability based on recklessness, there was no need to refer to recklessness in section 6(c). Alternatively, “intent” in section 1 and “intended to impede etc.,” in section 6(c) must refer to general intent, i.e. basic mens rea, which would include recklessness.

Such was Mr. Laws’s argument. I cannot accept it. Mr. Clarke is surely right when he submits that the statutory purpose behind the Contempt of Court Act 1981 was to effect a permanent shift in the balance of public interest away from the protection of the administration of justice and in favour of freedom of speech. Such a shift was forced upon the United Kingdom by the decision of the European Court in The Sunday Times v. United Kingdom [1979] 2 E.H.R.R. 245, and was in any event foreshadowed by the recommendations of the Phillimore Committee, Report of the Committee on Contempt of Court (1974) (Cmd. 5794). If we were to hold that, where the strict liability rule does not apply (because, for example, the publication does not create a substantial risk that the course of justice would be seriously impeded, but only some lesser risk, or some minor impediment), the publisher might nevertheless be liable if he is reckless, we would certainly not be furthering the statutory purpose.

But Mr. Clarke has a narrower, and even more compelling, point based on the language of section 1. The strict liability rule is expressed to be a rule whereby a person may be liable “regardless of intent.” Now, whatever else recklessness may or may not mean (and the cases show that the concept is not without its difficulties) it is clear that it is independent of, and frequently contrasted with, intent. Liability based on recklessness is thus a liability regardless of intent. If that is so, then liability based on recklessness is included within the statutory description of the strict liability rule, and is therefore subject to the restrictions imposed by section 2. It must follow that recklessness does not provide the Attorney-General with an avenue of escape from section 2, which is the essence of Mr. Laws’s submission.

Putting the matter another way, section 6(c) of the Act saves from the operation of sections 1 and 2 conduct which is intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. If it was the object of Parliament to save also conduct which is reckless, then Parliament would surely have said so. Sections 1, 2 and 6(c) cover the whole ground. In cases covered by the Act to which the strict liability rule does not apply, there

Lloyd L.J.

A is no room for a state of mind which falls short of intention. There is no middle way.

I would therefore hold that the mens rea required in the present case is an intent to interfere with the course of justice. As in other branches of the criminal law, that intent may exist, even though there is no desire to interfere with the course of justice. Nor need it be the sole intent. It may be inferred, even though there is no overt proof. The more obvious the interference with the course of justice, the more readily will the requisite intent be inferred.

BALCOMBE L.J. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgments of Sir John Donaldson M.R. and Lloyd L.J., and I gratefully adopt the Master of the Rolls's exposition of the facts relevant to this appeal.

C The question, which Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. ordered to be tried as a preliminary point of law, and which he answered in the negative, was:

D "Whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding injunction against another party and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof constitutes a criminal contempt of court upon the footing that it assaults or interferes with the process of justice in relation to the said injunction."

In the course of the argument before us this preliminary point was refined in two particular respects. (i) It was taken to relate only to a case where the injunction in question is designed to preserve the subject matter of the action—in this case confidential information—pending the trial, and the nature of the subject matter is such that, if the injunction is broken, the subject matter will have ceased to exist, thereby rendering any trial between the parties pointless. (ii) The question was modified so as to ask whether such a publication was capable of constituting a criminal contempt of court, it being accepted by the parties that even if the publication was capable of being contempt of court, it would not be such unless the necessary element of intent were present. If this appeal is to be allowed, the question whether the respondents had the necessary intention to impede or prejudice the administration of justice will have to be decided, on evidence, by the court of first instance. In the event, and with the benefit of hindsight, I think that all parties would now accept that to try and resolve the issues between the parties by the determination of a preliminary point of law was a mistake.

G Contempt of court is generally categorised under two heads. Civil contempt comprises a specific failure to comply with an order of the court by which the contemnor is bound; criminal contempt is constituted by interference with the administration of justice: see Attorney-General v. Times Newspapers Ltd. [1974] A.C. 273, 307–308, per Lord Diplock. It is a contempt of the latter class which the Attorney-General contends may have been committed in the present case.

H Undoubtedly an act which interferes with the course of justice is capable of constituting a contempt of court. The books are full of cases about such acts. Some, such as assaulting an officer of the court, interference with witnesses or jurors, or disrupting court proceedings, bear little relation to the present case. Much nearer to the circumstances of the present case are those cases where a person has been held guilty of contempt by "aiding and abetting" the commission of the act forbidden by the court's order. A good example is the early case of Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (1848) 11 Beav. 180, 181, where the distinction is made very clear. The Earl of Mornington was restrained by injunction from cutting timber. His agent, one Batley, cut the timber in question, knowing that this was forbidden. A motion to commit Batley for breach of the injunction was refused, Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (No. 1), 11 Beav. 180, since he was not enjoined, but a motion to commit him for contempt, in knowingly assisting in a breach of the injunction, would have been granted by Lord Langdale M.R., but for the forbearance of the plaintiff, Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (No. 2), 11 Beav. 181. So also in Seaward v. Paterson [1897] 1 Ch. 545, it was held that the court had jurisdiction to commit for contempt a person (one Murray) not bound by an injunction, but who, knowing of the injunction, aided and abetted a defendant in committing a breach of it. In the course of his judgment Lindley L.J. said, at p. 554:

"Now, let us consider what jurisdiction the court has to make an order against Murray. There is no injunction against him—he is no more bound by the injunction granted against Paterson than any other member of the public. He is bound, like other members of the public, not to interfere with, and not to obstruct, the course of justice; and the case, if any, made against him must be this—not that he has technically infringed the injunction, which was not granted against him any sense of the word, but that he has been aiding and abetting others in setting the court at defiance, and deliberately treating the order of the court as unworthy of notice. If he has so conducted himself, it is perfectly idle to say that there is no jurisdiction to attach him for contempt as distinguished from a breach of the injunction, which has a technical meaning. . . . It has always been familiar doctrine to my brother Rigby and myself that the orders of the court ought to be obeyed, and could not be set at naught and violated by any member of the public, either by interfering with the officers of the court, or by assisting those who were bound by its orders."

A modern example is to be found in Z Ltd. v. A-Z and AA-LL [1982] Q.B. 558. That case concerned the position of a bank which had notice of the terms of a Mareva injunction before the defendant had himself received notice of the injunction. The argument and the effect of the decision is summarised in the following passage from the judgment of Eveleigh L.J., at p. 578:

"As was recognised early in the arguments before us in determining what action is called for by a bank which has notice of the terms of a Mareva injunction it is necessary to determine the basis of liability for contempt of court.

"I think that the following propositions may be stated as to the consequences which ensue when there are acts or omissions which are contrary to the terms of an injunction. (1) The person against whom the order is made will be liable for contempt of court if he acts in breach of the order after having notice of it. (2) A third party will also be liable if he knowingly assists in the breach, that is to say if knowing the terms of the injunction he wilfully assists the person to whom it was directed to disobey it. This will be so whether or not the person enjoined has had notice of the injunction.

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Balcombe L.J.

A "The first proposition is clear enough. As to the second, however, it was submitted that until the defendant had notice of the injunction nothing done by the bank could amount to contempt of court. Also two opposing views were canvassed (I use this expression as the arguments were not strictly contentious) as to the extent to which mens rea was a necessary ingredient in determining the bank's responsibility to the court.

B "I will give my reasons for the second proposition and take first the question of prior notice to the defendant. It was argued that the liability of a third party arose because he was treated as aiding and abetting the defendant (i.e. he was an accessory) and as the defendant could himself not be in breach unless he had notice it followed that there was no offence to which the third party could be an accessory. In my opinion this argument misunderstands the true nature of the liability of the third party. He is liable for contempt of court committed by himself. It is true that his conduct may very often be seen as possessing a dual character of contempt of court by himself and aiding and abetting the contempt by another, but the conduct will always amount to contempt of court by himself. It will be conduct which knowingly interferes with the administration of justice by causing the order of the court to be thwarted."

E My use of the phrase "aiding and abetting" is intended to include conduct of the kind considered by the court in Z Ltd. v. A-Z and AA-LL. But that is the extent of the English cases. There is no English authority which establishes that it is a contempt of court, in the sense of knowingly interfering with the course of justice, for a person who is not prohibited by an order to do something which is forbidden by the order, unless he is "aiding and abetting" the person named in the order. There is, however, an obiter dictum to this effect by Henry J. in United Kingdom Nirex Ltd. v. Barton, The Times, 14 October 1986.

F We were also referred to one Irish and three Canadian cases. The Irish case, Smith-Barry v. Dawson, 27 L.R.Ir. 558, a decision of Hedges E. Chatterton V.-C. at first instance, is undoubtedly authority for the proposition which the Attorney-General seeks to establish. However, the parties against whom attachment for contempt was sought did not appear and were not represented so that there was no argument against the application, and the Vice-Chancellor gave no reasoned judgment but followed an unreported case to the like effect. The persuasive effect of this case is thus extremely limited.

G The Canadian cases were all concerned with injunctions to restrain picketing in the course of a labour dispute. In all cases the order in question was expressed to operate on third parties. Thus in Bassel's Lunch Ltd. v. Kick (No. 1) [1936] O.R. 445, the order in question restrained "the defendants . . . or any one assisting or aiding them." In Tilco Plastics Ltd. v. Skurjat (1966) 57 D.L.R. (2d) 596, the order restrained the defendants "or person or persons having notice of this order." In Catkey Construction Ltd. v. Moran (1969) 8 D.L.R. (3d) 413, the order restrained the defendants "or anyone having notice or knowledge of such order." If the court has jurisdiction to restrain persons who are not parties to the proceedings in which the injunction is granted, then it follows that the court will enforce its orders against those persons who knowingly break them, and this could be the explanation of all these cases. However, it is fair to say that in the Tilco

Plastics case, Gale C.J.H.C., expressly disclaimed this as the grounds of his decision. He said, at p. 619: A

"In my opinion, the insertion of those words in the order of King J. did not affect the legal obligations of members of the public, one way or the other. The words may have been inserted to remind the respondent that the order could not be circumvented by any one having knowledge of it, but that is not material. Any person who is aware of the substance or nature of a court order cannot flout it simply because he is not expressly named in that order." B

Further, a second decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Bassel's Lunch Ltd. v. Kick (No. 2) [1937] 1 D.L.R. 235, and which was not referred to in the Tilco Plastics case, is to the opposite effect. In my judgment Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. in the present case was fully justified in saying that the state of the authorities under the law of Canada seems to be confused and I derive little or no assistance from these cases. C

Accordingly, I reach the conclusion, as did Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C., that the particular question we have to decide is not covered by binding authority. The result is that we have to approach the question as a matter of principle. D

I have already stated the principle that criminal contempt is constituted by interference with the administration of justice. Thus it will normally require two elements: (1) conduct which interferes with the administration of justice: the actus reus; and (2) the state of mind which accompanies this conduct: the mens rea. It was to the question whether the publication by the respondents of material prohibited by the Guardian and the Observer injunctions constituted the actus reus that the Vice-Chancellor devoted his attention; the question of mens rea was not argued before him. It may have been the absence of any argument as to intent that caused the Vice-Chancellor to fall into error. Certainly for my part, I was much impressed by the arguments of the respondents as to uncertainty and unfairness, which seemed conclusive to the Vice-Chancellor, as is apparent from the passages from his judgment that have been cited by Sir John Donaldson M.R. Nevertheless, once the question of intent was raised, in the circumstances mentioned by Sir John Donaldson M.R., it seemed to me that the answer to the preliminary question of law became reasonably clear. I accept, of course, that wholly different considerations are relevant in considering what conduct may constitute the actus reus, and what state of mind may constitute the mens rea. Nevertheless, in considering whether or not particular conduct is capable of constituting the actus reus, it may be appropriate to test it by considering it in relation to a particular state of mind. E F G

In the present case the orders made in the Guardian/Observer proceedings indicated the way in which the court intended those proceedings should be conducted, viz., that the information derived from or attributed to Mr. Wright should remain confidential until the trial of those actions. It cannot seriously be denied that the publications on 27 April 1987 by the present respondents may well have rendered the trial of those actions pointless, at least in relation to those matters which were then disclosed, and thereby prevented the court from conducting those proceedings in accordance with its intention. If one then considers the possibility that those publications by the respondents might have H

Balcombe L.J.

A been made with the sole intention of rendering pointless the Guardian/Observer litigation, then it seems to me impossible to say that there would then be no contempt of court: there would be both the necessary actus reus—the publications interfering with the prescribed course of justice in the Guardian/Observer actions—and the necessary mens rea. I accept that it is highly improbable that it was the respondents' sole intention to interfere with the Guardian/Observer actions, but that is the difficulty of raising a preliminary question of law: the answer to it must be apt to fit all possible hypotheses.

B So for the reasons which have been given more fully by Sir John Donaldson M.R. and Lloyd L.J. I, too, would allow this appeal and would respectfully agree with Lloyd L.J. in his formulation of the precise ambit of the decision at which we have arrived. I would remit the matter to the High Court.

C On the question of the necessary element of mens rea, it is sufficient to say that I agree with Sir John Donaldson M.R. and Lloyd L.J. that it will be necessary for the Attorney-General to establish that the respondents "intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice" within the saving provision of section 6(c) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 and that such intent does not include recklessness.

D Although I hope I have made it clear in the earlier part of this judgment that the reason why I consider that the publications of the respondents are capable of constituting a criminal contempt of court is because they interfered with the administration of justice, and not because they disobeyed orders made in the Guardian/Observer actions which were not addressed to them, I am conscious that this conclusion is reached by a sophisticated argument which may not be readily apparent to the layman. It seems to me that it would be preferable, in an appropriate case, where it is apparent that the subject matter of an action (e.g. confidential information or a secret process) could be destroyed by its publication by any person, whether a party to the action or not, for the court to make its initial protective order in terms which make it clear to third parties that they, too, must not destroy that subject matter. The question is whether the court has power, in an appropriate case, directly to order third parties not to destroy the subject matter of the action. The general principle was stated by Farwell L.J. in Brydges v. Brydges and Wood [1909] P. 187, 191:

G "But the court has no jurisdiction, inherent or otherwise, over any person other than those properly brought before it as parties or as persons treated as if they were parties under statutory jurisdiction (e.g., persons served with notice of an administration decree or in the same interest with a defendant appointed to represent them), or persons coming in and submitting to the jurisdiction of their own free will, to the extent to which they so submit (e.g., creditors of a bankrupt executor, who has carried on business under a power in the will, coming in to claim against the testator's estate in order to obtain subrogation to the executor's right of indemnity). But the courts have no jurisdiction to make orders against persons not so before them merely because an order made, or to be made, may or will be ineffectual without it. Even in the case of an injunction Lord Eldon says in Iveson v. Harris (1802) 7 Ves.Jun. 251, 256: 'I have no conception, that it is competent to this court to hold a man bound by an injunction, who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause. The old practice was that he must be brought into court, so as according to the ancient laws and usages of the country to be made a subject of the writ.”

A

See also Ranson v. Platt [1911] 2 K.B. 291 and Marengo v. Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd. [1948] 1 All E.R. 406. The last case, being a decision of the House of Lords, is clearly binding on this court, unless there is any relevant exception to the general rule. That there is at least one exception appears from a case of my own at first instance, In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) [1984] 1 W.L.R. 1422. In that case I held that, in the exercise of the wardship jurisdiction, there was power to make an order (prohibiting the publication of information about the ward) binding on the world at large, when persons who were potentially subject to that order had not been parties to the proceedings in which the order was obtained. With all respect to Sir John Donaldson M.R., that was the ratio of my decision, and I still believe it to have been correct. It is true that I then said that I was satisfied that, if it were not an exercise of the parental jurisdiction in wardship, there would be no such power, but the question whether there might be other exceptions to the general rule was not then before me. I believe that there can be another exception to the general rule which would enable the court to make an order, binding on the world at large, in the circumstances of the present case, where such an order may be appropriate to preserve the subject matter of an action pending trial. The law of contempt is but one example of the court's ability to regulate its own procedures so as to ensure that justice prevails. The rule that courts normally act only in personam is but another example of the same process. If the court needs to ensure that the subject matter of an existing action be preserved against all comers pending the trial of the action, then in my judgment the court can obtain the desired result by introducing another exception to the general rule that the court acts only in personam. I can find nothing in the cases to which I have referred, in which the general rule is stated, to say that the rule is wholly without exception, and it is not without significance that the Canadian courts have felt themselves able to make such orders.

In this connection the following passage from the speech of Viscount Haldane L.C. in Scott v. Scott [1913] A.C. 417, 437, is very much in point:

“While the broad principle is that the courts of this country must, as between parties, administer justice in public, this principle is subject to apparent exceptions, such as those to which I have referred. But the exceptions are themselves the outcome of a yet more fundamental principle that the chief object of courts of justice must be to secure that justice is done. In the two cases of wards of court and of lunatics the court is really sitting primarily to guard the interests of the ward or the lunatic. Its jurisdiction is in this respect parental and administrative, and the disposal of controverted questions is an incident only in the jurisdiction. It may often be necessary, in order to attain its primary object, that the court should exclude the public. The broad principle which ordinarily governs it therefore yields to the paramount duty, which is the care of the ward or the lunatic. The other case referred to, that of litigation as to a secret process, where the effect of publicity would be to destroy the subject matter, illustrates a class which stands on a different footing.

G

H

3 W.L.R.

A.-G. v. Newspaper Publishing Plc. (C.A.)

Balcombe L.J.

A There it may well be that justice could not be done at all if it had to be done in public. As the paramount object must always be to do justice, the general rule as to publicity, after all only the means to an end, must accordingly yield. But the burden lies on those seeking to displace its application in the particular case to make out that the ordinary rule must as of necessity be superseded by this paramount consideration. The question is by no means one which, consistently with the spirit of our jurisprudence, can be dealt with by the judge as resting in his mere discretion as to what is expedient. The latter must treat it as one of principle, and as turning, not on convenience, but on necessity."

C In my judgment this passage can apply, mutatis mutandis, to the circumstances of the present case. If an interlocutory order to prevent publication of the details of a secret process, where the effect of publicity would be to destroy the subject matter, requires to be made so as to affect third parties, then the inability to make such an order would be just as much a denial of justice as if the litigation had to take place in public.

D The ability to make an order against the world at large would of necessity be extremely limited, to be granted only in the most exceptional cases (of which I concede the present could be one), but this seems to me the more satisfactory way of dealing with the problem thrown up by the facts of this case. What I have said in the last part of this judgment is merely an attempt to suggest how the problem might better be dealt with in the future. This course would also have the advantage that a third party in breach of the terms of the order would be liable for civil, rather than criminal, contempt. There is much to be said for treating all contempt which consists (in effect) of disobedience of the terms of an order of the court in one and the same manner.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

REGINA v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT, Ex parte TURKOGLU

1987 May 19

Sir John Donaldson M.R., Croom-Johnson and Bingham L.JJ.

*Judicial Review—Bail—Civil proceedings—Dismissal of application in judicial review—Refusal of bail pending appeal—Jurisdiction of court to grant bail—Supreme Court Act 1981 (c. 54), s. 16(1)*¹

The applicant was granted bail by a High Court judge at the same time as being granted leave to apply for judicial review of the decision of an immigration officer refusing him leave to enter the United Kingdom. His application for judicial review was dismissed and the judge, considering that he had no further jurisdiction in the matter, refused bail pending an appeal.

On his appeal against the refusal of bail:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that, unless there was statutory provision or judicial precedent to the contrary, the High Court seized of a civil matter had jurisdiction to grant bail and, accordingly, the judge on refusing judicial review could have made the ancillary order of bail pending the applicant's appeal; that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction under section 16(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 to entertain the appeal against the order refusing bail and, in the circumstances, would grant bail (post, pp. 995A–B, F–G, H—996B).

In re Dhillon, The Times, 28 January 1987, C.A. doubted.

Per curiam. If a High Court judge refuses leave to apply for judicial review, he cannot grant bail because the substantive order is not appealable but, on renewing the application to the Court of Appeal, that court had an inherent jurisdiction to grant bail (post, p. 495E–F, G–H).

The following cases are referred to in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R.:

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Home Secretary, Ex p. Turkoglu (C.A.)

A the Court of Appeal against the order of the judge dismissing his application for judicial review of a decision of an immigration officer refusing the applicant leave to enter the United Kingdom.

The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R.

B Indra Kulatilake for the applicant.

Alison Foster for the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

C SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. We are concerned today with an application on behalf of Mr. Turkoglu for bail pending his appeal to this court from a decision of McCowan J. refusing judicial review in an immigration context. The grant of bail is not opposed on behalf of the Secretary of State. Indeed, the Secretary of State goes further and says that he would like bail to be granted for this reason. He has himself power under the Immigration Act 1971 to grant temporary admission, which means that the applicant for admission to this country is able to move freely about the country subject to surrendering to the immigration authorities on their demand and subject to a power of arrest which they have under the Act of 1971 if he does not surrender. But what the Secretary of State considers he has no power to do is to grant temporary admission subject to a condition that the would-be immigrant provides sureties for his surrendering to the appropriate authorities on demand. On the other hand, it is quite clear that if the court can grant bail, it can impose a condition of sureties. In this case we are invited by the Secretary of State to accede to the application but to impose terms as to sureties.

F That has raised the whole question of the powers of courts to grant bail in immigration cases. Clearly we could grant bail ancillary to or as part of proceedings for habeas corpus, but there is no way that proceedings for habeas corpus can be brought in a case of this nature. The power of the Secretary of State to detain under the Act of 1971 is clear and the only issue which would arise is whether, as a matter of public law, his decision to exercise those powers was a proper one.

G There have been no less than four reported occasions on which the courts have considered the matter thus far. The first was Reg. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Swati [1986] 1 W.L.R. 477. In that case leave to apply for judicial review had been refused by the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, and there was a renewed application for leave to apply made to this court. In giving a judgment, with which in substance Stephen Brown and Parker L.J.J. agreed, I said (obiter) under the heading "Bail," at pp. 485–486:

H "As the applicant was deemed to be in legal custody (paragraph 18(4) of Schedule 2 to the Act of 1971) and as we were agreed that leave to apply for judicial review should be refused, no question of bail arose. I would only say that, for my part, I agree that there is an inherent jurisdiction to grant bail, but that, in agreement with the Divisional Court, I consider that in the light of the statutory powers available to the Secretary of State and to adjudicators, it will only be in exceptional cases that it should be exercised and only if leave to apply for judicial review has been granted."

That case was followed by Reg. v. Chief Immigration Officer, Heathrow Airport, Ex parte Sureshkumar, The Times, 22 April 1986. It would appear from that very brief report that Lawton L.J. said:

"It seemed that Parliament had intended that all matters relating to the removal and detention of persons refused entry should be under the control of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and clearly, he could always grant temporary leave to enter. If that was so, any need for a jurisdiction to grant bail would have to be satisfied in some other way than by calling on the inherent jurisdiction of the court."

For my part, I cannot believe that that is an entirely accurate report of what Lawton L.J. said. It certainly is not a full report and we have not seen the transcript.* At any rate, it is clear that it was not a matter of the decision by this court. Lawton L.J. expressed doubts, but no more. By contrast on this occasion it is a matter for a decision.

That case was followed by In re Dhillon, The Times, 28 January 1987. It was a decision by myself, Fox and Bingham L.J.J. The headnote reads:

"Where a High Court judge refused to grant an applicant bail pending the conclusion of his adjourned application for leave to apply for judicial review, the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction itself to grant bail unless it first granted a renewed application for leave to apply for judicial review."

I will come back to that case in a moment.

The fourth case is the present case. In it we are invited to decide whether McCowan J. was correct when, after giving his decision to dismiss the substantive application for judicial review, he acceded to what appeared to be the general view of those present in court that he was functus officio and therefore had no jurisdiction to grant bail.

If I could come back to the general question of jurisdiction, in my judgment bail is to be regarded in civil proceedings—as it is in criminal proceedings—as ancillary to some other proceeding. It is not possible, so far as I know, to apply to any court for bail in vacuo. It is essentially an ancillary form of relief. The problems which have arisen really all stem from the need to find an underlying substantive proceeding to which bail would be ancillary. I said that I would come back to In re Dhillon. I am bound to say that I think I was wrong in that case. I was wrong for this reason. I was looking for an underlying proceeding to which the bail appeal to this court could be appended. There was at that time a pending application for leave to apply in the High Court, but there was no proceeding in this court. As I pointed out in the judgment, if on the adjourned hearing of the application for leave to apply before the High Court the judge had dismissed the application, there could be no appeal to this court. There would be a power to renew that application to this court, but no appeal: Lane v. Esdaile [1891] A.C. 210.

Since then it has been pointed out to me that we did not consider the effect of section 16(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981. That provides:

"Subject as otherwise provided by this or any other Act . . . the Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order of the High Court."

Reg. v. Home Secretary, Ex p. Turkoglu (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A It now seems to me that where you have a pending application for leave to apply for judicial review in the High Court and the judge either grants or refuses bail, he is making an order in proceedings of which he is properly seised. It follows that unless the right of appeal against the B order is excluded either by statute (which almost certainly would be under section 18 of the Supreme Court Act 1981) or by judicial precedent binding on us (as in the Lane v. Esdaile type of case), there would be a right of appeal. So I think that we were wrong, and that where you have an adjourned application for leave to apply and the judge has refused bail pending the resumption of that application for leave an application for bail can be made direct to this court by way of appeal from the judge's order refusing bail.

C I will now try and look at the problem overall, taking, first, the High Court. In my judgment you cannot apply to the High Court for bail unless the High Court is seised of some sort of proceeding. It may be seised of an application for leave to apply for judicial review or it may be seised of the substantive application. So long as it is seised of either of those applications, you can apply to the High Court and the court can D grant or refuse bail. From the order granting or refusing bail an appeal will lie to this court.

If leave to apply is granted, then that application immediately becomes merged in the substantive application. So there is a continuous underlying proceeding of which the High Court is seised and no problem arises. If the application for leave to apply is adjourned, the High Court is still seised of the application and it can refuse or grant leave to appeal
E and there would be a right of appeal to this court against that order.
If—and this is the only case where a problem arises—leave to apply is refused, then at that stage I do not for my part think that the High Court judge can grant bail. The reason why he cannot grant bail is that the order refusing leave to apply is not appealable because of the rule of law contained in Lane v. Esdaile [1891] A.C. 210. Where a court has F finished with a matter and its decision is unappealable then in the truest and fullest sense of the word the court is functus officio and can do no more. There is no longer any underlying proceeding to which the application for bail is ancillary.

As far as the Court of Appeal is concerned, it has jurisdiction to entertain a direct appeal against any refusal or grant of bail by the High G Court in whatever proceedings it is made, that right and duty coming straight from section 16 of the Act of 1981. In addition, it has inherent jurisdiction to grant bail in proceedings originating in this court, which in practice means on a renewed application for leave to apply for judicial review or, of course, if this court went on to hear the substantive application, although usually it will remit it to the High Court for H hearing.

I hope that that covers all the cases. This is a case in which McCowan J. would have had jurisdiction but he did not appreciate that he had it. It is a case in which there is no opposition to bail and it would therefore be right that we should grant it.

For those reasons I would allow the appeal—because it is an interlocutory appeal from McCowan J.'s refusal of bail—and grant bail. We could alternatively ourselves have granted bail in the substantive appeal proceedings, but it does not matter under which head we grant it.

Coroner—Inquest—Post mortem—Deceased involved in car crash—Death caused either by natural causes or crash injuries—Post mortem carried out before inquest ordered—Whether coroner acting lawfully—Coroners (Amendment) Act 1926 (16 & 17 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 21(1)(3)

C

The deceased was found to be dead after the car he was driving left the motorway for no apparent reason and crashed. The coroner, in order to determine whether the deceased had died of natural causes before the car crashed or had died as a result of injuries sustained in the crash, directed a post mortem examination to be made. The post mortem showed that the cause of death was multiple injuries and the coroner ordered an inquest to be held. The applicants, who were the deceased's widow and the president of a Jewish burial society whose duty it was to bury the deceased, applied for judicial review of, inter alia, the coroner's decision to direct a post mortem examination to be made before ordering an inquest. The Divisional Court granted the application on the ground that the coroner had no power to exercise his discretion under section 21 of the Coroners (Amendment) Act 1926¹ to order a post mortem before deciding whether there should be an inquest, where there was reasonable cause to suspect that the death was violent or unnatural.

On appeal by the coroner:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that under section 21(1) of the Coroners (Amendment) Act 1926 the coroner had the power to direct a post mortem examination in the case of a sudden death of unknown cause, before deciding whether to hold an inquest, where he considered that its result might prove an inquest to be unnecessary by eliminating as a matter of evidence the possibility that the death was violent or unnatural (post, p. 1006F–G).

Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1141; [1987] 2 All E.R. 536 reversed.

The following case is referred to in the judgment:

H

APPEAL from the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division.

The applicants, Sarah Sime Worch, the widow of Colin Worch, and Walter Brunner, the president of Chesed Shel Emess, a Jewish burial society, applied, by notice of motion dated 28 October 1986, for judicial review of decisions by the coroner for Greater Manchester North District to (1) direct or request a post mortem examination to be made on the body of Colin Worch, and (2) withhold issuing an order authorising the burial of the body until after the opening of the inquest, the relief sought being declarations that each decision was unlawful. On 14 January 1987 the Divisional Court (Watkins L.J. and Macpherson J.) allowed the motion in part by declaring that decision (1) was unlawful.

By notice of appeal dated 19 January 1987 the coroner appealed on the grounds that the Divisional Court erred (1) in holding that the coroner had no power in law to order a post mortem under section 21(1) of the Coroners (Amendment) Act 1926 in the circumstances; (2) in holding that the effect of section 21(3) was that a coroner had no power to order a post mortem before deciding whether to hold an inquest, if there was reasonable cause to suspect that the dead person had died a violent death, even though there was also reasonable cause to suspect a "sudden death of which the cause is unknown;" (3) in holding that if Parliament had intended a coroner to have such a power, the word "only" would have appeared in section 21(1); (4) in not holding that the coroner had set out in his two affidavits the grounds on which he had exercised his discretion to order a post mortem examination before deciding whether an inquest was necessary and that the contention in his first affidavit referring to another Act was irrelevant and/or clearly an error in the affidavit. By respondents' notice dated 9 March 1987 the applicants gave notice of their intention to contend that the decision of the Divisional Court should be affirmed on the additional grounds that (1) the coroner's belief that the deceased had died a violent death, held on reasonable grounds, made it logically inconsistent for him to hold at the same time a reasonable suspicion that the deceased had died a sudden death of unknown cause; and (2) if the coroner's construction of section 21(3) of the Act of 1926 were correct (a) the subsection was unnecessary and redundant, (b) there had to be imported into the subsection the words "after the carrying out of the said post mortem examination" following the words "there is reasonable cause to suspect," (c) the contingency of death in prison ought not to be included since it was clearly inconsistent with the notion of an exploratory post mortem, (d) there was no provision for the prospect of a post mortem still leaving the coroner with a reasonable suspicion of a sudden death of unknown cause, and (e) Parliament effected a very important change in the law without making its intention clear.

The facts are stated in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

31 July. The following judgment of the court was handed down.

SLADE L.J. This is an appeal by the coroner for Greater Manchester North District from a judgment and order of the Divisional Court (Watkins L.J. and Macpherson J.) given on 14 January 1987 whereby Mrs. Sarah Sime Worch and Mr. Walter Brunner, as applicants, were granted a declaration that the decision of the coroner made on 4/5

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Gt. Manchester Coroner, Ex p. Worch (C.A.)

A August 1986 directing or requesting that a post mortem examination be made on the body of Colin Worch deceased was unlawful.

For present purposes the facts can be stated quite shortly. On 4 August 1986 the deceased was driving along a motorway. At about 7.30 p.m. he apparently, quite suddenly, lost control of his car. It left the motorway and crashed into some obstruction. Police who were called to the scene found him dead at the wheel.

B His widow, the first applicant Mrs. Worch, was informed. She telephoned the second applicant, Mr. Brunner. He is the president of an organisation known as Chesed Shel Emess, of which the deceased was a member. This organisation is responsible for looking after the body of a Jewish person from death up to and including burial. His evidence is that those who belong to this organisation acknowledge and believe:

C "It is a sacred duty of the Jewish people to look after the body, prepare for burial and carry out the burial in accordance with the appropriate laws and customs. It is considered as such an important thing, that it takes precedence over almost all other Jewish laws and because of its importance and complexity special organisations referred to above, are established in all practising Jewish communities. . . . It is also obligatory to ensure that the burial takes place as quickly as possible and in any case before sunset, only in exceptional circumstances is it permitted for the body to be left overnight. It is very strictly forbidden to tamper with the body in any shape or form, thus a post mortem is absolutely forbidden in accordance with Jewish law."

E At about 10 p.m. Mr. Brunner informed the coroner of the accident and death by telephone. The coroner wished to hear further details from the police and at about 9.30 a.m. the following morning, 5 August, he spoke to the police officer concerned, who gave him brief details of the circumstances surrounding the death. From that conversation he learned that the police were continuing their investigations, but it was thought no other motor vehicle was involved.

F The coroner decided to hold a post mortem. In paragraph 2 of his first affidavit he made both a number of submissions of law and a number of statements of fact relating to this decision. In paragraph 2(2) he said, "I maintain that I exercised my discretion as to the holding of a post mortem under section 21(2) of the Coroners Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 71) in a proper manner." In paragraph 2(4) he said, "My discretion was exercised properly to assist myself to establish the cause of death." In paragraph 2(8) he described the reasons for his decision:

G "In the circumstances, I exercised my discretion and decided that a post mortem was necessary in order to determine whether the deceased had died as a result of injuries or had died from a natural cause so producing the injuries when the car crashed. The particular circumstances of the incident indicated that the deceased might have suffered some form of attack which produced the loss of control."

H In paragraph 2 of a later, second affidavit he further explained his reasons as follows:

"The police were continuing their investigations but it was thought at that stage that no other motor vehicle was involved. At this point, from the information given to me, I had reasonable cause to suspect that the deceased had died either a violent or unnatural death or a sudden death of which the cause was unknown. I formed the opinion that an inquest might be necessary. I then went through the reasoning process as set out at paragraph 2(8) of my earlier affidavit. I then requested a pathologist to hold a post mortem examination. I did feel that when I had the result of the post mortem examination that it would be open to me to dispose of the matter without an inquest if the cause of death were shown to be natural. It was when I was informed that the medical cause of death was multiple injuries, that is unnatural, that I decided to open an inquest."

The coroner in his first affidavit stated, and there is no reason to doubt, that he was well aware of the burial requirements and funeral arrangements for the Jewish community. It has not been suggested that he has been careless of their concern over such matters.

On 5 August 1986 a pathologist was instructed or requested to conduct a post mortem and he did so at 3 p.m. that day. He reported that the medical cause of death was multiple injuries (so that the deceased had not died a natural death). At about 3 p.m. Mr. Brunner arrived at the coroner's office, but the coroner was absent holding inquests and his office had not yet received the report of the post mortem. A short time afterwards the coroner telephoned his office and learned the effect of the pathologist's report. He ordered an inquest to take place on the following day. At about 3.30 p.m., according to his evidence, Mr. Brunner was informed by the coroner's secretary that the coroner had stated that an inquest would have to take place and that the burial order could only be issued after the opening of that inquest. In his first affidavit, the coroner explained the reasons why he considered that he should not issue an immediate burial order. These reasons are not material for the purpose of this appeal.

Mr. Brunner was upset by the information given to him by the coroner's secretary, coupled, as it was, with the statement that an inquest could not take place until the following morning, 6 August 1986. He could not understand why in any event the body could not be released for burial at once, now that the post mortem had taken place. He again spoke to the coroner on the telephone about the urgency for a burial order. The coroner informed him that his deputy was now dealing with the matter and that he would have to contact the deputy to see whether the inquest could be held earlier. Mr. Brunner attempted to contact the deputy, but was unable to do so.

The inquest was opened at 12 noon on 6 August 1986. The pathologist's report was handed to the deputy coroner. Formal evidence of identity of the deceased's body was given. Soon after that the burial order was issued on the same day, 6 August.

On 21 October 1986 Simon Brown J. gave the applicants leave to move for judicial review of the decisions of the coroner (1) to direct or request that a post mortem examination be made on the body of the deceased; and (2) to withhold issuing an order authorising the burial until after the opening of the inquest. The Divisional Court, in its decision of 14 January 1987 [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1141, refused relief under the second of these heads and there is no challenge to that part of its decision. However, it granted relief under the first head, in the terms of the declaration referred to at the beginning of this judgment. From this part of the order the coroner now appeals.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Gt. Manchester Coroner, Ex p. Worch (C.A.)

A Watkins L.J., in the course of his judgment, observed, at p. 1145, that the concern of the applicants was perfectly understandable, having regard to Jewish law and faith and custom and practice with regard to post mortems and burial. The locus standi of the applicants to apply for judicial review has not been challenged on this appeal. However, as Watkins L.J. also observed, a coroner is subject to the law laid down by Parliament and has to obey that law with scrupulous regard to all its provisions.

B We now turn to the relevant statute law. Section 3(1) of the Coroners Act 1887, as amended by section 30 of and Schedule 2 to the Coroners (Amendment) Act 1926, provides for the holding of inquests as follows:

C “Where a coroner is informed that the dead body of a person is lying within his jurisdiction, and there is reasonable cause to suspect that such person has died either a violent or an unnatural death, or that such person has died a sudden death of which the cause is unknown, or that such person has died in prison, or in such place or under such circumstances as to require an inquest in pursuance of any Act, the coroner, whether the cause of death arose within his jurisdiction or not, shall, as soon as practicable, issue his warrant for summoning not less than seven nor more than 11 good and lawful men to appear before him at a specified time and place, there to inquire as jurors touching the death of such person as aforesaid.”

D Mr. Sullivan, on behalf of the coroner, pointed out that the wording of section 3(1) imposes an obligation on a coroner as soon as practicable to set in motion arrangements for the holding of an inquest where there is reasonable cause to suspect that the relevant death (A) was violent or unnatural, or (B) was a sudden death of which the cause is unknown, or (C) occurred in prison, or (D) occurred in such place or under such circumstances as to require an inquest in pursuance of any Act. For the sake of brevity and convenience, we will hereafter refer to these four cases respectively as “case A,” “case B,” “case C” and “case D.”

E The operation of section 3(1) of the Act of 1887 does not depend on a coroner’s belief. It depends on the presence or absence of reasonable cause for suspicion. In view of the contents of the coroner’s affidavit quoted above, it must be common ground that, if section 3(1) had stood alone, it would have imposed an obligation on him in the present case as soon as practicable to set in motion arrangements for the holding of an inquest, since there was reasonable cause to suspect that the death fell within case A or case B.

F Section 21 of the Act of 1887, as amended by section 30 of and Schedule 2 to the Act of 1926, confers certain powers on a coroner to summon medical witnesses and to direct a post mortem examination. So far as material, it provides:

G “(1) Where it appears to the coroner that the deceased was attended at his death or during his last illness by any legally qualified medical practitioner, the coroner may summon such practitioner as a witness; but if it appears to the coroner that the deceased person was not attended at his death or during his last illness by any legally qualified medical practitioner, the coroner may summon any legally qualified medical practitioner who is at the time in actual practice in or near the place where the death happened, and any such medical witness as is summoned in pursuance of this section, may be asked to give evidence as to how, in his opinion, the deceased came to his death. (2) The coroner may, either in his summons for the attendance of such medical witness or at any time between the issuing of that summons and the end of the inquest, direct such medical witness to make a post mortem examination of the body of the deceased . . ."

However, the power of a coroner to direct a post mortem under sections 21(1) and (2) is not exercisable unless (i) the inquest has already been ordered, and (ii) the doctor in question is already summoned as a witness.

With the clear purpose of effecting an economy of time and effort, the Coroners (Amendment) Act 1926 gave coroners a new power to hold a post mortem examination before an inquest: see section 21. Section 13 also conferred on them a power to hold an inquest without a jury in certain specified cases, reflecting a similar power which had been conferred by section 7 of the Juries Act 1918. On this appeal we are principally concerned with the construction and effect of section 21 of the Act of 1926. In its original form, the section read:

"(1) Where a coroner is informed that the dead body of a person is lying within his jurisdiction and there is reasonable cause to suspect that the person has died a sudden death of which the cause is unknown, if the coroner is of opinion that a post mortem examination may prove an inquest to be unnecessary he may direct any legally qualified medical practitioner whom, if an inquest were held, he would be entitled under section 21 of the Coroners Act 1887 to summon as a medical witness or may request any other legally qualified medical practitioner, to make a post mortem examination of the body of the deceased and to report the result thereof to him in writing, and for the purposes of the examination the coroner and any person directed or requested by him to make the examination shall have the like powers, authorities and immunities as if the examination were a post mortem examination directed by the coroner at an inquest upon the body of the deceased. (2) If as a result of such a post mortem examination as aforesaid the coroner is satisfied that an inquest is unnecessary, he shall send to the registrar of deaths whose duty it is by law to register the death a certificate under his hand stating the cause of death as disclosed by the report, and the registrar shall make an entry in the register or margin thereof accordingly in the form and manner prescribed under the Registration Acts. (3) Nothing in this section shall be construed as authorising the coroner to dispense with an inquest in any case where there is reasonable cause to suspect that the deceased has died either a violent or an unnatural death, or has died in prison, or in such place or in such circumstances as to necessitate the holding of an inquest in accordance with the requirements of any Act other than the Coroners Act 1887."

It is common ground that section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 empowers a coroner to order a post mortem, even before deciding to hold an inquest, when the facts known to him give him reasonable cause to suspect that the case falls within case B and case B alone.

The two principal issues which arise on this appeal are the following.

(1) Does section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 empower a coroner to order a post mortem, before deciding to hold an inquest, when the facts known

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Gt. Manchester Coroner, Ex p. Worch (C.A.)

A to him give him reasonable cause to suspect that the death falls either within case A or within case B? (2) If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, should the applicants still be granted relief by way of judicial review, having regard to the coroner's manifestly inapposite reference to section 21(2) of the Act of 1887 in paragraph 2(2) of his first affidavit?

B The first issue

Mr. Gordon, on behalf of the applicants, submitted to the Divisional Court, as he has to us, that the answer to the first issue is in the negative. Watkins L.J. summarised his submissions as follows [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1141, 1147–1148:

C “He says that there is no jurisdiction to order a post mortem for the purpose of deciding whether, with or without a jury, an inquest is necessary, except where a coroner, on being informed that there is a dead body within his jurisdiction, has at that time reasonable cause to suspect nothing else but sudden death, the cause of which is unknown. He says also that this coroner could not have made a valid order under section 21 unless the only thing in his mind was such a suspicion. If he had in his mind any other suspicion, and in particular a suspicion that death was due to violence, he could do no other than to act in accord with the provisions of section 3 of the Act of 1887 which would have obliged him to hold an inquest.”

Watkins L.J. continued, at p. 1148:

E “I feel bound to say that my mind for some while wavered as to whether this submission was validly made, having regard to section 21(1) and (3) of the Act of 1926. Counsel for the coroner contended that these two subsections can properly exist together. Thus, if a coroner is of the mind, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, that there could be two suspicions of a different kind as to the cause of death, he could go to the provisions of subsection (1) and use the power there contained to order a post mortem, the result of which might very likely result in the avoidance of an inquest. He says that Parliament was, by the enactment of section 21, bent upon reducing the need for and therefore the number of inquests, and that it would be to defeat the intention of Parliament to come to a conclusion in accordance with the submission of counsel for the applicants.”

F

G

However, the Divisional Court rejected the arguments submitted on behalf of the coroner as to the construction of section 21 of the Act of 1926. Watkins L.J. put the matter succinctly, at p. 1148:

H “I disagree. It seems to me that Parliament intended, by the saving provisions in subsection (3), when there is a reasonable suspicion that death has come about as a result of violence, that there should inevitably be an inquest in accordance with section 3 of the Act of 1887. I do not see how it could be said that Parliament intended otherwise. If it had, I apprehend that the word “only” would have appeared somewhere in subsection (1). It does not find a place there. So much for the primary submission made on behalf of the applicants. That, of course, is sufficient for them to obtain the declaration which they seek with regard to the post mortem. There was no power in this coroner, in the circumstances and in view of the law and his state of mind at the relevant time, to order a post mortem upon the body of the deceased.”

Macpherson J., in the course of his concurring judgment, said, at p. 1149:

“For a time I, too, was attracted by the argument that section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 gave the coroner power to order a post mortem where there were two competing reasonable suspicions in his mind, namely, that the deceased died a violent death as a result of the accident or that he died by natural causes at the wheel. But in the end, I am persuaded that section 21(1) is limited to cases where there is only a reasonable suspicion that a person has died a sudden death of which the cause is unknown, both because of the wording of section 21(1) and because of the operation and wording of subsection (3). It is, in my judgment, right that where violent death is at the outset a reasonable possibility, then an inquiry by inquest, in the present case without a jury, is required to take place so that the matter can be publicly explored and resolved.”

In his argument in support of the decision of the Divisional Court, Mr. Gordon did not feel able to adopt the point made by Watkins L.J. by reference to the absence of the word “only” in section 21(1) of the Act of 1926. (We will briefly revert to this point later in this judgment.) However, enlarging on the other reasoning of the Divisional Court, he submitted that their decision was correct, broadly for the following reasons.

In his submission, the plain meaning of section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 is that the coroner has no power to order a post mortem once there is reasonable cause to suspect that the death falls within any of the four cases referred to above, other than case B (death of which the cause is unknown). Thus, it is said, if there is reasonable cause to suspect that the death falls either within case A (violent or unnatural death) or within case B, the power is not exercisable. Mr. Gordon submitted that this conclusion is supported not only by the clear words of section 21(1) of the Act of 1926, but also by section 3(1) of the Act of 1887. He pointed out that section 3(1) begins with more or less the very same words as section 21(1), namely, “Where a coroner is informed that the dead body of a person is lying within his jurisdiction and there is reasonable cause to suspect that [such] [the] person has died . . .” Mr. Gordon submitted that both subsections are directed to the same particular point of time. He submitted that the only inference to be drawn from the omission of any reference in section 21(1) to cases A, C and D (all of which are referred to in section 3(1)) is that the power to order a post mortem conferred by section 21(1) is never to be exercisable in case A or case C or case D.

Furthermore, he contended, this conclusion is supported by the wording of section 21(3) of the Act of 1926. This subsection, in his submission, is directed to the same point of time as section 21(1); in contrast with section 21(1) it makes express reference to cases A, C and D and makes it clear that the coroner’s powers under section 21(1) are not to be exercisable in any of those three cases.

Mr. Gordon submitted that his construction of section 21(1) accords with the thinking behind the legislation, which is that there should be a

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Gt. Manchester Coroner, Ex p. Worch (C.A.)

- A public inquiry by inquest in any case where there is reasonable cause to suspect that the death falls within case A or case C or case D. He relied on the observations of Macpherson J. to this effect [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1141, 1149. He pointed out that before 1926 there was no question of dispensing with an inquest in any such case. He reminded us of the principle of construction that “a statute is not to be taken as effecting a fundamental alteration in the general law unless it uses words that point unmistakably to that conclusion:” see National Assistance Board v. Wilkinson [1952] 2 Q.B. 648, 661, per Devlin J.
- B

- Nevertheless, there can be no doubt that section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 was intended to confer an entirely new power on coroners to order a post mortem before an inquest, provided that the three conditions specified in the subsection are satisfied, namely, (1) the coroner “is informed that the dead body of a person is lying within his jurisdiction;”
- C (2) “there is reasonable cause to suspect that the person has died a sudden death of which the cause is unknown;” and (3) “the coroner is of opinion that a post mortem examination may prove an inquest to be unnecessary.” As to the second of these conditions, the phrase “a sudden death of which the cause is unknown” must clearly bear the same meaning as that which it bears in section 3(1) of the Act of 1887.
- D In the context of section 3(1), case B must, in our judgment, be intended to cover, and does cover, any case of a sudden death where the cause of death is not known to be natural. We did not understand Mr. Gordon to dispute this proposition.

- We can see no reason why, in the context of section 21(1), the phrase “a sudden death of which the cause is unknown” should not be similarly construed as meaning “a sudden death of which the cause is not known to be natural.” If this meaning is attributed to the phrase in the second of the three conditions specified in section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 then, in our judgment, good and consistent sense can be made of all the subsequent provisions of the section. As to the third of the conditions, the only circumstances ex hypothesi in which the coroner may be of opinion that “a post mortem examination may prove an inquest to be unnecessary” are if the case is not a case C or case D, and he thinks the post mortem may prove that the deceased died of natural causes, so that the possibility of it being a case A may, perhaps, also be eliminated by the post mortem.
- E
- F

- The original section 21(2) of the Act of 1926 is no longer law, since it has been replaced by section 23(3) of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953. Nevertheless, the original subsection is admissible in construing the section as a whole and, in our judgment, throws light on its construction. It demonstrates that the section as a whole contemplates a two-stage process.
- G

- First, the coroner has to consider whether the three conditions specified in section 21(1) are satisfied. If, but only if, he is so satisfied, he is under no immediate obligation to arrange an inquest “as soon as practicable,” as he would otherwise have to do under section 3(1) of the Act of 1887, but may instead order a post mortem. However, section 21(1) itself confers no power whatever to dispense with an inquest.
- H

The second stage of the process arises when the result of the post mortem is known. If, but only if, the case is not a case C or case D, and the post mortem shows that the death was due to natural causes, the coroner may be satisfied that an inquest is unnecessary. If that is so, he can accordingly dispense with an inquest. However, section 21(3) is there as a reminder so as to make it clear that, after the result of the post mortem is known, the coroner will still be obliged to order an inquest if the case is a case A or case C or case D, as he properly did in the present case when he learned from the post mortem that the death had been caused by multiple injuries.

We cannot accept Mr. Gordon's submission that section 21(1) and (3) are intended to operate at the same point of time. Any such contention disregards the original section 21(2) of the Act of 1926, which is, in our judgment, of some significance. Section 21(2) expressly or by necessary implication demonstrates that the section contemplates three things. First, the coroner is to have the power in certain circumstances to dispense with an inquest. Secondly, however, this power is to be exercisable, if at all, only after the post mortem examination has been held and its result satisfies the coroner that an inquest is unnecessary (by satisfying him that the death has occurred by natural causes). Thirdly, on dispensing with an inquest, he is to send to the registrar of deaths the appropriate certificate. The legislature, in our judgment, thought it right to add section 21(3) as a reminder and warning so as to make it clear that, after the post mortem has been held, the dispensing power must not be exercised if the case remains a case A or case C or case D; in such circumstances the obligation to hold an inquest imposed by section 3(1) of the Act of 1887 will still apply.

The construction of section 21 set out above in all essentials accords with that presented to us by Mr. Sullivan, on behalf of the coroner. Mr. Gordon asserts that this construction will produce a result contrary to the public interest, since it would enable a coroner to dispense with an inquest even in a case where there had initially been reasonable cause to suspect that the relevant death had been a violent or unnatural one. This thinking is reflected in the last sentence of the passage from the judgment of Macpherson J. quoted above.

With all respect, we cannot agree. The obvious purpose of section 21, as we have already pointed out, was to effect an economy of time and effort by eliminating the need for an inquest in certain cases where the legislature thought an inquest would be unnecessary. The section, as so construed above, will never enable a coroner to dispense with an inquest so long as there remains a reasonable cause to suspect that the death was violent or unnatural; and indeed section 21(3) makes this clear. However, we can see no reason why the legislature should have thought it inappropriate to give a coroner the power to direct a post mortem in a case where he considers that its result may eliminate the need to hold an inquest, by eliminating as a matter of evidence the possibility that the death was violent or unnatural, provided only that it is not a case C or case D.

Perhaps we should also emphasise that section 21 will never enable a coroner to dispense with an inquest where it is known, or there is reasonable cause to suspect, that the death occurred in prison. There was some debate before us as to whether, in a case where there is doubt as to whether the death occurred in prison or, on the other hand, in transit to or from prison, the section would empower a coroner to order a post mortem in advance of an inquest for the purpose of possibly rendering an inquest unnecessary. We are inclined to think that the answer to this question is in the negative, bearing in mind that section 21(1) makes no reference to a death of which the place, as distinct from the cause, is unknown. However, it is not necessary to decide this

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Gt. Manchester Coroner, Ex p. Worch (C.A.)

A particular point, and an additional reason for expressing no concluded view on it is that there appears to be some question as to whether the words “in prison” in this context may bear the extended meaning of “in prison custody:” see Thurston’s Coronership: The Law & Practice on Coroners, 3rd ed. (1985), p. 94, para. 15.04.

B Finally, in the context of the first issue, we should refer to the absence of the word “only” from section 26(1). So far as this point has any significance, in our judgment, it supports Mr. Sullivan’s construction of the subsection, since it could be said that, if the power thereby conferred were intended to be exercisable exclusively in a case B situation, one might have expected the word “only” to be there, to effect the limitation on the power.

C For the reasons which we have given, we answer the first issue in the affirmative. We have felt some hesitation before reaching this conclusion because it differs both from that reached by the Divisional Court and from the apparent views of the editors of two well known text books: see Jervis on Coroners, 10th ed. (1986), pp. 63–64, para. 7.9 and Thurston’s Coronership: The Law & Practice on Coroners, p. 67, para. 11.11. However, the two textbooks cite no authority on the question and we infer that the Divisional Court did not have the benefit of such full argument as we have had. In particular, we understand that the version of section 21 of the Act of 1926 presented to that court did not include section 21(2) which, though now repealed, throws light on the relationship between section 21(1) and (3). Watkins L.J. described the relevant question as being [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1141, 1147, “whether the effect of subsection (3) is to render impotent the provisions of subsection (1) of section 21 of the Act of 1926.” If section 21(2) had been drawn to his attention, we venture to think that Watkins L.J. might well have concluded that subsection (3) relates to a different point of time from that to which subsection (1) relates.

The second issue

F It follows from our conclusion on the first issue that on 5 August 1986 the coroner had the power to order a post mortem under section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 before ordering an inquest, because all the three conditions of that subsection were satisfied.

G However, Mr. Gordon has submitted that, even if we were to take this view, we should still grant relief by way of judicial review of the coroner’s decision to order a post mortem because of the reference to section 21(2) of the Act of 1887 in paragraph 2 of the coroner’s first affidavit.

In circumstances very different from the present (because he accepted the applicants’ argument on the first issue) Watkins L.J. regarded this point as a further reason for granting the declaration sought in regard to the post mortem, saying, at p. 1148:

H “A further point which has been taken is that the coroner did not apply his mind to section 21 of the Act of 1926. There is some force in that. As I have already stated, in the first of his affidavits the coroner claims to have acted within the provisions of section 21, not of the Act of 1926 but of the Act of 1887. That betrays a misunderstanding of the combined effect of these two Acts. Whether some error has crept into the first affidavit and the numbers 1887 appear there instead of, as might have been intended, 1926, I cannot tell. But in the absence of that error, there must have been some confusion in the mind of the coroner as to the law which he had to apply in pursuance of his duties relating to post mortem and inquest. That is an additional reason why I would say that the declaration here sought in respect of the order for there to be a post mortem should go.”

Macpherson J. added nothing of his own on this point.

Though it seems a fair inference that the coroner's two affidavits were drafted for him by his legal advisers, there is no evidence before us as to the manner in which the reference to section 21(2) of the Act of 1887 came to be included in paragraph 2(2) of the first affidavit. We refused an application on the part of the coroner to adduce further evidence on this point.

Mr. Gordon, as we understood him, accepted that, provided the coroner had the power under section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 to order a post mortem at the time when he did and, in making such an order, properly directed his mind to the relevant factors specified in section 21(1), the exercise of his discretion in making an order of this nature would not be open to challenge by way of judicial review merely because he thought the relevant statutory power was conferred on him by section 21(2) of the Act of 1887 or because, by an oversight, an erroneous reference to the last mentioned subsection crept into his first affidavit. However, he submitted that the very fact of this erroneous reference by itself indicated that the coroner, in ordering a post mortem, did not have, or may well not have had, the relevant factors in mind.

We do not accept this submission. It seems to us that the passages which, from the coroner's affidavits quoted above, coupled with the rest of his evidence, show that he had the three conditions specified in section 21(1) of the Act of 1926 very well in mind. Assuming that the circumstances were such as to render the power conferred by that subsection exercisable, as we have held, we are not persuaded that his reference to section 21(2) of the Act of 1887 shows that, in exercising his discretion to order a post mortem, he misdirected himself as to any essential matters.

Even apart from this point, however, we do not think that, on any footing, this would be an appropriate case for this court, in the exercise of its discretion, to grant the applicants any relief by way of judicial review on the second subsidiary issue if, as we have held, they fail on the first issue, which is the only issue of principle raised on this appeal.

For these reasons, we allow this appeal. We set aside the order of the Divisional Court and dismiss the application for judicial review.

In October 1981 the plaintiff's husband, who from April 1938 until April 1943 had been employed by a public authority to which the defendant was successor as a boiler cleaner at a power station, was found to be suffering from mesothelioma, of which he died in May 1982. In April 1984 the plaintiff, in her capacities as widow of the deceased and the administratrix of his estate, commenced proceedings in which she claimed damages, for negligence and breach of statutory duty, under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 and the Fatal Accidents Act 1976, alleging that the deceased's mesothelioma had been caused by exposure to asbestos during his employment at the power station. The defendant pleaded, inter alia, that any claim was statute-barred by virtue of section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 and section 21 of the Limitation Act 1939, the deceased having brought no proceedings against the authority in respect of his claim within 12 months of the date on which the cause of action accrued. On that plea being tried as a preliminary issue, the deputy judge found in favour of the plaintiff. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the defendant.

time bar under section 2 and/or section 21 of the Limitation Act 1939:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that just as there was a presumption that a statute which affected substantive rights was not to be construed as having retrospective operation unless it was manifest that that was its intention, so equally there was a presumption that where a statute was clearly intended to have some retrospective operation that was not to extend any further than was necessary to give effect either to its clear language or to its manifest purpose; that on the repeal of section 21 of the Limitation Act 1939 the accrued right to plead a time bar to the deceased's action which the defendant had acquired under that section had been preserved by the express words of section 7 of the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions, etc.) Act 1954 in respect of actions accruing before 4 June 1954; that the right to plead a time bar which had accrued under section 21 of the Act of 1939 was not affected by section 1 of the Limitation Act 1963 and was expressly preserved by section 1(4) of the Act of 1963; that, although in 1975 section 2A of the Act of 1939 had modified in favour of claimants the limitation periods previously applicable to existing causes of action, it did not deprive a defendant of any defence which he could make good without reliance on that section, including the accrued right to rely on a time bar which had been acquired under the repealed provisions of section 21 of the Act of 1939; and that, accordingly, since the Limitation Act 1980 had merely consolidated the relevant law, the plaintiff's claim was barred by the time bar which had accrued under section 21 of the Act of 1939 (post, pp. 1012E-F, 1017H—1018F, 1021D-G, G—1022D).

(ii) The Limitation Act 1963 does not deprive any defendant of a time bar which has accrued on the expiry of the six year limitation period prescribed by section 2(1) of the Limitation Act 1939 in its original form which, by virtue of section 7 of the Act of 1954, continues to govern any cause of action in a personal injury case accruing before 4 June 1954 (post, p. 1018A-B).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

- B This was an appeal by leave of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook and Lord Oliver of Aylmerton) by the plaintiff, Emma May Arnold, widow and administratrix of the estate of Albert Edward Arnold, deceased, from the judgment dated 17 October 1986 of the Court of Appeal (Sir John Donaldson M.R., Ralph Gibson and Nicholls L.JJ.) allowing an appeal by the defendant, the Central Electricity Generating Board, from the judgment dated 23 January 1986 of Mr. Michael Ogden Q.C., sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court, who had decided the preliminary issue of law in the action, which was whether in the circumstances the plaintiff's claim was time barred, in favour of the plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Lord Bridge of Harwich.

- D Michael Brent Q.C. and John Foy for the plaintiff.
Michael Wright Q.C. and Anthony Nicholl for the defendant.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- E 22 October. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, the appellant plaintiff ("the widow") is the widow of Albert Edward Arnold ("the deceased"). In an action commenced by writ dated 13 April 1984 she claims damages under the Fatal Accidents Act 1976 and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 against the respondent defendants ("the board"). The deceased was employed by the Birmingham Corporation at Hams Hall Power Station between April 1938 and April 1943. It is common ground that any liabilities of the Birmingham Corporation arising from the operation of the power station have since devolved upon the board. The widow's statement of claim alleges that the deceased worked under conditions in which the Birmingham Corporation, negligently and in breach of statutory duty, failed to protect him from the inhalation of asbestos dust, as a result of which he contracted mesothelioma. This condition was first diagnosed in October 1981 and was the cause of the death of the deceased on 21 May 1982.

The board's defence pleads, inter alia, by paragraph 10:

- H "The plaintiff's claim is statute-barred by virtue of the provisions of section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 and section 21 of the Limitation Act 1939, the deceased having brought no proceedings against the Birmingham Corporation in respect of the matters alleged in the statement of claim within 12 months of the date on which his cause of action accrued."

The issue raised by this paragraph was ordered to be tried as a preliminary issue. It was tried and decided in favour of the widow by Mr. Michael Ogden Q.C. sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court [1986] 3 W.L.R. 171. That decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (Sir John Donaldson M.R., Ralph Gibson and Nicholls L.JJ.)

[1987] 2 W.L.R. 245. The widow now appeals by leave of your Lordships' House. A

In 1943 the relevant statute in force was the Limitation Act 1939. This prescribed by section 2(1) a general period of limitation of six years for, inter alia, actions founded on tort. But section 21 prescribed a period of limitation of one year for actions against public authorities to which the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 applied. The Birmingham Corporation was such an authority. It is to be assumed for the purpose of deciding the preliminary issue that the deceased contracted mesothelioma in the course of his employment by the Birmingham Corporation, i.e. at the latest by April 1943, and that a cause of action against the Birmingham Corporation in respect of that injury then accrued to him. Thus at the latest by April 1944 any cause of action which the deceased had against the Birmingham Corporation in respect of his mesothelioma was statute-barred. B C

The current general law of limitation of actions is found in the Limitation Act 1980, a consolidating statute, which, by section 11(4), prescribes for personal injury actions a period of three years from—" (a) the date on which the cause of action accrued; or (b) the date of knowledge (if later) of the person injured." D

It is common ground that "the date of knowledge" of the deceased within the meaning of that phrase in section 11(4) as defined by section 14 was not earlier than October 1981. If the deceased had a cause of action subsisting at the date of his death in May 1982, there is nothing in the Act of 1980 which would bar the widow's claims in an action commenced in April 1984.

Paragraph 9(1) of Schedule 2 to the Act of 1980 provides, so far as relevant, that: "Nothing in any provision of this Act shall—(a) enable any action to be brought which was barred . . . by the Limitation Act 1939" before 1 August 1980. E

Thus the critical question to be determined in this appeal is whether anything in the series of statutes dealing with limitation of actions leading up to the 1980 consolidation, each of which was passed to ameliorate aspects of the law believed to operate unjustly, has had the effect of removing retrospectively the bar to the widow's action which accrued to the Birmingham Corporation pursuant to section 21 of the Act of 1939. F

By section 16(1) of the Interpretation Act 1978 (re-enacting section 38(2) of the Interpretation Act 1889) the repeal of an enactment "does not, unless the contrary intention appears . . . (c) affect any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued or incurred under that enactment; . . ." In Yew Bon Tew v. Kenderaan Bas Mara [1983] 1 A.C. 553 the Privy Council held that, on the expiry of a relevant period of limitation, a potential defendant to an action acquired an "accrued right" within the meaning of an identical provision in the Malaysian Interpretation Act 1967 to rely on the time-bar as giving him immunity from liability, which was not affected by the subsequent repeal of the relevant limitation provision unless the contrary intention appeared. Lord Brightman, delivering the judgment of the Board, went further when he said, at p. 558: G H

"Apart from the provisions of the interpretation statutes, there is at common law a prima facie rule of construction that a statute should

Arnold v. C.E.G.B. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A not be interpreted retrospectively so as to impair an existing right or obligation unless that result is unavoidable on the language used."

The Law Reform (Limitation of Actions, &c.) Act 1954, which came into force on 4 June 1954, repealed the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 and section 21 of the Act of 1939. It amended section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 by the addition of the following proviso:

B "Provided that, in the case of actions for damages for negligence, nuisance or breach of duty . . . where the damages claimed by the plaintiff for the negligence, nuisance or breach of duty consist of or include damages in respect of personal injuries to any person, this subsection shall have effect as if for the reference to six years there were substituted a reference to three years."

C Section 7(1) provided:

"The time for bringing proceedings in respect of a cause of action which arose before the passing of this Act shall, if it has not then already expired, expire at the time when it would have expired apart from the provisions of this Act or at the time when it would have expired if all the provisions of this Act had at all material times been in force, whichever is the later."

Thus, its effect in relation to actions for damages for personal injuries against public authorities was to apply the new limitation period of three years to causes of action which accrued within 12 months before 4 June 1954, but not to revive any cause of action which accrued more than 12 months before that date and which was already time-barred. Its effect in relation to actions for damages for personal injuries against other defendants was to leave causes of action which accrued between 4 June 1948 and 4 June 1954 subject to the limitation period of six years pursuant to the unamended section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 and to apply the limitation period of three years under the subsection as amended by the proviso only to causes of action accruing after 4 June 1954.

F The injustice which rigid periods of limitations are capable of causing in certain classes of personal injury action was thrown into high relief by Cartledge v. E. Jopling & Sons Ltd. [1963] A.C. 758. A number of steel dressers had contracted pneumoconiosis by inhaling noxious dust while working at the defendants' factory. As a result of changes at the factory, the plaintiffs could establish no breaches of duty by their employers making any material contribution to the causation of the injuries to their lungs after September 1950. They issued writs on 1 October 1956 commencing actions which were, in due course, consolidated. Thus, any relevant breach of duty responsible for the initial onset of the disease had in each case occurred more than six years before the actions were brought. As the House felt obliged to hold, the plaintiffs' causes of action were statute-barred although they had accrued to the plaintiffs long before they could have known of their condition. As one would expect, all their Lordships deplored this result. It will be sufficient for present purposes to cite two passages from the speeches. Lord Reid said, at pp. 771-772:

"It is now too late for the courts to question or modify the rules that a cause of action accrues as soon as a wrongful act has caused personal injury beyond what can be regarded as negligible, even when that injury is unknown to and cannot be discovered by the sufferer, and that further injury arising from the same act at a later date does not give rise to a further cause of action. It appears to me to be unreasonable and unjustifiable in principle that a cause of action should be held to accrue before it is possible to discover any injury and, therefore, before it is possible to raise any action. If this were a matter governed by the common law I would hold that a cause of action ought not to be held to accrue until either the injured person has discovered the injury or it would be possible for him to discover it if he took such steps as were reasonable in the circumstances. The common law ought never to produce a wholly unreasonable result, nor ought existing authorities to be read so literally as to produce such a result in circumstances never contemplated when they were decided."

Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest said, at p. 776:

"The evidence in the present case shows indisputably that there may be lung injury caused by the inhalation of fine particles of silica and that an injured person may, without any kind of fault on his part, be unaware of the fact that he has been caused injury. A result of this, in a case where there has been a breach of duty, is that a limitation period may bar a remedy before there is or could be knowledge of a cause of action. That seems to me to be highly unsatisfactory, and for that reason I share the regret expressed by others of your Lordships that this appeal must fail, and I join in the hope that consideration may be given to an amendment of the law."

It was no doubt the Cartledge case, which was decided at first instance by Glyn-Jones J. in 1959, which prompted the setting up in 1961 by the Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Scotland of a distinguished committee under the chairmanship of Edmund Davies J. with terms of reference "to consider and report whether any alteration is desirable in the law relating to limitation of actions in cases of personal injury where the injury or disease giving rise to the claim has not become apparent in sufficient time to enable proceedings to be begun within three years from the inception of such injury or disease." The Report of the Committee on Limitation of Actions in Cases of Personal Injury ((1962) Cmnd. 1829) was presented in September 1962 after the decision of the Cartledge case in the Court of Appeal but before the decision in the House of Lords. The report presents a thorough analysis of the problem, an examination of the pros and cons of various solutions and the Committee's recommendations. It was this report which led to the enactment of the Limitation Act 1963. The determination of the present appeal turns primarily on the interpretation of that Act. It is, therefore, entirely legitimate to study the report to ascertain the mischief which the Act was intended to remedy. A substantial part of the able argument for the widow before your Lordships was based on this report and I was much impressed by it. But on mature reflection, I do not believe the report lends any real assistance on the essential question of interpretation which relates to the degree of retroactivity which can be attributed to the Act of 1963. It is true that the report contains passages emphasising the long periods during which insidious diseases may lie dormant. But as against this I cannot overlook paragraph 17 of the report which emphasises the traditional and well recognised grounds on which it has always been thought just and necessary to impose limitations

A for the protection of defendants on the time within which claims at law must be brought against them. The paragraph concludes as follows:

“We have, therefore, approached our task as one involving a duty to seek a balance between the interests of each litigating party and we appreciate that, whatever solution to the problem may eventually be accepted, there are bound to be hard cases.”

B It is, I think, beyond question that the Act of 1963 operated retrospectively, when the appropriate conditions were satisfied, to deprive a defendant of an accrued time bar in respect of a claim for damages for personal injuries in which the cause of action had accrued since 4 June 1954 and which had, therefore, been subject to the three year period of limitation introduced by the Act of 1954. This is the combined effect of the relevant provisions of sections 1, 6 and 15 as follows:

D “1 (1) Section 2(1) of the Limitation Act 1939 (which, in the case of certain actions, imposes a time-limit of three years for bringing the action) shall not afford any defence to an action to which this section applies, in so far as the action relates to any cause of action in respect of which—(a) the court has, whether before or after the commencement of the action, granted leave for the purposes of this section, and (b) the requirements of subsection (3) of this section are fulfilled. (2) This section applies to any action for damages for negligence, nuisance or breach of duty . . . where the damages claimed by the plaintiff for the negligence, nuisance or breach of duty consist of or include damages in respect of personal injuries to the plaintiff or any other person. (3) The requirements of this subsection are fulfilled in relation to a cause of action if it is proved that the material facts relating to that cause of action were or included facts of a decisive character which were at all times outside the knowledge (actual or constructive) of the plaintiff until a date which—(a) either was after the end of the three-year period relating to that cause of action or was not earlier than 12 months before the end of that period, and (b) in either case, was a date not earlier than 12 months before the date on which the action was brought.”

F “6 (1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, the provisions of this Part of this Act . . . shall have effect in relation to causes of action which accrued before, as well as causes of action which accrue after, the passing of this Act, and shall have effect in relation to any cause of action which accrued before the passing of this Act notwithstanding that an action in respect thereof has been commenced and is pending at the passing of this Act. . . . (3) For the purposes of this section an action shall not be taken to be pending at any time after a final order or judgment has been made or given therein, notwithstanding that an appeal is pending or that the time for appealing has not expired; and accordingly section 1 of this Act shall not have effect in relation to a cause of action in respect of which a final order or judgment has been made or given before the passing of this Act.”

H “15 Except in so far as the context otherwise requires, any reference in this Act to an enactment shall be construed as a reference to that enactment as amended or extended by or under any other enactment.”

Hence it is the new three year period of limitation introduced by the amended section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 which is no longer to be available as a defence if the court has granted the appropriate leave and the conditions as to knowledge prescribed by section 1(3) are satisfied. The specific provisions relating to pending actions in section 6, distinguishing between actions awaiting trial and actions subject to appeal after final judgment, would be otiose unless the Act were intended, in any pending action awaiting trial, to deprive the defendant of a time bar which had already accrued on expiry of the three year limitation period at the date of issue of the writ. If that was the intention in the case of pending actions, it must likewise have been the intention where the three year time bar had accrued but no action had yet been started.

In considering what, if any, further retrospective operation in depriving defendants of accrued time bars can be ascribed to any provision in the Act of 1963, I find it quite unrealistic to examine in isolation the special case of the cause of action in a claim for damages for personal injuries which accrued before 1954 against an authority entitled to the protection of section 21 of the Act of 1939 without considering at the same time the case of a pre-1954 cause of action in a personal injury claim accruing against an ordinary defendant and subject therefore to the six year period of limitation prescribed by the unamended section 2(1) of the Act of 1939. The point that most troubled me in the course of the argument was what, as it seemed to me, would be the absurdity of attributing to the legislature an intention to give retrospective effect to the new limitation provisions so as to deprive an ordinary defendant of the right to rely on a time bar accrued under the unamended provisions of the Act of 1939 but at the same time to leave intact the defence of a public authority acquired by virtue of the special position that public authorities previously enjoyed under section 21 of the Act of 1939 in regard to limitation of actions. The philosophy which was once thought to justify the distinction between public and private defendants in this regard had fallen wholly into disrepute when the distinction was swept away in 1954, and, so far as I am aware, has never subsequently regained any reputable currency. Hence, if the distinction was reintroduced in relation to the retrospective operation of the Act of 1963, it surely can only have been by some accident of inadvertent draftsmanship. It is for this reason that I should strive to avoid construing the Act as effecting such a distinction unless plainly compelled by its language to do so.

The Court of Appeal, as is clear from the admirably lucid judgment of Ralph Gibson L.J., with which the other members of the court agreed, were aware of this aspect of the matter, but were embarrassed by the prior Court of Appeal decision in Knipe v. British Railways Board [1972] 1 Q.B. 361, which they were free to criticise but not free to overrule, in so far as it decided that the Act of 1963 applied retrospectively to deprive a defendant of an accrued six year time bar under section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 prior to its amendment by the Act of 1954. The plaintiff's cause of action in that case had accrued in March 1948 and thus became time barred in March 1954. The main issue in the case was whether the plaintiff had satisfied the conditions as to knowledge prescribed by section 1(3), as the trial judge and the Court of Appeal held that he had. It does not appear from the report that any point was pleaded or argued for the defendant on the issue of the

A retrospective action of the statute and the decision in relation to that issue might be said to be per incuriam but for a passage in the judgment of Lord Denning M.R. [1972] 1 Q.B. 361, 368–369, in which he adverts to the point and determines it in the plaintiff's favour. The passage is set out in full in the judgment of Ralph Gibson L.J. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 245, 257, 258, who forcefully criticises the reasoning on which Lord Denning's conclusion rests. I respectfully agree with the criticism and need not repeat it.

In any event, your Lordships are not, of course, bound by the decision in Knipe's case. A matter that concerns me is that the point is not directly in issue in the present appeal. But for the reasons I have indicated, it seems to me in the highest degree improbable that the legislature in 1963 could have intended, as a matter of deliberate policy, in giving retrospective effect to the new limitation code in personal injury actions to differentiate between causes of action governed by the six year period under the unamended section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 and those governed by the one year period under the repealed section 21 of the Act of 1939. I am thus persuaded that your Lordships both can and should consider and determine the effect of the Act of 1963 in relation to a pre-1954 six year case as part of the necessary process of reasoning in reaching a conclusion as to its effect in relation to a pre-1954 one year case.

The proposition that the Act of 1963 failed to remove the accrued six year time bar in any personal injury case where the cause of action accrued before 4 June 1954 is, at first blush, a startling one for the simple reason that the Cartledge case [1963] A.C. 758 which triggered the change in the law was itself a case where the plaintiffs' causes of action all accrued in or before 1950, and, if the Act of 1963 failed to extend to such cases, it could, in one sense, be said that it failed to remedy the very injustice which prompted its enactment. I was much impressed by this consideration in the course of the argument. But on reflection I believe that this approach involves an over-simplification of the issue. In legislating four years after the Cartledge case had come to trial it is not necessarily to be assumed that Parliament's intention was shaped by the particular facts of the Cartledge case when considering how far the new statute should operate retrospectively. However that may be, it is in any event from the language of the statute alone, if it is unambiguous, that the extent of the intended retrospection must be determined.

I have already set out the terms of section 1(1) of the Act of 1963. The only time bar of which defendants are in terms deprived of in this subsection is the three year time bar which accrued under section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 as amended in 1954. This is made clear both by the words in parenthesis and by section 15 of the Act. There is certainly no context in section 1 which would permit the reference to section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 to be construed as a reference to that subsection as originally enacted. The words in parenthesis emphasise the contrary. This is perhaps sufficient to lead to the conclusion that there is nothing in section 1 of the Act of 1963 which in any way affects the availability, after 1963 as before, of a defence which had accrued upon the expiry of the six year period applicable to any cause of action in respect of personal injuries accruing before 4 June 1954. But if further support for the conclusion be needed, it is found in section 1(3). The language of paragraph (a) of this subsection is simply incapable of any sensible application to a case governed by a six year period of limitation. In the result I would hold that the Act of 1963 did not operate to deprive any defendant of a time bar which had accrued on the expiry of the six year limitation period prescribed by section 2(1) of the Act of 1939 in its original form which, by virtue of section 7 of the Act of 1954, continued to govern any cause of action in a personal injury case accruing before 4 June 1954. Knipe's case [1972] 1 Q.B. 361 was, therefore, wrongly decided. I would like to acknowledge that I owe this analysis of the effect of section 1 of the Act of 1963 to the able arguments of both leading and junior counsel for the board, the force of which I confess I did not appreciate until I reflected upon them at leisure.

If the Act of 1963 had no effect upon accrued time bars derived from the six year period of limitation under the unamended section 2(1) of the Act of 1939, it is hardly to be expected that it was intended to have any effect on accrued time bars derived from the one year period of limitation under section 21. The operative provision is section 1(4)(a) of the Act of 1963 which reads:

"Nothing in this section shall be construed as excluding or otherwise affecting—(a) any defence which, in any action to which this section applies, may be available by virtue of any enactment other than section 2(1) of the Limitation Act 1939 (whether it is an enactment imposing a period of limitation or not) or by virtue of any rule of law or equity . . ."

The Court of Appeal rejected the argument that section 21 of the Act of 1939 was an "enactment other than section 2(1) of the Act of 1939" within the meaning of this subsection on the ground that the phrase was not apt to apply to a repealed enactment. They nevertheless held that this subsection left the defence of an accrued time bar under section 21 intact on the ground that it was a defence available "by virtue of any rule of law," which included a reference to the rule of law stated in Yew Bon Tew v. Kenderaan Bas Mara [1983] 1 A.C. 553. With respect, I would reach the same conclusion as to the effect of this subsection by the simpler and more direct route of holding that the defence of an accrued time bar under section 21 of the Act of 1939 is available "by virtue of" an "enactment other than section 2(1) of the Act of 1939" and that it is by these words that the defence is expressly preserved. As was cogently pointed out in the course of the argument by my noble and learned friend Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, the defence of an accrued statutory time bar can only be regarded as available "by virtue of" the enactment which imposed the relevant period of limitation and remains so available notwithstanding that the enactment has subsequently been repealed.

The Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971, section 1(1) had the effect of extending the period allowed to a plaintiff by section 1(3) of the Act of 1963 for commencing an action otherwise statute-barred from one to three years from his date of knowledge of "material facts . . . [which] were or included facts of a decisive character" relating to his cause of action.

The only other statute preceding the 1980 consolidation which it is necessary to consider is the Limitation Act 1975. This was enacted following the presentation in May 1974 of the 20th Report of the Law Reform Committee (Interim Report on Limitation of Actions: In Personal Injury Claims) (1974) (Cmnd. 5630) and substantially

A implemented its recommendations. Here again certain passages in the report are relied on in argument by counsel for the widow but, save to the limited extent that I shall later indicate, I do not think the report throws any significant light on the problem presently under consideration. It is, however, instructive to note, by reading the Act in conjunction with the summary of the committee's conclusions in paragraph 148 of the report, which the Act clearly sets out to implement, what are the principal objects and effects of the Act. Omitting provisions dealing with persons under a disability, which are not presently relevant, these are as follows. First, the period of three years from the accrual of the cause of action or the plaintiff's "date of knowledge," if later, is retained as the normal period of limitation applicable to personal injury actions. Secondly, to resolve the doubts and difficulties which had arisen on the interpretation of section 1(3) of the Act of 1963, what is to constitute "knowledge" for this purpose is elaborately and precisely defined by the statute. Thirdly, the Act gives the court a discretion to override the normal period of limitation in an appropriate case. Fourthly, the need to obtain the leave of the court to sue out of time is abolished. Finally, as one would expect, the Act contains transitional provisions, the effect of which I do not attempt to summarise as I shall have to examine them in detail later.

The principal machinery adopted to achieve these objects and effects is the elaborate amendment of the Act of 1939. The proviso to section 2(1) of 1939 is removed by the repeal of section 2 of the Act of 1954. By Schedule 1, paragraph 2, a new subsection (8) is added to section 2 of the Act of 1939 which provides: "This section has effect subject to section 2A below."

The Act of 1975 then introduces new sections 2A, 2B, 2C and 2D into the Act of 1939. Section 2A(1) provides:

"This section applies to any action for damages for negligence, nuisance or breach of duty . . . where the damages claimed by the plaintiff for the negligence, nuisance or breach of duty consist of or include damages in respect of personal injuries to the plaintiff or any other person."

It will be noted that this repeats the language of section 1(2) of the Act of 1963. Section 2A(2) provides: "Section 2 of this Act shall not apply to an action to which this section applies."

The effect of the remaining subsections of section 2A may be summarised. Subsections (3) and (4) provide, subject to section 2D, for the normal time limit of three years from—"(a) the date on which the action accrued, or (b) the date (if later) of the plaintiff's knowledge" to apply to personal injury actions. Subsections (5), (9) and (10) relate to actions under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 and need not be separately considered. Subsections (6) to (8) contain the provisions defining the concept of date of knowledge.

Section 2B applies to actions under the Fatal Accidents Acts. Section 2C is not presently relevant. Section 2D confers the discretion to "disapply" the provisions of section 2A or 2B in the circumstances and subject to the limitations laid down in the section. Finally, section 3 of the Act of 1975 contains the all important transitional provisions which I set out in full:

"(1) The provisions of this Act shall have effect in relation to causes of action which accrued before, as well as causes of action which accrue after, the commencement of this Act, and shall have effect in relation to any cause of action which accrued before the commencement of this Act notwithstanding that an action in respect thereof has been commenced and is pending at the commencement of this Act. (2) For the purposes of this section an action shall not be taken to be pending at any time if a final order or judgment has been made or given therein, notwithstanding that an appeal is pending or that the time for appealing has not expired. (3) It is hereby declared that a decision taken at any time by a court to grant, or not to grant, leave under Part I of the Limitation Act 1963 (which, so far as it relates to leave, is repealed by this Act) does not affect the determination of any question in proceedings under this Act, but in such proceedings account may be taken of evidence admitted in proceedings under the said provisions repealed by this Act. (4) In this section 'action' includes any proceeding in a court of law, an arbitration and a claim by way of set-off or counterclaim."

Mr. Ogden Q.C. [1986] 3 W.L.R. 171 based his decision on the generality of the opening words of section 2A: "This section applies to any action . . ." He did not refer in terms in his judgment to the transitional provisions in section 3 of the Act of 1975 but he must have had them in mind, because without section 3 the Act of 1975 could not have operated retrospectively at all. Ralph Gibson L.J. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 245 refuted Mr. Ogden's view in a lengthy passage at pp. 260-262 of his judgment, which relied in substantial measure on a comparison of the language of sections 2A and 2B. Whilst I do not dissent from, I do not find it necessary to follow, this somewhat elaborate reasoning, because it seems to me that it is possible to arrive at the same conclusion as that reached by the Court of Appeal by a simpler route, which perhaps may not have been open to the Court of Appeal on account of the effect of Knipe's case [1972] 1 Q.B. 361 by which they were bound.

To my mind the key question is to determine the extent to which section 3 of the Act of 1975 was intended to give retrospective effect to the earlier sections embodied by way of amendment of the Act of 1939. It will have been observed that section 3(1) and (2) of the Act of 1975 use the same terms as section 6(1) and (3) of the Act of 1963. This correspondence adopts precisely the Law Reform Committee's recommendation in paragraph 147 of their report. Reliance is placed on this by the counsel for the widow, but, by itself, it seems to me a neutral factor. It is clear that, for the same reasons as I have expressed earlier in relation to section 6 of the Act of 1963, section 3 of the Act of 1975 was intended to have some retrospective effect. If the Act of 1975 had been the next relevant statute immediately following the Act of 1954 without the intervening Act of 1963, I should have taken precisely the same view of its effect as that expressed by Mr. Ogden Q.C. In those circumstances, section 21 of the Act of 1939 having already been repealed, there would, as I think, have been no effective counter to the argument that the generality of the language of the new section 2A of the Act of 1939 in the light of the retrospective effect given to it by section 3 of the Act of 1975, had swept away all time bars in personal injury actions previously acquired since 1939, leaving all causes of action accruing since that date to be determined by the application of the new statutory provisions.

3 W.L.R.

Arnold v. C.E.G.B. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A But it must be legitimate and necessary to construe the Act of 1975 in the light of the preceding legislative history. To give full effect to the remedies which the Law Reform Committee proposed in order to correct the defects which they discovered in the operation of the regime for the limitation of personal injury actions under the Act of 1963 as amended by the Law Reform Miscellaneous Provisions Act 1971 it was clearly necessary, for the reasons they explained in paragraphs 137–146 of their report, to embody in the new statute transitional provisions giving the benefit of the new regime to plaintiffs whose causes of action had accrued during the period governed by the preceding regime, i.e. at any time between 1954 and 1975. Thus, plaintiffs whose causes of action had accrued between those dates would be entitled, where appropriate, to the exercise of the court's discretion under section 2D of the Act of 1939, they would not require the leave of the court to sue and their date of knowledge would be determined under the provisions of section 2A(6) to (8). All this was an essential part of curing the defects which the Law Reform Committee had exposed in the state of the law as they found it. But there is not the slightest hint in the report that the extent of the retrospective operation of the Act of 1963 was an aspect of the law calling for any remedial action. It is in this negative sense that the report seems to me to give support to the case for the board.

Consistently with the presumption that a statute affecting substantive rights is not to be construed as having retrospective operation unless it clearly appears to have been so intended, it seems to me entirely proper, in a case where some retrospective operation was clearly intended, equally to presume that the retrospective operation of the statute extends no further than is necessary to give effect either to its clear language or to its manifest purpose. Construing sections 2A to 2D of the Act of 1939 in the light of section 3 of the Act of 1975, I think that full effect is given both to the language and to the purposes of the legislation if it is held retrospectively applicable to all personal injury actions previously governed by the three year limitation period under the Act of 1954, whether as then enacted or as amended by the Act of 1963. Conversely, I can find nothing in the language or discernible purposes of the statute which leads clearly, let alone unavoidably, to the conclusion that defendants previously entitled to rely on the accrued six year and one year time bars under the original Act of 1939 which the Act of 1963 left intact were intended to be deprived of those accrued rights by the Act of 1975.

Not being bound by Knipe's case [1972] 1 Q.B. 361, your Lordships are able to take a broader view of the effect of the legislation as a whole than was open to the Court of Appeal. But this does not prevent me from echoing and endorsing the sentiments expressed by Ralph Gibson L.J. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 245 at the conclusion of his examination of the Act of 1975 where he said, at p. 262:

“For my part, I was content to reach this conclusion because it would, I think, have been a surprising consequence of the Act of 1975 if it had deprived this defendant of an accrued right which, on my view of the true effect of the Acts of 1954 and 1963, had remained unimpaired for the 31 years from 1944 to 1975.”

Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.

In 1976 the plaintiffs and the defendants, both foreign companies, entered into an agreement for the exploration of oil in the state of R'As al-Khaimah. The agreement contained a clause providing for the settlement of all disputes by three arbitrators appointed in Geneva under the rules of the International Chamber of Commerce, to whom was left the determination of the proper law to be applied. In March 1979, the plaintiffs referred a dispute to arbitration in Geneva in accordance with the clause. The arbitrators chose as the proper law of the contract what they described without further definition as "internationally accepted principles of law governing contractual relations" and made a substantial award in favour of the plaintiffs. But in April 1979 the defendants instituted proceedings in a court in R'As al-Khaimah and obtained rescission of the whole agreement and damages on the ground of misrepresentation. Neither party took any part in the proceedings instituted by the other, and neither the award nor the judgment was enforced. In June 1986, the plaintiffs discovered that an English company, S. Ltd., had been buying petroleum from and therefore owed money to the defendants. With the intention of satisfying the arbitration award out of payments due to the defendants from S. Ltd., the plaintiffs thereupon applied for and were granted leave to enforce the award in England as a judgment. They also obtained an injunction restraining the defendants from removing any assets from the jurisdiction. The defendants meanwhile obtained leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction on the plaintiffs, claiming enforcement of the R'As al-Khaimah court judgment. The defendants' applications to discharge the injunction and to set aside the leave granted to the plaintiffs to enforce their arbitration award were refused, while the plaintiffs' application to set aside the leave granted to the defendants to serve their writ out of the jurisdiction was granted. The defendants appealed, objecting to the choice of proper law in the arbitration. S. Ltd. intervened to support the defendants' opposition to continuation of the injunction, on the ground that as the debt owed by S. Ltd. to the defendants was payable in New York it was not an asset susceptible to such an injunction and was not enforceable by the English courts.

On the appeals:—

Held, dismissing the appeals, (1) that in considering whether to enforce an arbitration award made pursuant to an agreement which purported to provide that the rights of the parties should be governed by a system of law which was not that of England or of any other state or was a serious modification of such a law, the court had to be satisfied that the parties intended to create legally enforceable rights and obligations, that the resulting agreement was sufficiently certain to constitute a legally enforceable contract and that it would not be contrary to public policy to use the coercive powers of the state to enforce the award; that, on the facts, the parties had intended, and the agreement was sufficiently certain, to constitute a legally enforceable contract; and that since the Swiss arbitrators' choice for the proper law of the arbitration, being a common denominator of principles underlying the law of contract of various nations, was within the scope of the decision left to them by the parties, their award could not be regarded as unenforceable on the ground of public policy (post, pp. 1035E—1036A, 1041B,).

(2) That a debt which was enforceable within the jurisdiction by garnishment or the appointment of a receiver constituted an asset within the jurisdiction; that since the debt owed by S. Ltd. to the defendants, albeit payable outside the jurisdiction, could be enforced within the jurisdiction if S. Ltd. were to default on its obligation to pay, and since the indebtedness of S. Ltd. would be completely discharged if the debt were to be made the subject of a garnishee order which was then made absolute and payment made to the plaintiffs thereunder, that debt constituted an asset within the jurisdiction which could properly be made the subject of an injunction to restrain its disposal or removal from the jurisdiction (post, pp. 1038D—E, 1039B—C, 1040E—1041B).

APPEALS from Leggatt and Bingham JJ.

In the first appeal, the defendants, R'As al-Khaimah National Oil Co., appealed against orders made by Leggatt J. on 26 February 1987 whereby he (i) refused to discharge an order made by Bingham J. on 2 July 1986 granting the plaintiffs, Deutsche Schachtbau-und Tiefbohr-gesellschaft m.b.H., leave to enforce as a judgment an award made on 4 July 1980 by an arbitral tribunal in Geneva who held that the defendants should pay the sum of U.S.$4,635,664 to the plaintiffs, and (ii) set aside an order made by Staughton J. on 22 January 1987 granting the defendants leave to issue and serve without the jurisdiction a writ claiming from the plaintiffs sums allegedly due to the defendants under a judgment of the court of R'As al-Khaimah dated 3 December 1979. In the second appeal, the defendants and the interveners, Shell International

H

Petroleum Co. Ltd., appealed against an order made by Bingham J. on 8 August 1979 whereby he refused to discharge an injunction, granted by him on the ex parte application of the plaintiffs on 2 July 1986 and amended on 25 July 1986, restraining the defendants from accepting payment of a debt owed to them by the interveners and payable in New York, pending the outcome of the plaintiffs' application to enforce the Geneva arbitration award.

The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R.

Andrew Longmore Q.C., Alan Pardoe and Adrian Hughes for the defendants.

David Johnson Q.C. and Mark Havelock-Allan for Shell.

Stewart Boyd Q.C. and Ian Glick for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

24 March. The following judgments were handed down.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. Disputes arose between Deutsche Schachtbau-und Tiefbohrgesellschaft m.b.H. ("D.S.T.") and R'As al-Khaimah National Oil Co. ("Rakoil") under an oil exploration agreement dated 1 September 1976. The agreement contained an International Chamber of Commerce ("I.C.C.") arbitration clause and, in March 1979, D.S.T. referred its claims to an arbitral tribunal sitting in Geneva. In April 1979 Rakoil instituted proceedings in the court of R'As al-Khaimah for the rescission of the agreement upon the ground that it had been obtained by misrepresentation and also for damages. Neither party took any part in the proceedings instituted by the other. D.S.T. succeeded in the arbitration, the award dated 4 July 1980 being for U.S.$4,635,664. Rakoil succeeded in the litigation, judgment being given on 3 December 1979 whereby the agreement, or perhaps more accurately an earlier underlying agreement, was rescinded and D.S.T. were held liable to Rakoil in the sum of U.S.$1,424,891.23 and Dirhams 110,687,839.61.

At this stage honour, but little else, was satisfied, since neither party could find a way of enforcing these decisions. That situation might have continued indefinitely, but for the fact that in about June 1986 rumours reached D.S.T. that Shell International Petroleum Co. Ltd. ("Shell") had been buying oil from Rakoil and would, presumably, be paying for that oil. Shell was an English subsidiary of the Anglo-Dutch group and D.S.T. set about trying to satisfy the award out of Shell's payments to Rakoil.

On 2 July 1986, on the ex parte application of D.S.T., Bingham J. made orders: (i) pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 73, r.10 and section 3(1)(a) of the Arbitration Act 1975, granting leave to D.S.T. to enforce the Geneva arbitration award in the same manner as a judgment for the sum awarded, together with interest thereon amounting to a further sum of U.S.$3,778,366.49; and (ii) restraining Rakoil from

"removing outside the jurisdiction, disposing of, charging or otherwise dealing with any moneys owned by them or deposited by them within the jurisdiction, or any debts due or to become due to them within, or from any person within the jurisdiction [and in particular from directing, accepting or receiving payment of the

A debt or debts due or to become due to them from Shell International Petroleum Co. Ltd. or any other company or corporation resident in England and Wales] up to the amount of U.S.$8,500,000."

The words in square brackets were added by a further order of Bingham J. made on 24 July 1986, again on the ex parte application of D.S.T.

B On 8 August 1986 Bingham J. refused an application to discharge this injunction, noting that there was a pending application to set aside that part of his order dated 2 July 1986, which had given D.S.T. leave to enforce the arbitration award as a judgment. That application to set aside was heard by Leggatt J. on 25 February 1987.

C Meanwhile, on 22 January 1987, Rakoil applied for and obtained the leave of Staughton J. to issue a writ for service on D.S.T. in Germany claiming to enforce the R'As al-Khaimah judgment. The intention was to found a counterclaim to that based upon the award. An application to set aside that leave and all subsequent proceedings came before Leggatt J. at the same time as the application to set aside the leave to enforce the award as a judgment.

D Leggatt J. refused to set aside the leave granted to D.S.T. to enforce the award and set aside the leave to serve the writ issued by Rakoil against D.S.T. However he imposed a stay on execution of the award until after the hearing of an appeal to this court against the refusal of Bingham J. to discharge the injunction. That appeal was due to be heard on 9 March 1987.

E The reality was, and is, that D.S.T. has to uphold the validity of the orders both of Bingham J. and Leggatt J. if they are to enjoy any fruits of this litigation. If the leave to enforce the award is set aside, cadit quaestio. If the injunction is set aside, any assets of Rakoil in this country will disappear overseas in the twinkling of a telex.

Accordingly arrangements were made for the appeal from the judgment of Leggatt J. to be heard at the same time as that from the judgment of Bingham J.

F Meanwhile Shell were subjected to substantial commercial pressure to pay Rakoil in New York and, on their application, were given leave to intervene in the appeal against the grant and continuance of the injunction, which was inhibiting them from so doing. Thus the scene was set for an appeal which has raised issues of some general importance and which has been argued with great skill by all concerned.

G The logical starting point for a consideration of those issues must be the order giving leave to enforce the award and the refusal to set it aside.

Enforcement of the award

H The Geneva award is a "Convention award" within the meaning of the Arbitration Act 1975, being an award made in pursuance of an arbitration agreement in the territory of a state, other than the United Kingdom, namely Switzerland, which is a party to the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards. It follows that it is enforceable in England either by action or under section 26 of the Arbitration Act 1950 and that such enforcement is mandatory, save in the exceptional cases listed in section 5 of the Arbitration Act 1975. Section 5 provides, so far as is material:

"Refusal of enforcement.

"5(1) Enforcement of a Convention award shall not be refused except in the cases mentioned in this section. (2) Enforcement of a Convention award may be refused if the person against whom it is invoked proves . . . (b) that the arbitration agreement was not valid under the law to which the parties subjected it or, failing any indication thereon, under the law of the country where the award was made; or (d) (subject to subsection (4) of this section) that the award deals with a difference not contemplated by or not falling within the terms of the submission to arbitration or contains decisions on matters beyond the scope of the submission to arbitration; . . . (3) Enforcement of a Convention award may also be refused if the award is in respect of a matter which is not capable of settlement by arbitration, or if it would be contrary to public policy to enforce the award. (4) A Convention award which contains decisions on matters not submitted to arbitration may be enforced to the extent that it contains decisions on matters submitted to arbitration which can be separated from those on matters not so submitted."

Section 26 of the Act of 1950 provides:

"An award on an arbitration agreement may, by leave of the High Court or a judge thereof, be enforced in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect, and where leave is so given, judgment may be entered in terms of the award."

The machinery for applying for leave to enforce such an award is regulated by R.S.C., Ord. 73, r. 10. Suffice it to say that the application may be made ex parte, although the court can direct that a summons be issued, and that "the debtor" may apply to set the order aside within a specified time, in this case 23 days, of the order giving leave being served upon him and that

"the award shall not be enforced until after the expiration of that period or, if the debtor applies within that period to set aside the order, until after the application is finally disposed of." (Ord. 73, r. 10(6)).

D.S.T. complied with all the formalities and, subject to the result of this appeal, is, and has since 2 July 1986 been, entitled "to enforce the award in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect" and to enter judgment in the terms of the award, which D.S.T. has in fact done, but subject always to a continuing inability to proceed to immediate enforcement initially because of the terms of Ord. 73, r. 10(6) and latterly because of the stay granted by Leggatt J.

Mr. Longmore, for Rakoil, takes a number of points which can be consolidated under five heads: (a) Is the arbitration agreement subject to the law of R'As al-Khaimah and void under that law? (b) Can Rakoil rely upon the decision of the court of R'As al-Khaimah without regard to English rules on the recognition of foreign judgments? (c) Did the award exceed the scope of the submission and, if so, can enforcement be refused in whole or in part (section 5(2)(d) and (4) of the Arbitration Act 1975)? (d) Would it be contrary to public policy to enforce the award? (e) Are the answers to these questions so clear that there ought to be summary judgment, as contrasted with leaving D.S.T. to sue on the award?

3 W.L.R.

Deutsche Schachtbau v. National Oil (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.A The proper law of the arbitration agreement

It is common ground that this falls to be ascertained by the application of the English rules for the resolution of conflict of laws, since the instant proceedings are in the English courts. The agreement to arbitrate is contained in article XXI of the contract and is in the following terms:

B “XXI.1 All disputes arising in connection with the interpretation or application of this agreement shall be finally settled under the Rules of Conciliation and Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce by three arbitrators appointed in accordance with the Rules. XXI.2 The arbitration shall be held in Geneva, Switzerland and shall be conducted in the English language.”

C Mr. Longmore submits that the proper law of this agreement to arbitrate is that which applies to the wider (substantive) agreement in which it is contained and that, applying the rule that, in the absence of indications of some different choice by the parties, the proper law of a contract is that system of law with which the transaction has the closest and most real connection, the relevant law is that of R’As al-Khaimah: Compagnie Tunisienne de Navigation S.A. v. Compagnie d’Armement Maritime S.A. [1971] A.C. 572.

D Mr. Boyd, appearing for D.S.T., rightly points out, however, that an arbitration agreement constitutes a self-contained contract collateral or ancillary to the substantive agreement (Bremer Vulkan Schiffbau und Maschinenfabrik S.A. v. South India Shipping Corporation Ltd. [1981] A.C. 909) and that it need not be governed by the same law as that agreement (Hamlyn & Co. v. Talisker Distillery [1894] A.C. 202, and Black Clawson International Ltd. v. Papierwerke Waldhof Aschaffenburg A.G. [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 446). Furthermore the rules for the I.C.C. court of arbitration, of which the parties must be deemed to have been aware, contemplate by article 8.4 that the arbitrator:

F “shall not cease to have jurisdiction by reason of any claim that the contract is null and void or allegation that it is inexistent provided that he upholds the validity of the agreement to arbitrate. He shall continue to have jurisdiction, even though the contract itself may be inexistent or null and void, to determine the respective rights of the parties and to adjudicate their claims and pleas.”

G The intention of the parties that the agreement to arbitrate shall be an independent and collateral contract could not be more clearly indicated.

H Looking at the arbitration agreement in isolation, there can only be one answer, namely, that it is governed by Swiss law. Of course it is not permissible to do this and regard must be had to all the surrounding circumstances, including the proper law governing the substantive contract and to the fact that the contract was to be performed in R’As al-Khaimah. However, in view of the international character of the enterprise, it is far from self-evident that the substantive contract is governed by the law of R’As al-Khaimah. As is not unusual in the oil industry, it involved parties of differing nationalities, using United States dollars as the money of account, who have chosen a neutral forum for the resolution of disputes and may well be thought to have chosen a neutral law to govern their rights and liabilities. This probability becomes all the stronger when reference is made to article 13.3 of the I.C.C. Rules which provides:

"The parties shall be free to determine the law to be applied by the arbitrator to the merits of the dispute. In the absence of any indication by the parties as to the applicable law, the arbitrator shall apply the law designated as the proper law by the rule of conflict which he deems appropriate."

This suggests that the parties intended to delegate to the arbitrators the choice of law governing the substantive contract, applying what they considered to be appropriate principles and, in the event, the arbitrators did not hold that the contract was governed by the law of R'As al-Khaimah.

Giving the fullest possible weight to any argument favouring the law of R'As al-Khaimah as the proper law of the substantive contract and to the fact that it was undoubtedly the law of the place of performance, I find myself in complete agreement with Leggatt J. that the proper law of the arbitration is Swiss.

Effect of the judgment of the court of R'As al-Khaimah

Once it is decided that the agreement to arbitrate is governed by Swiss law, the judgment becomes irrelevant to the validity of that agreement, whether the judgment is viewed as a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction or as an expert opinion upon the law of R'As al-Khaimah. In terms of Swiss law, which is the only relevant law in the context of the validity of the arbitration agreement, the affidavit evidence of Professor Pierre Lalive is that the arbitration agreement is valid and that this validity is unaffected by any question as to the validity of the contract of which it forms part. This evidence stands uncontradicted. Furthermore no application was made to cross-examine him on his affidavit.

The judgment has, however, to be considered in the context of the decision by Leggatt J. to set aside the leave to serve the writ outside the jurisdiction seeking to enforce it by way of counterclaim. At this point it becomes necessary to look, albeit briefly, at section 32 of the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982. This, so far as is material, provides:

"(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, a judgment given by a court of an overseas country in any proceedings shall not be recognised or enforced in the United Kingdom if (a) the bringing of those proceedings in that court was contrary to an agreement under which the dispute in question was to be settled otherwise than by proceedings in the courts of that country; and (b) those proceedings were not brought in that court by, or with the agreement of, the person against whom the judgment was given; and (c) that person did not counterclaim in the proceedings or otherwise submit to the jurisdiction of that court. (2) Subsection (1) does not apply where the agreement referred to in paragraph (a) of that subsection was illegal, void or unenforceable or was incapable of being performed for reasons not attributable to the fault of the party bringing the proceedings in which the judgment was given. (3) In determining whether a judgment given by a court of an overseas country should be recognised or enforced in the United Kingdom, a court in the United Kingdom shall not be bound by any decision of the overseas court relating to any of the matters mentioned in subsection (1) or (2)."

3 W.L.R.

Deutsche Schachtbau v. National Oil (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A The bringing of proceedings by Rakoil in the court of R'As al-Khaimah was a breach of the arbitration agreement, whose scope was amply wide enough to cover all matters in dispute in those proceedings, and accordingly the judgment cannot be recognised or enforced. It follows that Leggatt J. was right to set aside the leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction and the R'As al-Khaimah judgment disappears from the scene.

B

The scope of the award and of the arbitration agreement

C Mr. Longmore submits that the award deals with a difference or differences not contemplated by, or not falling within, the terms of the submission to arbitration or contains decisions on matters beyond the scope of the submission to arbitration and that it is not possible to separate such matters from those falling within the true scope of the agreement. Accordingly enforcement should be refused (section 5(2)(d) and (4) of the Arbitration Act 1975) or at the very least there should not be summary enforcement.

D

The claim in the arbitration was made by D.S.T. on its own behalf and as agent for and representative of a group of companies including a German company to which I will refer as "Deminex." Deminex, unlike the other companies in the group, does not appear to have been a party to the arbitration agreement. The award also mentioned a company called "Sea & Land" and notes that it had a contract with the Government of R'As al-Khaimah which had not been submitted to arbitration. It appears from the award that both Deminex and Sea & Land were members of a consortium of which D.S.T. was the leader.

E

The interest of Deminex was challenged in a letter to the Secretary General of the I.C.C. dated 5 April 1979 from the English solicitors of Rakoil. That letter was brought to the attention of the arbitrators and is mentioned in the award. They were also aware that Sea & Land was not a party to the dispute and it is not apparent to me that D.S.T. was ever claiming on behalf of Sea & Land.

F

G Rakoil has never denied the fact that D.S.T. was a party to the arbitration agreement and the award determines only the rights of D.S.T. and Rakoil inter se. It makes no award in favour of Deminex or Sea & Land and makes no determination of the rights of Deminex or Sea & Land against D.S.T. If the arbitrators have erred in the amount awarded to D.S.T., because they have wrongly taken account of the interests of Deminex or Sea & Land, that is a matter which should have been the subject of a claim to relief from the Swiss court. No such application has been made. The burden of proving any excess of jurisdiction lies on the person seeking to resist the enforcement of the award. In the light of the failure to apply to the Swiss courts, of the evidence of Professor Pierre Lalive as to the wide powers of arbitrators under Swiss law, of the fact that the award is made solely in favour of D.S.T. and of the terms of the award itself from which it seems that the arbitrators have held that D.S.T. had independent rights as "the operator," I am not satisfied that there has been any excess of jurisdiction. This objection therefore fails.

H

Public policy in relation to the enforcement of the award

In pursuance of their duty under article 13.3 of the I.C.C. rules, the arbitrators determined that the proper law governing the substantive obligations of the parties was “internationally accepted principles of law governing contractual relations.” The arbitrators prefaced this decision with the following statement:

“The arbitration tribunal holds that: The Concession Agreement, the Assignment Agreement and the 1976 Operating Agreement are contracts between, on one hand, a number of companies organised under various laws, and, on the other hand, a state respectively a company which is actually an agency of such state. Reference either to the law of any one of the companies, or of such state, or of the state on whose territory one or several of these contracts were entered into, may seem inappropriate, for several reasons. The arbitration tribunal will refer to what has become common practice in international arbitrations particularly in the field of oil drilling concessions, and especially to arbitrations located in Switzerland. Indeed, this practice, which must have been known to the parties, should be regarded as representing their implicit will. Reference is made in particular to the leading cases of Sapphire International Petroleum Ltd. v. National Iranian Oil Company (1967) 35 Int'l.L.Rep. 136 and Texaco Overseas Petroleum Company v. Government of the Libyan Arab Republic (1979) Int'l.L.Rep. 389. See also Lalive, Les Règles de conflit de lois appliquées au fond du litige par l'arbitre international siégeant en Suisse, L'arbitrage international privé et la Suisse (1977); see also Derains, L'application cumulative par l'arbitre des systèmes de conflit de lois intéressés au litige, in Revue de l'arbitrage (1972), p. 100.”

Mr. Longmore submits that it would be contrary to English public policy to enforce an award which holds that the rights and obligations of the parties are to be determined, not on the basis of any particular national law, but upon some unspecified, and possibly ill defined, internationally accepted principles of law.

In Orion Compania Espanola de Seguros v. Belfort Maatschappij voor Algemere Verzekering [1962] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 257 Megaw J. was confronted with an arbitration agreement whereby:

“The arbitrators and umpire are relieved from all judicial formalities and may abstain from following the strict rules of the law. They shall settle any dispute under this agreement according to an equitable rather than a strictly legal interpretation of its terms and their decision shall be final and not subject to appeal.”

The umpire had refused to state his award in the form of a special case and the respondents to an application that he be ordered to do so submitted that no substantial or defined question of law arose. Megaw J. referred to the classic decision of this court in Czarnikow v. Roth Schmidt & Co. [1922] 2 K.B. 478 and, in the tradition of that decision and indeed of the English courts throughout the ages, roundly declared [1962] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 257, 265:

“so long as there is supervisory jurisdiction by the courts, the parties cannot make a question of law any less a question of law, whether for the purpose of the exercise of the courts' discretion or otherwise, by purporting to agree that it shall be decided by some extra-legal criterion.”

3 W.L.R.

Deutsche Schachtbau v. National Oil (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A However, Megaw J. also considered the clause in a different context, namely, whether the courts would give effect to such a clause. Referring again to the Czarnikow case he said, at p. 264:

B “The conclusion which I draw from those judgments is that it is the policy of the law in this country that, in the conduct of arbitrations, arbitrators must in general apply a fixed and recognizable system of law, which primarily and normally would be the law of England, and that they cannot be allowed to apply some different criterion such as the view of the individual arbitrator or umpire on abstract justice or equitable principles, which, of course, does not mean ‘equity’ in the legal sense of the word at all. This conclusion is, I think, supported by the judgment of Goddard J. in the case of Maritime Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Assecuranz-Union von 1865 (1935) 52 Ll.L.Rep. 16. I am not going to go into that case in detail. The arbitration clause there contained words very similar to the words in the present article 17, and they were as follows: ‘The arbitrators or umpire, as the case may be, shall interpret this treaty rather as an honourable engagement than as a merely legal obligation, and shall be relieved from all judicial formalities, and may abstain from following the strict rule of the law.’ At p. 20 of the report, Goddard J. deals with the effects of that part of the arbitration clause, and, as I read his judgment, he is saying there that the effect of it is not in any way to alter the requirement that English law shall be applied in the decision of disputes by an English arbitration tribunal. I agree with Mr. Evans’s submission that parties can validly provide for some other system of law to be applied to an arbitration tribunal. Thus, it may be, though perhaps it would be unusual, that the parties could validly agree that a part, or the whole, of their legal relations should be decided by the arbitral tribunal on the basis of a foreign system of law, or perhaps on the basis of principles of international law; for example, in a contract to which a sovereign state was a party. It may well be that the arbitral tribunal could properly give effect to such an agreement, and the court in its supervisory jurisdiction would also give effect to it, just as it would give effect to a contractual provision in the body of the contract that the proper law of the contract should be some system of foreign law. Indeed, it might be another way of achieving the same result, and I see no reason why an arbitral tribunal in England should not, in a proper case, where the parties have so agreed, apply foreign law or international law. Of course, also, as Mr. Evans again suggested, the parties can by their contract, either in the arbitration clause itself or in the rest of the contract, provide that certain incidents of law which would otherwise attach should not attach, such as the exclusion or alteration of the statutory period of limitation, or the exclusion of the implied terms of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, or suchlike matters. There is no possible objection to that, so long as there is nothing contrary to public policy in the exclusion or alteration of the provisions which, in the absence of agreement, would attach. But this is not such a case. If the parties choose to provide in their contract that the rights and obligations shall not be decided in accordance with law but in accordance with some other criterion, such as what the arbitrators consider to be fair and reasonable, whether or not in accordance with law, then, if that provision has any effect at all, its effect, as I see it, would be that there would be no contract, because the parties did not intend the contract to have legal effect—to affect their legal relations. If there were no contract, there would be no legally binding arbitration clause, and an ‘award’ would not be an award which the law would recognise.”

A clause in the same terms was considered in this court in Eagle Star Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Yuval Insurance Co. Ltd. [1978] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 357, where Lord Denning M.R., with the agreement of Goff L.J. and Shaw L.J. said, at p. 362:

“I do not believe that the presence of such a clause makes the whole contract void or a nullity. It is a perfectly good contract. If there is anything wrong with the provision, it can only be on the ground that it is contrary to public policy for parties so to agree. I must say that I cannot see anything in public policy to make this clause void. On the contrary the clause seems to me to be entirely reasonable. It does not oust the jurisdiction of the courts. It only ousts technicalities and strict constructions. That is what equity did in the old days. And it is what arbitrators may properly do today under such a clause as this. Even under an ordinary arbitration submission, it was a mistake for the courts in the beginning to upset awards simply for errors of law. See what Williams J. and Willes J. said in Hodgkinson v. Fernie (1857) 3 C.B.N.S. 189, 202, 205. That mistake can be avoided by such a clause as this: for, as Scrutton L.J. said in Czarnikow v. Roth Schmidt & Co. [1922] 2 K.B. 478, the parties can, by express provision, authorise arbitrators to depart from the strictnesses of the law. So I am prepared to hold that this arbitration clause, in all its provisions, is valid and of full effect, including the requirement that the arbitrators shall decide on equitable grounds rather than a strict legal interpretation. I realise, of course, that this lessens the points on which one party or the other can ask for a case stated. But that is no bad thing. Cases stated have been carried too far. It would be to the advantage of the commercial community that they should be reduced: and a claim (sic. ?clause) of this kind would go far to ensure this.”

In my judgment there are three questions which the court has to ask itself when confronted with a clause which purports to provide that the rights of the parties shall be governed by some system of “law” which is not of England or any other state or is a serious modification of such a law.

1. Did the parties intend to create legally enforceable rights and obligations?

If they did not, there is no basis for the intervention of the coercive power of the state to give effect to those “rights and obligations.” An intention not to create legally enforceable rights and obligations may be expressed—“this agreement is binding in honour only”—or it may be implied from the relationship between the parties or from the fact that the agreed criteria for the determination of the parties’ rights and obligations are too vague or idiosyncratic to have been intended as a basis for the creation of such rights and obligations.

3 W.L.R.

Deutsche Schachtbau v. National Oil (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

- A 2. Is the resulting agreement sufficiently certain to constitute a legally enforceable contract?

This question assumes that the parties intended to create a legally enforceable relationship, but is addressed to the problem of whether the terms of their agreement are too uncertain to produce such a result. However, given that this was the intention of the parties, the courts will not be “too astute or too subtle in finding defects; but, on the contrary, the court should seek to apply the old maxim of English law, verba ita sunt intelligenda ut res magis valeat quam pereat: per Lord Wright in Hillas & Co. Ltd. v. Arcos Ltd. (1932) 147 L.T. 503, 514. In this context another maxim is relevant—id certum est quod certum reddi potest—and there is a vital distinction between an agreement to agree in future and an agreement to accept terms to be determined by a third party. The former cannot and the latter can form the basis for a legally enforceable agreement.

- C 3. Would it be contrary to public policy to enforce the award, using the coercive powers of the state?

- D Considerations of public policy can never be exhaustively defined, but they should be approached with extreme caution. As Burrough J. remarked in Richardson v. Mellish (1824) 2 Bing. 229, 252, “It is never argued at all, but when other points fail.” It has to be shown that there is some element of illegality or that the enforcement of the award would be clearly injurious to the public good or, possibly, that enforcement would be wholly offensive to the ordinary reasonable and fully informed member of the public on whose behalf the powers of the state are exercised.

- E Asking myself these questions, I am left in no doubt that the parties intended to create legally enforceable rights and liabilities and that the enforcement of the award would not be contrary to public policy. That only leaves the question of whether the agreement has the requisite degree of certainty. By choosing to arbitrate under the rules of the I.C.C. and, in particular, article 13.3, the parties have left proper law to be decided by the arbitrators and have not in terms confined the choice to national systems of law. I can see no basis for concluding that the arbitrators’ choice of proper law—a common denominator of principles underlying the laws of the various nations governing contractual relations—is outwith the scope of the choice which the parties left to the arbitrators.

- G I have dealt with the matter in general terms, because Mr. Boyd told us that this was a matter of considerable importance to those engaged in international commerce. But it would appear that in the instant case the decision of the arbitrators rested primarily, if not exclusively, on findings of fact including a finding that there was no such mis-representation as was alleged by Rakoil as a ground for its contention that both the substantive agreement and the arbitration agreement were voidable.

Summary enforcement

Should the award be enforced summarily or should D.S.T. be left to sue on the award? The remedy under section 26 of the Arbitration Act 1950 is indeed a summary remedy and if there were matters which required a further investigation which could only appropriately be undertaken by proceedings begun by writ, I would have been in favour of allowing the appeal, but I have been unable to detect any such matters.

For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal from the judgment of Leggatt J.

The injunction

On 22 May 1975 in Nippon Yusen Kaisha v. Karageorgis [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1093, a Court of Appeal consisting of Lord Denning M.R., Browne L.J. and Geoffrey Lane L.J. granted the first Mareva injunction, Lord Denning M.R. saying, at p. 1094:

"We are told that an injunction of this kind has never been granted before. It has never been the practice of the English courts to seize assets of a defendant in advance of judgment or to restrain the disposal of them . . . It seems to me that the time has come when we should revise our practice." (My emphasis)

On 23 June 1975 in Mareva Compania Naviera S.A. v. International Bulkcarriers S.A. [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509, a Court of Appeal consisting of Lord Denning M.R., Roskill L.J. and Ormrod L.J. had its attention drawn to Lister & Co. v. Stubbs (1890) 45 Ch.D. 1 in which Cotton L.J. had said, at p. 13:

"I know of no case where, because it was highly probable that if the action were brought to a hearing the plaintiff could establish that a debt was due to him from the defendant, the defendant has been ordered to give security until that has been established by the judgment or decree."

Lord Denning M.R. adverted to his earlier decision, saying [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509, 510:

"If it appears that the debt is due and owing—and there is a danger that the debtor may dispose of his assets so as to defeat it before judgment—the court has jurisdiction in a proper case to grant an interlocutory judgment so as to prevent him disposing of those assets." (My emphasis again).

I mention this at the outset because, although it was convenient to refer to the order made by Bingham J. as a Mareva injunction, and it was so referred to throughout the argument, it is at least doubtful whether it falls into that category. The Mareva innovation, which time has shown to be one of the most imaginative, important and, on the whole, most beneficent of modern times, lay in giving a plaintiff some degree of protection before he became a judgment creditor and in anticipation that he would become one. Judgment creditors had little need of new protection since they were usually adequately protected by their right to levy execution by a writ of fi fa, attachment of debts or the appointment of a receiver. And where they were not, the court has intervened by injunction to prevent the payment to and receipt by the judgment debtor of an asset in circumstances in which it would not otherwise have been available to the judgment creditor in satisfaction of the judgment debt: Bullus v. Bullus (1910) 102 L.T. 399.

3 W.L.R.

Deutsche Schachtbau v. National Oil (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A Once Bingham J. had given D.S.T. leave to enforce the award as a judgment, as he did in the same order as that granting the injunction, D.S.T. became judgment creditors of Rakoil, albeit subject to a suspension of their right to levy execution and subject to the possibility that the order giving them this status might be set aside on the application of Rakoil. It was not the case that D.S.T. would become judgment creditors if and when Rakoil failed to set the order aside.

B Once the order was made, D.S.T. were in precisely the same position as any plaintiff who has obtained judgment, subject to a stay pending an application to the Court of Appeal to set the judgment aside.

C Bingham J. did not rest his decision on this point, but it has been raised by the respondent's notice of D.S.T. and could be material to the exercise of discretion. On the approach adopted by the judge, namely that he was concerned with an application for a Mareva injunction and that the claim of D.S.T. was based upon an award which would not necessarily be enforceable as a judgment, the first question to be considered was whether Rakoil had any assets within the jurisdiction, either when the injunction was granted on 2 July, when it was varied on 25 July or when it was affirmed on 8 August 1986. The only asset which

D has ever been suggested was the trading debt owed by Shell to which I referred at the outset of this judgment. On 2 July the evidence about this was "somewhat vague," taking more definite shape by 25 July. However it was only on 8 August that the real point emerged. This was that, whilst the trading debt was very much an asset—it was worth U.S.$4,843,051.10—it was not, according to Rakoil, an asset within the

E jurisdiction. There was also a subsidiary point, more fully deployed in this court, that only part of the debt, U.S.$662,751.54, was an asset of Rakoil, the remainder being assets of the government of R'As al-Khaimah or of the R'As al-Khaimah Gas Commission.

F The advent of Shell as an intervener in the appeal has further clarified the facts and we now know that there were two shipments of oil at the Hulaylah Terminal, R'As al-Khaimah, one on board the Euro Pride covered by two bills of lading dated 16 June 1986 and the other on board the Nichitima Maru covered by two bills of lading dated 29 June 1986. The sales were f.o.b. under a contract governed by English law and the payment term was:

G "Due within 30 days of bill of lading date against receipt of telexed invoice, documents of title and other shipping documents as agreed or in the absence of these documents, buyer to accept seller's debt of indemnity in a form acceptable to buyer. Payment to be made by telegraphic transfer to seller's nominated account."

H We also now know, from an affidavit of Mr. D. S. S. Reid, Shell's Vice-President of Products Trading:

"[Shell] do not maintain bank accounts for oil trading within the jurisdiction. All of their trading is conducted in US dollars and the funds which they use for this purpose are located in bank accounts in New York. In the normal course of business [Shell] would have given instructions from their London office for [Rakoil's] invoices to be paid by telegraphic transfer from [Shell's] New York bank accounts to the bank accounts in New York nominated by [Rakoil] in each invoice, as and when the date for payment fell due.”

There were four invoices addressed by Rakoil to Shell, the two which related to the Euro Pride shipments being dated 18 June 1986 and the two which related to the Nichitima Maru shipments being dated 29 June 1986. All four invoices called for payment the favoured one being named as Rakoil in the case of one invoice, the government of R’As al-Khaimah in the case of two other invoices and the R’As al-Khaimah Gas Commission in the case of the fourth invoice.

I can dispose at once of the submission that this was or may not have been an asset of Rakoil. Shell say that the supply agreement under which they took the oil was between them and Rakoil and the invoices were raised by Rakoil. There may indeed be contractual arrangements between Rakoil on the one hand and the government of R’As al-Khaimah and the R’As al-Khaimah Gas Commission on the other, whereby Rakoil is accountable to the government and to the commission for part of the receipts from Shell, but the evidence does not give rise to any doubt but that Shell’s indebtedness was to Rakoil as a principle.

The issue, however, remains of whether this indebtedness constituted an asset of Rakoil situated within the jurisdiction. This falls to be considered as a matter of the English law governing conflicts of law and is intimately bound up with the allied question of whether the debt could be taken in execution of an English judgment in favour of D.S.T. by garnishment or the appointment of a receiver, since it would not be right to maintain an injunction if the debt could not be so taken.

So far as the law of garnishment is concerned, Mr. Boyd submitted, and I would accept, that the only relevant jurisdictional requirements are that the garnishee shall be “within the jurisdiction” and that the subject matter should be a “debt due or accruing due to the judgment debtor from the garnishee”: see R.S.C., Ord. 49, r. 1(1). However, as a matter of discretion, a garnishee order will not be made against such a person if it would not operate to discharge the garnishee in whole or pro tanto from his liability in respect of the debt. Such a situation can arise where the garnishee, although himself within the jurisdiction, is not indebted within that jurisdiction: S.C.F. Finance v. Masri (No. 3) [1987] 2 W.L.R. 81, 95–96 and Swiss Bank Corporation v. Boehmische Industrial Bank [1923] 1 K.B. 637, 680–681.

This problem of double jeopardy is much less serious than it might otherwise be, because garnishment is a process which is recognised internationally and most nations will give effect to a rule similar to that of English law, namely, that “the validity and effect of an attachment or garnishment of a debt are governed by the lex situs of the debt” (Dicey & Morris, The Conflict of Laws, 10th ed., r. 84) and that debts “generally are situate in the country where, they are properly recoverable or can be enforced” (Dicey & Morris, r. 76(1)). A complication and exception arises where the debtor carries on business in more than one jurisdiction. In such a case, if the creditor has expressly or impliedly

3 W.L.R.

Deutsche Schachtbau v. National Oil (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A stipulated for payment at one of those places, the debt will be held to be there situate. Happily that complication does not arise in the instant appeal, since Shell asserts, with all the emphasis born no doubt of a desire to avoid adverse consequences under United States fiscal and other laws, that it does not carry on business in New York. It is simply owed money by New York bankers.

B If, perish the thought, Shell were to default upon its obligation to pay Rakoil for the oil which it has bought and received, its liability could certainly be enforced in this country and possibly only in this country. Certainly there is no suggestion that it could be enforced in New York. It follows that, but for the stay of execution, the debt could have been the subject of a garnishee order in this country and that if the order were made absolute and payment was made to D.S.T. thereunder, the indebtedness of Shell would be discharged for all purposes.

C Mr. Johnson, appearing for Shell, reserves the right to challenge the correctness of this analysis which rests upon authority which is not binding upon the House of Lords. However, he also submits that even if this debt is technically an asset of Rakoil situated within the jurisdiction, this is too narrow and legalistic an approach to apply to a commercial transaction. Shell will not default and would indeed have paid in July 1986, but for the fact that it was prevented from doing so by the injunction. A chose in action or even a debt is only of commercial value to the extent that it produces money or a credit and this debt would never have produced either in England. Rakoil would have received this benefit in New York.

E He then referred us to the decisions of this court in Z Ltd. v. A-Z and AA-LL [1982] Q.B. 558 and Intraco Ltd. v. Notis Shipping Corporation [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 256 as indicating that Mareva injunctions should be drawn in terms which leave banks free to honour their obligations under letters of credit and bank guarantees, whilst restricting the use which beneficiaries can make of payments received by them from the banks. By a parity of reasoning, the court should not interfere with the performance by Shell of its commercial obligations and should only concern itself with the payment for the oil when it had come into the hands of Rakoil—in New York.

The ratio of the decision in Intraco Ltd.'s case is set out at p. 257:

G "Irrevocable letters of credit and bank guarantees given in circumstances such that they are the equivalent of an irrevocable letter of credit have been said to be the life blood of commerce. Thrombosis will occur if, unless fraud is involved, the courts intervene and thereby disturb the mercantile practice of treating rights thereunder as being the equivalent of cash in hand."

H I could have added that it is not only the beneficiary of the credit who relies upon the bank's engagement not to revoke it. Third parties may, and often do, deal with the beneficiary on the faith of the fact that, come what may, he will be paid under the letter of credit. The decision in Z Ltd. v. A-Z adds nothing to this, save to extend the principle, obiter, to bank credit cards.

The obligation undertaken by Shell towards Rakoil was not of this character. Indeed Mr. Boyd illustrated this neatly by taking an imaginary scenario in which a Mareva injunction is granted restraining Mr. X, resident in the United Arab Emirates, from removing his assets from the jurisdiction. He has given his London bank a standing order requiring the making of monthly payments in U.S. dollars to Mr. Z in New York. Such an order is revocable and the effect of the injunction is to revoke it: Rekstin v. Severo Sibirsko Gosudarstvennoe Akcionernoe Obschestvo Komseverputj and the Bank for Russian Trade Ltd. [1933] 1 K.B. 47. The fact that the bank would, in the ordinary course of events, have complied with the order by making payments out of an account with another bank which it maintained in New York for the purpose of making such payments, is irrelevant. Assuming in favour of Rakoil that others had an interest in the New York account to which payments were to be made, those others can be substituted for Mr. Z, Rakoil for Mr. X and Shell for the bank. There is nothing special about the relationship between Shell and Rakoil. Like that of the bank and Mr. X, it is simply one of debtor and creditor.

Some argument was addressed to us on the basis that on 2 July 1986, when the injunction was imposed, the debt had not yet arisen and so, it was said, there was no subject matter for the injunction which, accordingly, should not have been granted. It would also follow, although this was not stressed on behalf of Rakoil, that when the time for payment arrived and there was a debt, Shell would at once pay that debt and extinguish it. The interval of time between the debt arising and its extinction would be so short that no injunction could effectively be imposed.

The fallacy of this line of argument is that it confuses indebtedness with a right to payment and ignores the fact that a debt is a debt whether it is due or merely accruing due. If the customer of a bank is in credit, the bank is indebted to him even if there is no obligation to pay until the customer demands payment. Shell was indebted to Rakoil from the moment when, on or about 18 and 29 June 1986, it took delivery of the oil f.o.b.

There remains only the exercise of discretion. Shell did not seek to intervene in the court below and Bingham J. did not therefore have to consider their representations. For my part I accept that they are under commercial pressure to pay, but not that any court to whose jurisdiction they may be subject would fail to recognise the jurisdiction of the English courts to extinguish their indebtedness to Rakoil by a garnishee order and to restrain payment by Shell meanwhile. Commercial pressure is to be distinguished from double jeopardy by legal process and does not, in my judgment, provide any reason to refrain from upholding the injunction.

In administering the Mareva jurisdiction, the courts have rightly been mindful that the object of the exercise has been to prevent "cheating" by defendants—dissipating assets, causing them to "disappear" into the pockets of others, removing them from the jurisdiction and so on. It has not been to provide advance security for the satisfaction of a judgment debt which has not yet arisen. Accordingly, in appropriate cases injunctive orders have been drawn so as to permit ordinary trading debts to be incurred and discharged and the use of assets for living expenses. However it is for the defendant to apply for such exceptions to the generality of the injunctive order and Rakoil has made no such application.

The case for imposing an injunction was much stronger than Bingham J. thought that it was, because D.S.T. were actual and not

3 W.L.R.

Donaldson M.R.

A potential judgment creditors. The purpose of the injunction was thus to maintain the status quo during the period covered by the stay of execution and not to preserve assets against the probability that D.S.T. might at some later date be able to establish its claim—the ordinary Mareva situation.

Accordingly I would dismiss this further appeal.

B WOOLF L.J. I agree.

RUSSELL L.J. I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.
Leave to appeal refused.

C 6 May. Shell adduced further evidence showing that judgment had been obtained against them by the government of R'As al-Khaimah in that country's local courts in respect of the debt owed by them. The Court of Appeal granted Shell's application for leave to appeal to the House of Lords and lifted the stay of execution in respect of the injunction of 24 March 1987 to allow the commencement of garnishee proceedings. Such proceedings were to be commenced expeditiously before a single judge in the Commercial Court and any appeal therefrom was to be similarly expedited. The Court of Appeal would grant leave to appeal to the House of Lords thus enabling the garnishee proceedings to be determined by the House of Lords at the same time as the appeal on the injunction. Enforcement of any garnishee order absolute which might be granted would be stayed pending determination in the House of Lords of any appeal in respect thereof.

INTERPOOL LTD. v. GALANI

1987 June 10; 23

Lloyd and Balcombe L.JJ.

Execution—Examination of judgment debtor—Jurisdiction—Registration of foreign judgment—Obligation on judgment debtor to answer questions relating to foreign assets—R.S.C., Ord. 48, r. 1(1)

B

In 1985, the plaintiff obtained judgment in the High Court of Paris in the sum of U.S. $8,196,000 against the defendant, then living in France. In 1986, when the defendant was living in England, the judgment was registered in the Queen's Bench Division pursuant to section 2(1) of the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933.¹ On a reference by the deputy master, the judge ruled that the defendant was obliged, during his oral examination under R.S.C., Ord. 48, r. 1(1),² to answer any questions, or to produce any books or other documents in his possession, relating to his property or other means outside the jurisdiction.

C

On the defendant's appeal:—

D

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the court's jurisdiction to enforce a judgment debt was not limited to debts incurred within the jurisdiction and the provisions of Order 48 were not limited to assets, and debts incurred, within the jurisdiction; and that, accordingly, the judgment debtor was obliged, on his examination under Order 48, to answer questions intended to discover his assets outside as well as within the jurisdiction (post, pp. 1044G, H, 1045H, H—1046A, F).

Interpool Ltd. v. Galani (C.A.)

A INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL from Sir Neil Lawson sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division.

B By an order dated 24 April 1986, a judgment obtained by the plaintiff, Interpool Ltd., in the High Court of Paris against the defendant, Anthony John Galani, was registered in the Queen's Bench Division pursuant to the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933. On a reference by the deputy master, the judge ruled that the judgment debtor was obliged to answer any questions concerning any assets of the judgment debtor which were not within the jurisdiction.

C The defendant appealed on the ground that the judge erred in law in holding that R.S.C., Ord. 48 on its true construction obliged the judgment debtor to answer questions as to whether and if so what debts were owing to him and whether the judgment debtor has any and if so what other property and means of satisfying the judgment within the jurisdiction of the court and was required to produce books and documents in his possession relevant to such questions.

The facts are stated in the judgment of the court.

Michael E. Jones for the defendant.

Jeffrey Gruder for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

23 June. The following judgment of the court was handed down.

E BALCOMBE L.J. On 11 August 1978 Mr. Galani, who is a Greek citizen and was then living in France, entered into written personal guarantees for all moneys due to Interpool Ltd. by three shipping and transportation companies in which he had interests: they were Liberian, Greek and French companies. Interpool Ltd. is a company incorporated in one of the states of the United States of America. On 21 October 1985 Interpool Ltd. obtained judgment on the guarantees against Mr. Galani in the High Court of Paris in the sum of U.S. $8,196,000 with interest at 9 per cent. from 9 March 1979. The basis of the jurisdiction of the Paris court was that that was the court of Mr. Galani's domicile. However, in 1985 Mr. Galani came to live in north London and he still lives there with his wife and children.

G On 9 May 1986 the judgment of the High Court of Paris was registered as a judgment in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice pursuant to section 2(1) of the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933. The total amount for which the judgment was entered was U.S. $13,742,909.64, including interest up to 24 April 1986; the sterling equivalent is £9,161,939.30. Mr. Galani did not contest the registration or validity of the judgment. In the remainder of this judgment we refer to Interpool Ltd. as the judgment creditor and to Mr. Galani as the judgment debtor.

H On 30 July 1986 Master Grant made an order for the oral examination of the judgment debtor under R.S.C., Ord. 48, and that order was served on the judgment debtor on 25 September 1986. A charging order nisi was made in respect of the property in north London where the judgment debtor lives.

The examination of the judgment debtor began on 16 October 1986 before Deputy Master Rose, and in the course of his examination the judgment debtor objected to answering questions save such as related to any assets he might have within the jurisdiction of this court. In the result the deputy master directed an issue to be referred to the judge in chambers pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 12 in the following terms:

"Is the judgment debtor obliged to answer any questions as to whether any and if so what debts are owing to the judgment debtor and whether the judgment debtor has any and if so what other property or means of satisfying the judgment which are not within the jurisdiction of this honourable court or to produce any books or documents in his possession relevant to such questions?"

The examination was to continue as to debts and other property or means of the judgment debtor within the jurisdiction, but otherwise was adjourned generally.

The issue came before Sir Neil Lawson, sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division in chambers, on 22 January 1987 and he answered the questions raised by the issue in the affirmative, i.e. in favour of the judgment creditor. From that decision the judgment debtor has, with the leave of the judge, appealed to this court.

Order 48 is part of a group of Orders, comprising Orders 45 to 52 inclusive, prefaced by the general words "Enforcement of Judgments and Orders." Ord. 48, r. 1(1) is, so far as material, in the following terms:

"Where a person has obtained a judgment or order for the payment by some other person (hereinafter referred to as 'the judgment debtor') of money, the court may, on an application made ex parte by the person entitled to enforce the judgment or order, order the judgment debtor . . . to attend before such master, registrar or nominated officer as the court may appoint and be orally examined on the questions—(a) whether any and, if so, what debts are owing to the judgment debtor, and (b) whether the judgment debtor has any and, if so, what other property or means of satisfying the judgment or order; and the court may also order the judgment debtor . . . to produce any books or documents in the possession of the judgment debtor relevant to the questions aforesaid at the time and place appointed for the examination."

It is to be noted that Order 48 contains no express reference to the locality of the debts, property and other means. In contradistinction Order 49, which deals with attachment of debts due to the judgment debtor, expressly provides by rule 1(1) that the person whose debt is to be attached ("the garnishee") must be within the jurisdiction.

The argument for the judgment debtor, ably put by Mr. Jones, has the merit of simplicity. It proceeds: (1) the court does not exercise extra-territorial jurisdiction; (2) the court will not enforce its judgments by the process of execution save as to assets which are within the jurisdiction; (3) Order 48 is merely part of the machinery for the enforcement of judgments. Accordingly any examination under Order 48 is limited to assets within the jurisdiction. Although the argument has the attraction of simplicity, in our view it is wrong. While the first proposition is true as a general proposition, the second requires careful examination, especially in so far as it relates to garnishee proceedings and charging orders.

Garnishee proceedings are governed by Order 49, and we have already referred to the provisions of Ord. 49, r. 1(1) that the garnishee

3 W.L.R.

Interpool Ltd. v. Galani (C.A.)

- A must be within the jurisdiction. There ~~is~~ no similar limitation that the garnished debt must be properly recoverable within the jurisdiction. The decision at first instance of Richardson v. Richardson [1927] P. 228, that there is no jurisdiction to garnish a debt which is not recoverable within the jurisdiction is no longer good law: see the decisions of this court in S.C.F. Finance Co. Ltd. v. Masri (No. 3) [1987] 2 W.L.R. 81, 95–96 and Deutsche Shachtbau-Und Tiefbohrgesellschaft m.b.H. v. R'As al-Khaimah National Oil Co. [1987] 3 W.L.R. 1023, 1038D–G. It is true that, as a matter of discretion, the court will not garnish a debt where the garnishee, although within the jurisdiction, is not indebted within the jurisdiction, if to do so might expose the garnishee to the risk of having to pay the debt or part of it twice over. It may also be true, as Mr. Jones submitted, that there is no reported case where this discretion has been exercised so as to garnish a debt which is only recoverable outside the jurisdiction. Nevertheless, if the court has jurisdiction to garnish a debt recoverable outside the jurisdiction, even though as a matter of discretion it is unlikely to exercise that jurisdiction, it seems to us that there must be power under Order 48 to discover the existence of such debts.

- D The jurisdiction to make a charging order is conferred by the Charging Orders Act 1979, and section 2(1)(a)(ii) of that Act provides that a charge may be imposed by a charging order on any interest held by the debtor beneficially under any trust. In any particular case it may not be easy to state whether an interest under a trust is enforceable under English law (see generally Dicey and Morris, The Conflict of Laws, 11th ed. (1987), pp. 1078–1079) and no authority relevant to this question was cited to us, but it is difficult to see why a more restrictive limitation should apply to this type of asset than applies to a debt liable to execution under Order 49, so that there should be jurisdiction to charge an interest under a “foreign” trust, although as a matter of discretion the court will not exercise the jurisdiction where it could expose the trustees to a risk of double jeopardy. In any event it may well be necessary to have an examination of the judgment debtor to find out the nature and extent of his interest under a trust, both to see whether it is a “foreign” trust and, if so, whether nonetheless it is a case where the court should in its discretion make a charging order.

- G One further provision of the Charging Orders Act 1979 is relevant in this connection. Section 1(5) provides that in deciding whether to make a charging order the court shall consider all the circumstances of the case and, in particular, any evidence before it as to the personal circumstances of the debtor. It is difficult to see how the court could properly discharge its duties under this provision without having proper knowledge of all relevant facts. Thus while the court might be hesitant to make a charging order relating to the judgment debtor's interest in his matrimonial home in England (cf. Harman v. Glencross [1986] Fam. 81, 92–94) it might have much less hesitation if it knew that the judgment debtor had one or more homes available in other countries.

H Thus far we have been considering whether there is any justification for limiting the operation of Order 48 as the judgment debtor submitted. Far from there being any such justification, in our judgment there is every reason for giving it the wider meaning for which the judgment creditor contended. The provisions for the reciprocal enforcement of judgments between states are continuously expanding—see, for example, the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, much of which was brought into force on 1 January 1987—and we accept Mr. Gruder's submission that it is entirely consistent with this pattern of legislation that the judgment creditor should have available to him a procedure, under Order 48, which he can utilise to find out whether, in default of any English assets, there are foreign assets available to satisfy his judgment. The use of Order 48 for this purpose is not regulating the conduct of the judgment debtor abroad so as to be contrary to the principle considered by Hoffmann J. in Mackinnon v. Donaldson, Lufkin and Jenrette Securities Corporation [1986] Ch. 482.

Both sides attempted to bolster their arguments by drawing analogies with other procedures. The judgment debtor drew an analogy with Mareva injunctions and referred us to the decision of this court in Ashtiani v. Kashi [1986] 3 W.L.R. 647, which is undoubtedly authority for the proposition that a Mareva injunction should be limited to assets within the jurisdiction and that any ancillary order for discovery should be similarly restricted. The judgment creditor drew his analogy with the power of the court to order a party to an English action to give discovery of documents abroad. We do not derive any real assistance from consideration of these analogies.

Finally, Mr. Jones referred us to article 16(5) of the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters 1968, set out in Schedule 1 to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982, and having the force of law in this country by virtue of section 2(1) of that Act. Article 16(5) provides that, in proceedings concerned with the enforcement of judgments, the courts of the contracting state in which the judgment has been or is to be enforced shall have exclusive jurisdiction, regardless of domicile. But this provision must be read in the light of the fact that it is possible, as Mr. Jones conceded, for the same debt to be simultaneously enforced by judgments obtained, or registered, in more than one country. So this provision can only relate to the enforcement proceedings in a particular state. The use of Order 48, in English enforcement proceedings, in order to discover the existence of foreign assets, does not confer, or purport to confer, jurisdiction on the English court in relation to enforcement proceedings in any other country in which those assets may be situate.

In our judgment the judge came to the correct decision and this appeal must be dismissed.

The applicants, six Sri Lankan Tamils, all sought political asylum in the United Kingdom under the provisions of paragraph 73 of the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (1983) (H.C. 169) on the ground that they had a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race if they were returned to Sri Lanka. The Secretary of State interpreted the provisions of paragraphs 16 and 73 of the Immigration Rules (which required full account to be taken of the Convention and Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees (Cmd. 9171 and Cmd. 3096) as meaning that an applicant for refugee status had to establish not only fear of persecution but also that such fear was objectively justified, and he refused to grant the applicants refugee status on the ground that their fears were not well-founded within the terms of the convention. The applicants sought judicial review of the Secretary of State's decision. On 25 September McCowan J. refused the applications.

G

On appeal by the applicants:—

Held, allowing the appeals, that in order to demonstrate a well-founded fear of persecution an applicant for refugee status had to show actual fear and good reason for it, viewing the applicant's situation from the point of view of one of reasonable courage; that “well-founded” qualified the subjective nature of the fear to be demonstrated so as to exclude paranoid fears, but it did not transform it so as to exclude fears which could be shown objectively to have been misconceived; and that, accordingly the Secretary of State had erred in law and the decisions would be quashed (post, p. 1052G–H).

APPEALS from McCowan J.

By applications dated 21 April 1987 the applicants, Saravamuthu Sivakumaran, Skandarajah Vaithialingam and Nadarajah Vilvarajah, sought judicial review by way of orders of certiorari to quash decisions of the Secretary of State for the Home Department made on 20 April whereby the Secretary of State had refused to grant the applicants political asylum and had made directions for their removal from the United Kingdom. On 25 September 1987 McCowan J. refused the applications. The applicants appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that the judge erred in law (1) in the construction he placed on the words "well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality . . ." in article 1(A)(2) of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees 1951 (Cmd. 9171) and paragraph 73 of the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (1983) (H.C. 169) and in rejecting the submission that the proper test to be applied in determining whether the persecution feared was for a Convention reason was that of the perception of the victim judged from an objective standpoint; (2) in holding that the approach of the Secretary of State was in substance different from that deprecated in *Reg. v. On 25 September 1987 McCowan J. refused the applications. The applicants appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that the judge erred (1) in rejecting the submission that the requirements of paragraph 73 of the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (1983) were satisfied where the applicants could show (a) a well-founded fear of injurious action at the hands of the Sri Lankan army, (b) a fear that the actions of the army were directed against Tamil civilians in general and against young males of the region in particular, rather than against particular persons suspected of terrorist activities, and (c) that the fear set out in (b) was a reasonable one; (2) in determining that it was incumbent on the applicants to prove what the intentions of the Sri Lankan army were in acting against Tamil civilians it was sufficient if the applicants' fear of persecution might be true; (3) in deciding that the Secretary of State was entitled to take the view that the applicants' fears were not of persecution but of force inflicted in the course of measures taken against civil disorder.

APPEAL from McCowan J.

- E By an application dated 3 September 1987 the applicant, Kandiah Navaratnam, sought judicial review by way of, inter alia, an order of certiorari to quash a decision of the Secretary of State for the Home Department made on 1 September whereby the Secretary of State had refused to grant the applicant political asylum and had made directions for his removal from the United Kingdom. Cur. adv. vult.

12 October. The following judgment of the court was handed down.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. On 25 September 1987 McCowan J. dismissed applications for judicial review by six Tamils who are nationals of Sri Lanka. The decisions sought to be reviewed were that their applications for asylum in the United Kingdom be dismissed and that arrangements be made for their removal to Sri Lanka.

Every such application is entitled to individual consideration and the circumstances affecting each were not identical. However, the immigration policy framework is the same in each case and it is conceded that if the Secretary of State has misdirected himself in his application of that policy, the orders should be set aside in order to give him an opportunity to re-examine each case afresh in the light of our judgment. We therefore turn at once to that issue.

The relevant policy is set out in the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (1983) (H.C. 169). There are parallel rules applying to "Control on Entry" and "Control after Entry" contained respectively in section 1 and section 2. Since all the applicants sought asylum upon entry, we are concerned only with section 1, the relevant rules being contained in paragraphs 16 and 73:

"Refugees"

"16. Where a person is a refugee full account is to be taken of the provisions of the Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees (Cmd. 9171 and Cmnd. 3096). Nothing in these rules is to be construed as requiring action contrary to the United Kingdom's obligations under these instruments.

"Part VII: Asylum"

"73. Special considerations arise where the only country to which a person could be removed is one to which he is unwilling to go owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion. Any case in which it appears to the immigration officer as a result of a claim or information given by the person seeking entry at a port that he might fall within the terms of this provision is to be referred to the Home Office for decision regardless of any grounds set out in any provision of these rules which may appear to justify refusal of leave to enter. Leave to enter will not be refused if removal would be contrary to the provisions of the Convention and Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees."

The United Kingdom is a signatory to the Convention and Protocol ("The Convention"), but it forms no part of the domestic law of this country. Nevertheless, as one would expect, the immigration rules are framed on the basis that the Secretary of State will give effect to its provisions.

Subject to certain exceptions which are immaterial for present purposes, article 1 defines a "refugee" as being one who:

"owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who, not having a nationality and being outside the country of his former habitual residence as a result of such events, is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to return to it."

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Home Secretary, Ex p. Sivakumaran (C.A.)

A In succeeding articles the Convention provides something in the nature of a "Bill of Rights" for those who have refugee status, but nowhere does it in terms grant them a right of asylum. What it does do is to limit the freedom of a contracting state to expel a refugee lawfully in its territory (article 32) and to prohibit his expulsion to return

B "to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion": article 33.

C There is a clear contrast between the pre-conditions for acquiring the status of refugee, which require a well-founded fear of persecution and for the application of article 33 which requires a threat to the life or freedom of the person concerned. "Persecution" is not defined in the Convention. It clearly includes a threat to life or freedom, but is much wider and, depending upon its nature and degree, could perhaps be defined as "serious harassment." However, there may be another distinction, which turns upon the true meaning of "well-founded fear" in the definition of refugee. The Secretary of State interprets this expression as meaning that the applicant for refugee status must establish not only that he in fact fears persecution

D upon one or more of the specified grounds, but also that these fears are objectively justified. The applicants contend that they need only establish the genuineness of their expressed fears on one or more of the specified grounds and that, in their particular circumstances, such fears are not unreasonable.

E This conflict of interpretation lies at the heart of these appeals, since the Secretary of State, applying his interpretation, has said that in none of these cases is he satisfied that the applicant has a well-founded fear of persecution in Sri Lanka within the terms of the Convention. This involves a refusal to grant the applicants refugee status, thus requiring them to justify their claims to be allowed to enter the country under other specific immigration rules, e.g. as a visitor or a student, which they cannot do. If he had applied the interpretation contended for by the applicants, he might have accorded them refugee status. If he had done so, the Secretary of State would have had a general discretion whether to permit them to enter which might or might not have been fettered by article 33, according to how he found the facts in each individual case. But there is a real distinction between denying entry to one who is not a refugee within the meaning of the Convention and taking the same course in relation to one who is. Even if article 33 did not apply, the policy considerations applicable in the case of a bona fide refugee, which would of course be matters for the Secretary of State and not for the court, might well be quite different.

G

H This is not a matter which has ever before been considered by the courts of this country, at least in this acute form, and we doubt whether it was fully developed before McCowan J. due, perhaps, to the speed with which some of these applications were brought before the court. At all events McCowan J. simply said:

"Whereas the question of whether an applicant has a fear of being persecuted on the ground of race is a subjective matter, the question of whether that fear is well-founded has to be tested objectively. Mr Riza, who has appeared for three of the applicants, says that it has to be the objective perception of the victim. I see no reason to add that gloss, for which I find no justification in the authorities, and I do not do so.”

The same point was, however, considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Cardoza-Fonseca (1987) 107 S.Ct. 1207. The majority decision of the court, delivered by Stevens J. (Rehnquist C.J., Powell and White JJ. dissenting) is of high persuasive authority, not only because of its status as a supreme common law court, but also because the Convention should, if possible, be applied consistently in all jurisdictions.

Under United States law a finding that an alien is a refugee, as defined in the Convention, creates eligibility for asylum at the discretion of the Attorney-General of the United States: section 208(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act 1952 as amended. By section 243(h) of the Act, an alien has a right to resist deportation where he is threatened with persecution in the country to which he would be deported. Whilst the right is not apparently absolute in terms, the court assumed that the Attorney-General would apply article 33 of the Convention where the alien could bring himself within the terms of the section. The authorities established that in the context of section 343(h) the test of whether there was a threat of persecution was objective—the applicant had to show on a balance of probabilities that he would be subject to such a threat. The issue facing the Supreme Court was whether the same approach was to be adopted in deciding refugee status and consequential discretionary eligibility for asylum under section 208(a).

Whilst it will be seen that the legislative context is different in detail, the fundamental issue was the same as that which faces this court in these appeals.

The court quite clearly rejected the argument that “a well-founded fear” needed to be established on the balance of probabilities, view objectively, and would, accordingly, have rejected the interpretation put forward by the Secretary of State in these appeals. Where we have greater difficulty, bred no doubt of our lack of familiarity with United States jurisprudence, is in divining precisely what interpretation the court was putting on this phrase. Clearly it was importing a subjective element into the equation, but beyond that we are left in some doubt. However we note that the court referred, with apparent approval, to the explanation of the international drafting committee that the phrase “well-founded fear of being the victim of persecution” meant “that a person has either been actually a victim of persecution or can show good reason why he fears persecution.”

Authority apart, we would accept that “well-founded fear” is demonstrated by proving (a) actual fear and (b) good reason for this fear, looking at the situation from the point of view of one of reasonable courage circumstanced as was the applicant for refugee status. Fear is clearly an entirely subjective state experienced by the person who is afraid. The adjectival phrase “well-founded” qualifies, but cannot transform, the subjective nature of the emotion. The qualification will exclude fears which can be dismissed as paranoid, but we do not understand why it should exclude those which, although fully justified on the face of the situation as it presented itself to the person who was afraid, can be shown objectively to have been misconceived. A simple, but graphic, example will illustrate our point. A bank cashier confronted

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Home Secretary, Ex p. Sivakumaran (C.A.)

A with a masked man who points a revolver at him and demands the contents of the till could without doubt claim to have experienced "a well-founded fear." His fears would have been no less well-founded if, one minute later, it emerged that the revolver was a plastic replica or a water pistol.

B In our judgment the Secretary of State applied the wrong test and therefore erred in law. It follows that all six decisions should be quashed, thus leaving it open to him to reconsider each on the correct basis. It therefore becomes unnecessary to deal with the further submissions that on the facts the decisions were untenable. Nevertheless the Secretary of State may wish to take note of some of the criticisms. For example, some of the applicants have expressed fears for their lives as a result of the indiscriminate shelling by the forces of law and order of villages believed to contain insurgents. Under the terms of the Convention this would not form a basis for claiming refugee status. But it might well be different if it appeared that these forces would not have resorted to indiscriminate shelling, but for the fact that all the villagers, whether insurgents or not, were of a particular race.

D For the avoidance of doubt, we should make it clear that the reconsideration should be in two stages. First the Secretary of State should consider whether the applicants are refugees within the meaning of that word in the Immigration Rules and the Convention. This involves, inter alia, subjective considerations such as the age and personal experiences of the applicant and of those known to him. If he decides that they are not refugees, that is the end of the matter, unless he is prepared to admit them in the exercise of his overriding residual discretion to depart from the Immigration Rules. If, however, he decides that any applicant is a refugee as so defined, he has then to decide whether article 33, which involves an objective test, prohibits a return of that applicant to Sri Lanka. If article 33 applies, the applicant has to be allowed to enter or be sent to some other country which will accept him and to which the same considerations do not apply. If article 33 does not apply, the Secretary of State has a complete discretion whether or not to permit the applicant to enter.

F The appeals will be allowed accordingly.

REGINA v. SNARES BROOK CROWN COURT, Ex parte
DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

1987 July 3; 10

Glidewell L.J. and McNeill J.

Police—Powers—Special procedure material—Access to legal aid application form—Police investigating criminal offence—Police suspecting that application form to bring civil proceedings contained false statements—Whether application form item subject to legal privilege—Whether application form held with intention of furthering criminal purpose—Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (c. 60), s. 10¹

On 8 November 1984 A. was arrested and charged with, inter alia, assault. He subsequently pleaded guilty to that charge at Stratford Magistrates' Court and was fined. On 14 June 1985 A. complained through his solicitors that at the time of his arrest he had been assaulted by a named police officer. When the complaint was investigated A. alleged that his nose had been broken during the assault. A. made an application for legal aid in order to bring an action for assault against the police. Subsequent police inquiries revealed that his nose had been broken two days before the incident of 8 November. A. was charged with attempting to pervert the course of justice, and the prosecution requested production by the area office of The Law Society of A.'s legal aid application form. The office declined to produce the form, and the Director of Public Prosecutions sought an order under section 9 of, and Schedule 1 to, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 on the ground that the form was special procedure material. The circuit judge at the Crown Court held that the form was privileged within the meaning of section 10(1) of the Act,¹ and that it was not held by The Law Society with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose within the meaning of section 10(2), and he declined to order production.

On an application by the Director of Public Prosecutions for judicial review:—

Held, dismissing the application, that since A. was the client of a professional legal adviser and the legal aid application form was a communication between him and the area office of The Law Society made in contemplation of and for the purpose of legal proceedings, it was within the definition of items subject to legal privilege in section 10(1) of the Act of 1984; that The Law Society held the form for the purpose of deciding whether to grant legal aid to pursue a civil claim, and not with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose and that the legal privilege was not, therefore, removed by section 10(2) of the Act; and that, accordingly, the form was not "special procedure material" within the meaning of the Act (post, pp. 1058E–G, 1059D–F, 1060B, E–G).

APPLICATION for judicial review.

By an application dated 25 May 1987 the applicant, the Director of Public Prosecutions, sought judicial review of a decision of Judge Halnan at Snaresbrook Crown Court on 15 May 1987 whereby he had refused C an application by P.C. Stratton under section 9 of and Schedule 1 to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 for access to special procedure material, namely, a legal aid application form completed by Mushtaq Mohammed Akhoonjee in connection with an application for legal aid to bring an action against the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.
 Judge Halnan held that the form was not special procedure material
 D because it was subject to legal privilege within section 10(1)(b) of the Act of 1984, and was not held "with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose" within section 10(2). The applicant sought a declaration that the form was special procedure material as defined by sections 10 and 14 of the Act and mandamus directing the judge to reconsider the decision.

E The grounds on which relief was sought were, inter alia, (1) that the judge erred in holding that the legal aid application form was subject to legal privilege; (2) that the judge was wrong in holding that the form was not held "with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose" within section 10(2); and (3) that the judge erred in holding that the intention of The Law Society was material to the question whether the form was held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose.

F The facts are stated in the judgment of Glidewell L.J.

Clive Nicholls Q.C. and John Nutting for the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Duncan Matheson for The Law Society.

Anthony Shaw for Mushtaq Mohammed Akhoonjee.

G Cur. adv. vult.

10 July. GLIDEWELL L.J. read the following judgment. This is an application for judicial review: that is to say, an order of certiorari to quash a decision of Judge Halnan sitting in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook on 15 May 1987 to the effect that the material the subject
 H matter of an application by the Director of Public Prosecutions is not "special procedure material" as defined in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984; or, alternatively, for a declaration that it is such material and an order of mandamus to require the judge to reconsider his decision on the ground that it is in the public interest for the material to be produced.

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 introduced a new procedure by which a prosecuting authority may gain access to documentary and other material for the purposes of investigation well before any question of trial. By section 9(1) of the Act it is provided that a constable may gain access to special procedure material for the purposes of a criminal investigation by making an application under Schedule 1 to that Act and in accordance with that Schedule.

Special procedure material is defined in section 14. The part of the section which here applies is subsection (2), which defines it as follows:

“material, other than items subject to legal privilege . . . in the possession of a person who (a) acquired or created it in the course of any trade, business, profession or other occupation . . . and (b) holds it subject (i) to an express or implied undertaking to hold it in confidence; or (ii) to a restriction or obligation such as is mentioned in section 11(2)(b) above.”

One then goes back to section 11(2)(b) and one finds a reference to holding material subject “to a restriction on disclosure or an obligation of secrecy contained in any enactment, including an enactment contained in an Act passed after this Act.”

Finally, by section 10 it is provided:

“(1) Subject to subsection (2) below, in this Act ‘items subject to legal privilege’ means— . . . (b) communications between a professional legal adviser . . . or his client . . . and any other person made in connection with or in contemplation of legal proceedings and for the purposes of such proceedings; . . . (2) Items held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose are not items subject to legal privilege.”

Before I come to deal with the matters which are in issue in this application there is one matter which was not raised but which, in my view, ought to be mentioned at least briefly. That is the question of jurisdiction. Does this court have jurisdiction to hear an application for judicial review in these circumstances? Mr. Matheson for The Law Society certainly does not say that we do not and we have heard no argument about it. I would only say this. There have now been a number of applications to this court to quash decisions made by circuit judges relating to applications for material of this kind under this Act. Nobody to my knowledge has so far raised any question of lack of jurisdiction, and in at least two of those cases, again to my knowledge, the application has been granted in whole or in part. If the point is to be raised the time must soon be coming when it will be said that it is really too late, after the decisions have already been made. We are dealing with this matter on the basis that it is accepted on all sides that we have the jurisdiction to do so.

The facts disclosed can be summarised as follows. On 8 November 1984 a Mr. Akhoonjee was charged with offences which included assaults occasioning actual bodily harm, an offence against section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. On 15 March 1985 at Stratford Magistrates’ Court Mr. Akhoonjee pleaded guilty to that charge and was fined. On 14 June 1985 solicitors acting on his behalf complained in a letter that on 8 November 1984, at the time of his arrest, he was assaulted by a named police officer and suffered a severe injury to his nose. The police investigated the complaint.

A On 12 December 1985 Mr. Akhoonjee made a statement to the investigating officers. In it he said that his nose had been broken during the course of the incident of 8 November 1984. He, or his solicitors on his behalf, then applied for legal aid to assist him to sue the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police for damages for the alleged assault. Police inquiries showed that although his nose was broken it was broken
B two days before the incident of 8 November 1984 during a totally separate matter, in a fight between a number of Sikhs and a group of people which included Mr. Akhoonjee, following the death of Mrs. Gandhi.

C On 8 September 1986 Mr. Akhoonjee was charged with attempting to pervert the course of public justice by making a false allegation of assault by a police officer on 8 November 1984. He denies that charge and it has not yet been heard.

D The material which the Director of Public Prosecutions seeks is Mr. Akhoonjee's application for legal aid. The prosecution say that they suspect, and indeed are quite confident, that it must contain untrue statements, and that production of it will support the prosecution for attempting to pervert the course of public justice. In January and February 1987 the Crown Prosecution Service requested the area office of The Law Society to supply a copy of Mr. Akhoonjee's application form. That office declined to do so and, in doing so, The Law Society referred to section 22 of the Legal Aid Act 1974. That section, so far as is material, provides:

E "(1) Subject to subsection (2) below, no information furnished for the purposes of this Part of this Act to The Law Society, or to any committee or person on their behalf, in connection with the case of a person seeking or receiving advice or assistance or legal aid shall be disclosed otherwise than . . . (b) for the purpose of any criminal proceedings for an offence under it or of any report of such proceedings."

F Subsection (2), to which reference is made, relates to disclosure of information where the person whom the case is against consents. By subsection (3) it is provided:

G "A person who, in contravention of this section, discloses any information obtained by him when employed by or acting on behalf of The Law Society shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £100."

H Section 23 of the Legal Aid Act 1974 makes it an offence for a person seeking or receiving advice, assistance or legal aid knowingly to make a false statement or false representation when furnishing any information required from him. The phrase "an offence under it" in section 22(1) must mean "an offence under this Act," so it is the earlier part of the subsection which is referred to.

By section 23, as I have said, it is an offence under the Act knowingly to make a false statement for the purpose of obtaining legal aid. If the police allegations are correct, and if the legal aid application does contain false statements, then it seems that Mr. Akhoonjee must be guilty of an offence under section 23 of the Legal Aid Act 1974 and it would be proper and in accordance with section 22 for the legal aid application form to be disclosed for the purpose of a prosecution under section 23 of that Act. But The Law Society's case is that it cannot be disclosed for the purpose of any other criminal proceedings. That is, they say, precisely what section 22 of the Legal Aid Act 1974 provides.

I go back to section 14(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The Law Society clearly holds Mr. Akhoojee's application for legal aid subject to the restriction or obligation contained in an Act of Parliament, namely, the restriction imposed by section 22 of the Legal Aid Act requiring them not to disclose it, so that part of the definition of "special procedure material" is satisfied. But the question is whether the material is an item subject to legal privilege because, if it is, then it is not special procedure material at all and the conditions to which I have not so far referred, set out in Schedule 1 to the Act of 1984, for the making of an order for production are not satisfied. The question comes down to this: is this material subject to legal privilege or not? All are agreed that the other criteria in paragraph 2(a) and (b) of Schedule 1 are satisfied. There is however another issue which may arise under paragraph 2(c) of Schedule 1: that is to say, whether it is in the public interest that the material should be produced or access to it should be given. The main issue is whether the material is subject to legal privilege. If I may re-read the definition of "items subject to legal privilege" within section 10(1):

"(b) communications between a professional legal adviser . . . or his client . . . and any other person made in connection with or in contemplation of legal proceedings and for the purpose of such proceedings; . . ."

Mr. Akhoojee is the client of a professional legal adviser. The application for legal aid, on the face of it, is a communication between him and another person, namely, the area officer of The Law Society. Clearly it was made in contemplation of and for the purpose of legal proceedings. On the face of it the material does come within the definition of items subject to legal privilege in section 10(1) of the Act. But Mr. Nicholls, for the Director of Public Prosecutions, argues two points. First, he argues that properly understood section 10(1) does not apply and, secondly, that section 10(2) does apply because the material is held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose, which specifically excludes it from being subject to legal privilege.

In extension of those submissions in relation to section 10(1) Mr. Nicholls submits that instructions to a solicitor to put forward a fraudulent and false claim are not privileged. Those instructions are made in furtherance of a criminal purpose and that cannot be privileged. He refers us to the well-known case of Reg. v. Cox and Railton (1884) 14 Q.B.D. 153, a decision of a full Court for Crown Cases Reserved. The second sentence of the headnote reads:

"Communications made to a solicitor by his client before the commission of a crime for the purpose of being guided or helped in the commission of it, are not privileged from disclosure."

That was a case in which two persons had sought advice from a solicitor as to how they could best defeat a bill of sale which had been

A executed, and whether they could in effect ante-date a memorandum to a date before the bill of sale. The solicitor advised them that they could not do that which they had set out to do and they thereupon went away.
They were charged with aiming to defraud the person who was the beneficiary to the bill of sale and at their trial the solicitor was called by the prosecution to give evidence that they had consulted him with a view
B to seeking advice as to how to do what would be the carrying out of a fraud. It was held that the evidence of the solicitor was admissible and not subject to legal privilege. In the course of his judgment Stephen J.
said, at p. 167:

C “The reason on which the rule is said to rest cannot include the case of communications, criminal in themselves, or intended to further any criminal purpose, for the protection of such communications cannot possibly be otherwise than injurious to the interests of justice, and to those of the administration of justice. Nor do such communications fall within the terms of the rule. A communication in furtherance of a criminal purpose does not ‘come into the ordinary scope of professional employment.’”

D No doubt that applies, and certainly the circumstances of that case were that the object of the communication to the solicitor was to obtain advice on how to commit a criminal offence. That is what it comes down to. But here what is alleged is that Mr. Akhoojee, by making his complaint to the police complaints body, has attempted to pervert the course of public justice and has, as it were, sought to bolster it up by E bringing an action against the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police.
For the purposes of that he was applying for legal aid. But if it is to be said that his application for legal aid was, again to use the words of the headnote in Reg. v. Cox and Railton, a communication made for the purpose of being guided or helped in the commission of a crime, then it seems to me that practically every time somebody makes an untrue F statement for the purpose of obtaining legal aid in order to make a civil claim he is equally liable to have it held that the communication is made for that purpose. I cannot think that that is correct. Obviously, not infrequently persons allege that accidents have happened in ways other than the ways in which they in fact happened, or that they were on the correct side of the road when driving when actually they were on the G wrong side of the road, and matters of that sort. Again, litigants in civil litigation may not be believed when their cases come to trial, but that is not to say that the statements they had made to their solicitors pending the trial, much less the applications which they made if they applied for legal aid, are not subject to legal privilege. The principle to be derived from Reg. v. Cox and Railton, applies in my view to circumstances H which do not cover the ordinary run of case such as this is.

Another much more recent authority to which Mr. Nicholls refers is Banque Keyser Ullmann S.A. v. Skandia (U.K.) Insurance Co. Ltd.
[1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 336. That was a decision of the Court of Appeal which held that a fraudulent party who communicated with his solicitor for the purpose of the furtherance of fraud or crime was communicating with his solicitor otherwise than in the ordinary course of professional communications, and that it would be monstrous for the court to afford protection from production in respect of communications which were made for the purposes of fraud or crime. When it was sought to contend against a wholly innocent party that privilege did not exist, whether as assignees in a fraud or not, it was not in accordance with the law to breach the lay power and there was no ground on which the existing fraud exception could be extended.

Again, the purpose there was to put forward a claim which in itself amounted to the commission of a criminal offence. In my judgment, Mr. Nicholl's submissions do nothing to displace the prima facie meaning of the wording of section 10(1) which, as I have already said, are sufficient to render the material in this case an item subject to legal privilege.

I turn therefore to Mr. Nicholls's second submission, that the material is held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose within section 10(2) and thus, as that subsection makes clear, not subject to legal privilege. This I regard as being the crux of this case. The judge said about that part of the argument:

"It was further alternatively argued on behalf of the applicant that subsection 10(2) applied namely that the legal aid application was 'held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose.' While the defendant may well have applied for legal aid in order to be enabled to institute civil proceedings, and, may well have done so to further a criminal purpose, section 10(2) requires the item to be 'held' with such an intention. The Law Society 'holds' the application and it cannot be suggested that The Law Society can hold any applications for legal aid for furthering a criminal purpose. I therefore hold that the application for legal aid is an 'item subject to legal privilege' and, consequently the access condition set out in paragraph 2(a)(ii) that it is 'specified procedure material' cannot be fulfilled."

The judge therefore refused the application. Put a little more extensively, The Law Society holds the legal aid application to enable it to decide whether to grant legal aid for pursuing a civil claim which may prove to be false, as indeed some are. But it does not, I entirely agree with the judge, hold it with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose. No intention could be further from its thoughts. If the statement is false, as I have said, it is clear that an offence is committed under section 23 of the Legal Aid Act 1974. The Law Society itself could no doubt institute a prosecution in those circumstances. The statement would then be admissible evidence and disclosable in such a prosecution. But for other forms of criminal offence not under the legal aid legislation, in my judgment this material falls fairly and squarely within the meaning of section 10(1) as being an item subject to legal privilege and is not held by The Law Society with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose.

I therefore conclude that the judge was entirely correct in deciding that this part of paragraph 2 of Schedule 1 was not satisfied.

I add this shortly. Having reached that conclusion, the judge went on to consider, should he be held to be wrong, whether it would or would not be in the public interest to grant the application. He concluded that it would not be in the public interest for a legal aid application to be disclosed under section 9 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and said that on that ground he would have refused the application if he had not already decided to refuse it on the first ground.

- A For my part, without indicating any view one way or another, I would leave that question entirely open to be decided, if necessary, at some future time. It seems to me in the end to be largely a matter of discretion for the judge who has to make the decision as to whether the disclosure of a particular document in particular circumstances is or is not in the public interest. I am certainly not indicating Judge Halnan was wrong. I merely do not wish to express any opinion about it at all.
- B For the reasons which I sought to express in the first and major part of this judgment it is my view that the judge was entirely in the right and I would therefore dismiss the application.

McNEILL J. I agree.

REGINA v. DEVIZES JUSTICES, Ex parte LEE

1987 July 22, 23, 24; 31

Lloyd L.J. and Mann J.

Local Government—Byelaws—Validity—Prosecution for offence against byelaws—Challenge to validity of byelaws—Hearing adjourned for validity to be determined on judicial review—Whether correct procedure—Whether justices and Crown Court having jurisdiction to determine validity of byelaws

Justices had authority, and were bound, to inquire into the validity of byelaws if raised by way of defence to a charge of contravening such byelaws; the procedure for judicial review introduced by section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and R.S.C., Ord. 53 had not removed the right of a defendant to raise the question of the validity of the byelaw under which he was being prosecuted, nor was it an abuse of process or contrary to public policy for him to do so (post, pp. 1066c–d, f–g, 1067f–g, 1070f–g, 1071e).

Where, therefore, in one case the Crown Court, and in another, justices, had refused to determine the question of the validity of byelaws under which the applicants had been charged with offences:—

Held, granting judicial review by way of mandamus to quash the decisions, that the Crown Court and the justices had erred in ruling that they had no jurisdiction to determine the question of the validity of byelaws.

Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461, H.L.(E.) applied.

Per Lloyd L.J. In order to obtain a decision of the Divisional Court on the validity of byelaws which would be binding on all inferior courts the Crown Prosecution Service should wait until a decision goes against them and appeal by way of case stated. Judicial review is not to be used as a means for obtaining a decision on a question of law in advance of the hearing (post, pp. 1070h—1071a).

REGINA V. READING CROWN COURT, Ex parte HUTCHINSON AND ANOTHER

APPLICATION for judicial review.

- C By notice of application dated 15 July 1987, the applicants, Jean Emily Hutchinson and Georgina Smith, applied for judicial review in respect of a decision of Judge Lait and two justices sitting at the Crown Court at Reading on 18 June 1987, by which the court refused to determine the validity of the byelaws for R.A.F. Greenham Common, under which the applicants had been convicted, and adjourned the applicants' appeals against conviction so that the validity of the byelaws
- D could be determined by the Divisional Court in judicial review proceedings. The applicants sought an order of mandamus requiring Reading Crown Court to hear and determine the question of the validity of the byelaws. The grounds of the application were (1) that it was well established that the validity of byelaws could be challenged in criminal proceedings; (2) that as a matter of general principle it should be open
- E to any defendant in a criminal court to challenge the validity of a statute or statutory instrument under which he was charged; (3) that it would be unjust and against public policy for a defendant to be convicted under an invalid provision which he was debarred from challenging; and (4) that it was wrong as a matter of law and principle for a Crown Court, on hearing an appeal from the justices, to adjourn the appeal part heard
- F to enable the Divisional Court to adjudicate upon the issue of law which was to be determined in the criminal appeal.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

REGINA V. DEVIZES JUSTICES, Ex parte LEE

APPLICATION for judicial review.

- G By notice of motion dated 15 July 1987, the applicant, Ian Louis Ross Lee, applied for judicial review of a decision of the Devizes Justices on 15 July 1985, by which they heard extensive preliminary legal argument over their jurisdiction as to an aspect of the defence case, adjourned the case after the preliminary argument and decided that they had no jurisdiction to hear a defence involving a challenge to the validity of the Bulford Ranges Byelaws, under which the applicant was
- H charged with an offence. The applicant sought an order of mandamus directing that the justices did have jurisdiction to hear a defence involving argument as to the validity of the byelaws and a duty so to do and directing that the justices resume the proceedings. The grounds on which relief was sought were (1) that the justices acted improperly in entering into preliminary legal argument with regard to an aspect of the defence case, before first determining that the prosecution case was made out; and (2) that a defendant to a charge under a byelaw had a common law right to defend the charge by challenging the validity of the byelaw.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Georgina Smith in person.

Nigel Hamilton Q.C. and Anthony Dalglish for Reading Crown Court.

Nigel Fleming for the applicant Lee.

Cur. adv. vult.

31 July. LLOYD L.J. read the following judgment.

These two cases raise the same point. When a defendant in summary proceedings wishes to challenge the validity of a byelaw under which he has been charged, is it open to the justices to decide the issue of validity, or must the defendant proceed first by way of judicial review?

I venture to think that until a few years ago the answer to that question would have been regarded as obvious. But the prosecution submit, and Judge Lait, sitting with two justices in the Crown Court at Reading have held, that they have no jurisdiction to inquire into the validity of a byelaw, unless it is invalid on its face, in which case no inquiry would be necessary. Since the byelaws in question, the R.A.F. Greenham Common Bye-Laws 1985, are not invalid on their face, they adjourned the hearing before them in order that the issue of validity might be determined on an application for judicial review.

I can well understand why the Crown Court at Reading took the course it did, in view of the decision of this court in Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth City Council [1987] 3 W.L.R. 189. That case appears to suggest that the long established practice whereby justices have ruled on the validity of byelaws has been overtaken by section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. Justices are no longer to be expected "to assume the function of the Divisional Court" and decide difficult questions of law, which can more readily be decided on judicial review. The question for us is whether the decision in the Quietlynn case goes as far as might at first sight appear.

The facts of the two cases before us could hardly be more simple. In the first, Jean Emily Hutchinson and Georgina Smith, who describe themselves as "Greenham Women of Women's Peace Camp, Greenham Common, Newbury, Berkshire" were convicted at the Newbury Magistrates' Court on 23 July 1986, of an offence contrary to byelaw 2(b) of the R.A.F. Greenham Common Bye-Laws. Byelaw 2(b) reads:

"No person shall enter, pass through or over or remain in or over the protected area without authority or permission given by or on behalf of one of the persons mentioned in bye-law 5(1)."

The applicants appealed against their conviction to the Crown Court at Reading. The ground of their appeal was that the byelaws are invalid. They are expressed to be made by the Secretary of State for Defence under powers conferred on him by Part II of the Military Lands Act 1892. The only relevant section is section 14(1) which concludes:

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Reading Crown Court, Ex p. Hutchinson (D.C.)

Lloyd L.J.

A "Provided that no byelaws promulgated under this section shall authorise the Secretary of State to take away or prejudicially affect any right of common."

The applicants' case is that the byelaws are in breach of that proviso. Whether they are right or not, is not for us to decide on this application.

B The issue of validity was argued before the Crown Court on 2 and 3 April 1987. At that stage it was common ground that the Crown Court was competent to deal with the question. Unfortunately the hearing could not be completed on 3 April. So the case was adjourned. At the resumed hearing on 15 June, the prosecution applied for a further adjournment so as to enable the question of validity to be determined by the Divisional Court. The applicants opposed the adjournment. They
C asked the Crown Court to determine the question, but the Crown Court declined. It regarded itself as bound by the Quietlynn case [1987] 3 W.L.R. 189. So the applicants now seek an order of mandamus requiring the Crown Court to hear and determine the question whether the byelaws are valid.

I have said that, until a few years ago, the answer to the question would have been self evident. In Wade on Administrative Law, 5th ed. (1982), p. 758, it is said: "The commonest method of resisting an invalid regulation or byelaw is to plead its invalidity in defence to a prosecution or enforcement proceedings."

E The note to section 235 of the Local Government Act 1972 in Stone's Justices' Manual 1986 contains a long list of cases in which the courts have had to consider the validity of byelaws. I would assume (though I have not checked) that in many if not most of them the question has come before the High Court on appeal from justices by way of case stated. I need only mention two of the cases listed in Stone, the first of which, Reg. v. Rose, Ex parte Mary Wood (1855) 19 J.P. 676, was not an appeal by way of case stated, but an application for certiorari. The applicant had been convicted under a byelaw for failing to clear snow from the footpath in front of her house. Her defence was that the F byelaw was invalid. The stipendiary magistrate refused to inquire into the validity of the byelaw. He assumed it to be valid, since it had been approved by the Secretary of State. A strong Divisional Court quashed her conviction. The court held that the byelaw was bad, and that therefore the stipendiary magistrate had no jurisdiction to convict. But it is clear from the opening sentence of Lord Campbell's judgment that in his view the stipendiary magistrate was entitled to inquire into the G validity of byelaws; and Crompton J. said, at p. 678:

"I am disposed to think that the justice had no jurisdiction to enforce a bad byelaw. He had a right to inquire whether it was bad or good, but that is not what he has done."

H The case is cited in Stone as authority for the proposition that justices are bound to decide on any objection to the validity of a byelaw.

The only other case I need mention is Kruse v. Johnson [1898] 2 Q.B. 91, perhaps the best known authority in this field. It was a case stated by five justices of the county of Kent. It came before a Divisional Court of seven judges. The defendant was charged under a byelaw with singing on a highway, within 50 yards of a dwelling-house, after being required by a constable to desist. The defence was that the byelaw was invalid, on the ground that it was unreasonable. The justices held that the byelaw was reasonable, and convicted accordingly. The defendant's appeal was dismissed, by a majority of six to one. Not one of the judges in the Divisional Court suggested that the justices had had no jurisdiction to inquire into the validity of the byelaw.

Mr. Hamilton, for the Crown Prosecution Service, submits that Kruse v. Johnson was decided per incuriam. He would have to make the same submission with regard to all the many other cases in which byelaws have been considered by justices, and appeals brought before the Divisional Court on a case stated, whether by the prosecution or the defence. In all such cases, says Mr. Hamilton, the justices have exceeded their jurisdiction. Their proper course was always to adjourn the hearing before them so as to allow the defendant to apply for a prerogative writ, presumably prohibition.

I cannot accept so bold a submission. Nor can it be sustained by the consideration—which I would certainly accept—that the jurisdiction of justices is statutory. The absence of express statutory authority for justices to inquire into the validity of a byelaw does not mean that they do not have implied authority to do so, when the validity of the byelaw is challenged by the defendant.

So I would reject Mr. Hamilton's first submission. In my judgment justices have always had jurisdiction to inquire into the validity of a byelaw. They are not only entitled, but bound to do so when the defendant relies on the invalidity of the byelaw by way of defence.

Then has the position changed as a result of the new streamlined procedure for judicial review introduced following the Report on Remedies in Administrative Law, 1976 (Law Com. No. 73)? Or by virtue of section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981? Or has it changed as a result of the decision of the House of Lords in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237? Mr. Hamilton submits that it has. He concedes that there is nothing in any legislation to take away the jurisdiction of justices to inquire into the validity of byelaws, if (contrary to his first submission) they ever had it. But he submits that it is now contrary to public policy, or an abuse of the process of the court, for a defendant to challenge the validity of a byelaw under which he is charged, except by way of separate proceedings in the High Court.

I find Mr. Hamilton's second submission almost as bold as his first. O'Reilly v. Mackman decides, in broad terms, that it is an abuse of the process of the court for a plaintiff to proceed by writ when he is complaining of an infringement of his rights in public law, since to do so would circumvent the safeguards provided by R.S.C., Ord. 53. But how can that principle possibly apply to a case where the plaintiff is not complaining of anything, but is defending himself against a criminal charge? To use the well worn metaphor, the defendants in the present proceedings are deploying their arguments as a shield, not as a sword. To describe what they are doing as an abuse of the process of the court is fanciful. It is the Crown Prosecution Service who has invoked the process of the court, not them. Mrs. Smith, who appears before us in person, put the case very well when she said:

"Coming to London to the High Court is inconvenient and expensive. Byelaws are generally local laws which have been made for local people to do with local concerns. Magistrates' courts are local courts and there is one in every town of any size in England. The cost of proceedings in a magistrates' court are far less than in

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Reading Crown Court, Ex p. Hutchinson (D.C.)

Lloyd L.J.

A the High Court. I believe this egalitarian aspect of seeking recourse to the law in a magistrates' court to be an important sign of the availability of justice for all. I think it unfair that the Crown Court is refusing to decide our case when I have waited for a year for my appeal to be heard. I want the Crown Court to make a decision in my case as soon as possible and I do not want to have the B additional worry and delay of judicial review proceedings. I am not eligible for legal aid and have to pay for legal representation. I have been advised that if we were to lose the judicial review application we may be ordered to pay the costs of the Crown Prosecution Service and the Secretary of State for Defence. This prospect bears no relationship to justice, and it seems quite wrong to me that we are being forced to go through such a lengthy and expensive
C procedure in order to appeal a conviction under a byelaw and a fine of only £25."

As a matter of ordinary common sense, it cannot be said that the defendants here are abusing the process of the court unless we are to adopt the principle "cet animal est tres méchant—quand on l'attaque, il se défend." It may be more convenient for the Crown Prosecution D Service that the validity of byelaws, at any rate these byelaws, be tested by way of judicial review, though I do not accept that it is. But even if it were so, convenience of the Crown Prosecution Service is one thing; an abuse of the process of the court is something quite different.

Even if there were ever any doubt as to the scope of the principle stated in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 or its irrelevance to a case such as the present, it was removed by the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder E [1985] A.C. 461. In that case the plaintiff council claimed possession of a council flat on the ground that the defendant had failed to pay the increased rent lawfully due. The defendant contended that the council's decision to increase the rent was ultra vires. The council applied to F strike out the defence on the ground that it was an abuse of the process of the court. The House of Lords held that it was a paramount principle that the private citizen's recourse to the courts for the determination of his rights was not to be excluded except by clear words. There is nothing in the language of R.S.C., Ord. 53, which could be taken to have abolished a citizen's right to challenge the decision of a local authority in the course of defending an action for possession, nor did section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 which referred only to an "application" for G judicial review, have the effect of limiting a defendant's rights sub silentio. Lord Fraser of Tullybelton said, at p. 509:

"It would . . . be a very strange use of language to describe the respondent's behaviour in relation to this litigation as an abuse or misuse by him of the process of the court. He did not select the procedure to be adopted. He is merely seeking to defend proceedings H brought against him by the appellants. In so doing he is seeking only to exercise the ordinary right of any individual to defend an action against him on the ground that he is not liable for the whole sum claimed by the plaintiff. Moreover he puts forward his defence as a matter of right, whereas in an application for judicial review, success would require an exercise of the court's discretion in his favour. . . . I find it impossible to accept that the right to challenge the decision of a local authority in the course of defending an action for non-payment can have been swept away by Order 53, which was directed to introducing a procedural reform.”

So I would reject Mr. Hamilton's submissions on principle. Indeed, I hardly think he would have advanced them at all, but for two recent decisions of this court to which I now turn. In the first, Director of Public Prosecutions v. Bugg (unreported), 19 December 1986, the facts were very similar to the present case. The respondent was charged with contravening the R.A.F. Mildenhall Bye-Laws 1986. His defence was that the byelaws were invalid. The justices acquitted the respondent on the ground that the prosecution had not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the byelaws were valid. This was clearly wrong. So the appeal was allowed, and the case remitted with a direction to convict. The importance of the case for present purposes lies in certain observations of Watkins L.J. who gave the second judgment.

The case had come before the Divisional Court on appeal by way of case stated. Mr. Laws, appearing for the Crown Prosecution Service, reserved for the House of Lords the question whether the validity of the byelaws could be explored otherwise than by way of judicial review. That is precisely the same question as has been argued in the present case. Since the point was not argued, Mann J., giving the leading judgment, said nothing about it. But Watkins L.J. said:

“I agree. I have much sympathy with the justices and their clerk who had the misfortune to have to listen to a vast range of intricate submissions and to endeavour to comprehend them in the light of a mass of authorities upon the law such as no lay tribunal should be called upon to consider. If ever there was a case which demonstrates the need somehow to prevent challenges to byelaws and the like in a magistrates' court, I doubt if any better example than this could be found. Mr. Laws eschewed the opportunity of arguing whether the validity of byelaws can be explored otherwise than by judicial review. I regretted this although I fully understood his reasons for saying that he would prefer to reserve such an argument for the House of Lords. I feel bound to say, however, that I am not wholly satisfied, despite the existence of the authorities to which Mann J. has referred, that it is open to a defendant charged with a breach of them to question their validity in a magistrates' court. Not having looked exhaustively at these authorities, I am left wondering whether the right so to do has ever been challenged. If that be so, it seems to me that such a challenge is overdue.”

As there had been no argument on the point, Watkins L.J. must have had in mind the argument that had been addressed to his court a week or so earlier in the Quietlynn case.

As for Director of Public Prosecutions v. Bugg itself, although one can share, and, if I may say so, share fully, in the sympathy which Watkins L.J. felt for justices who have to grapple with difficult questions of law, the case is obviously no authority for the proposition that they are not obliged to inquire into the validity of byelaws which are challenged by way of defence.

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth City Council [1987] 3 W.L.R. 189 is, I confess, a difficult case. The company carries on the business of running sex shops. It applied for licences to various local authorities under section 2 of and Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Reading Crown Court, Ex p. Hutchinson (D.C.)

Lloyd L.J.

A Provisions) Act 1982. Licences were refused in respect of certain premises in each of the three cases before the court. But the company continued to use the premises as if a licence had been granted. In due course the company was charged with offences under the Act. In each case the company's defence was that the decision of the local authority refusing a licence was invalid. The Divisional Court held that the B justices had no jurisdiction to consider the validity of the decision to refuse a licence. The only way such a decision could be challenged was by way of judicial review. Until challenged, the decision must be presumed to be valid.

C Now I do not doubt that the decision in the three Quietlynn cases was fully justified on the facts. The facts of Portsmouth City Council v.
Quietlynn Ltd. were especially unmeritorious. In that case the local authority had refused a licence on 11 July 1983. It gave its reasons by letter dated 13 July 1983, but the company continued to use the premises as a sex shop. So the local authority commenced proceedings. On 31 August 1983 the company applied for judicial review. That application finally came on for hearing on 23 January 1985. But at the door of the court the company withdrew its application. A few months later, on 15 D May 1985, the company was convicted in the magistrates' court. But the company's appeal was allowed by the Crown Court. They acquitted the company on the ground that the decision to refuse the licence was, in the circumstances of the particular case, invalid. The Divisional Court remitted the case with a direction to convict. It is not altogether surprising that the court held that the proper procedure in the particular case was by way of judicial review, since that was the procedure which E the company had itself adopted, until it abandoned its application at the door of the court.

The difficulty in the Quietlynn cases lies not so much in the actual decision, as in some of the incidental reasoning employed by Webster J.
in giving the judgment of the court. After referring to Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461 and a number of the other cases, Webster J. said [1987] 3 W.L.R. 189, 201:

F "But we have been referred to no dictum in any of those cases which suggests that challenges to the decisions of local authorities are permissible in criminal proceedings; nor is it possible, in our view, to derive from those decisions a principle that such a challenge is permissible in proceedings of every kind."

G With great respect, I find it hard to follow the distinction between civil and criminal proceedings in this context. If the validity of a decision of a local authority is an essential element in the proof of the crime alleged, then I can see no reason why it should not be challenged in the magistrates' court or the Crown Court as the case may be. Indeed, this seems to be contemplated as a proper procedure in an earlier passage in the Quietlynn case, where, after referring to a dictum of Lord Hailsham H of St. Marylebone L.C. in London and Clydeside Estates Ltd. v.
Aberdeen District Council [1980] 1 W.L.R. 182, 187, Webster J. said, at
p. 200:

"and, although justices sometimes, for the purpose of the case immediately before them, have to rule upon the validity of a byelaw or the decision of a local authority, that ruling is binding in no other case . . ."

All that the applicants in the present case want is, I suspect, that the Crown Court at Reading should rule upon the validity of the byelaws "for the purposes of the case immediately before them." If so, then the present case is covered by the passage I have just quoted.

It may be said that there is a distinction between challenging a decision of the local authority, and challenging a local authority byelaw. But there is a difficulty in that approach, correct though it would have been on the facts of the Quietlynn case, since it is nowhere reflected in the judgment of the court in that case. Indeed the first of the two reasons given by the court for rejecting the company's argument, namely, the need to achieve uniformity between different magistrates' courts and Crown Courts, would seem to have even more force in the case of byelaws which are binding on all, than in the case of decisions of local authorities which operate in personam.

Moreover there is another passage, in addition to that which I have already quoted, which appears to treat byelaws and decisions on the same footing. Webster J. said, at p. 201:

"It has, of course, long been the practice for justices to decide for the purposes of a case immediately before them upon the validity of byelaws and, before the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, of enforcement notices. But those practices were established long before applications for judicial review were given statutory recognition in section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. The law relating to judicial review has become increasingly more sophisticated in the past few decades, and in our view justices are not to be expected to have to assume the functions of the Divisional Court and consider the validity of decisions made by a local authority under this Act in the light of what is now a complex body of law. If a bona fide challenge to the validity of the decision in question is raised before them, then proceedings should be adjourned to enable an application for judicial review to be made and determined."

This passage seems to suggest that the right to challenge byelaws in the magistrates' court has been affected by section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. Otherwise it is difficult to see why byelaws are mentioned at all. If that is the implication of the passage, then with great respect I would venture to disagree. Neither section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, nor R.S.C., Ord. 53, has taken away the right of a defendant in criminal proceedings to challenge the validity of a byelaw under which he has been charged.

I mentioned earlier the convenience of the Crown Prosecution Service. Mr. Hamilton relied heavily on the importance of being able to obtain at an early stage a decision of the Divisional Court as to the validity of the byelaws which would be binding on all inferior courts. I can understand his anxiety. But the solution lies along traditional lines. The Crown Prosecution Service should wait until a decision goes against them, and then appeal to the Divisional Court by way of case stated. Such an appeal would be just as quick, and no more expensive, than an application to the Divisional Court for judicial review. Judicial review is not to be used as a means for obtaining a decision on a question of law in advance of the hearing, similar to the old consultative case in arbitration, or the new procedure under section 2 of the Arbitration Act 1979. However convenient such a procedure might be from the point of

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Reading Crown Court, Ex p. Hutchinson (D.C.)

Lloyd L.J.

A view of the Crown Prosecution Service, it can be introduced only by legislation.

For the reasons I have given I would allow the application in the first case, and grant mandamus directed to the Crown Court at Reading to hear and determine the issue of validity of the byelaws. I would like to say again that the course which the court took, wrong though I have held it to be, was in no way their fault.

B The second case arises out of a decision of the Devizes justices on 15 June 1987. It was initially bedevilled by a serious procedural difficulty. The applicants before us were not, as in the first case, the defendants in criminal proceedings, but the Crown Prosecution Service itself; and the decision in respect of which they were seeking judicial review was a decision in their favour, namely, to adjourn the proceedings pending an application for judicial review by the defendant Mr. Ian Lee. This created an obvious problem for the applicants. But it also created a problem for us when the defendant, Mr. Lee (the respondent to the application) indicated that he did not wish to take advantage of the procedural obstacle in the way of the Crown Prosecution Service. So we felt obliged to ask for an amicus, Mr. Ter Haar, to be present. Fortunately his services were not required, since in order to preserve his locus standi should there be an appeal to the House of Lords, Mr. Lee decided, at the very end of the hearing, to seek leave to apply for judicial review himself. We acceded to his request, and treated the argument which we had already heard as argument in his application, whereupon Mr. Hamilton withdrew his application and the procedural obstacle disappeared.

D We would like to express our gratitude to Mr. Ter Haar for his willingness to assist, and indeed to all the other counsel in the two cases. The facts of the second case do not call for separate review. The point in the second case is precisely the same, save that the byelaws in issue are the Bulford Ranges Bye-Laws 1970. We will make the same order on Mr. Lee's application as we have made in the first case.

E MANN J. I agree with the result in each case and for the reasons given by Lloyd L.J. I was a party to the decision in Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth City Council [1987] 3 W.L.R. 189. I do not repent at the actual decision of that case, but upon reflection and having heard argument in this court, it seems to me that the reference to byelaws at p. 201 could be ascribed a meaning which I for my part did not intend, having regard to my silence in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Bugg (unreported).

GUMBLEY v. CUNNINGHAM
GOULD v. CASTLE

1987 July 7, 8; 28

Watkins L.J. and Mann J.

Road Traffic—Laboratory test—Proportion of alcohol—Proof of excess—Period between driving and giving specimen—Back calculation of amount of alcohol in motorist's blood at time of driving—Whether evidence admissible—Road Traffic Act 1972 (c. 20), ss. 6(1), 10(2) (as substituted by Transport Act 1981 (c. 56), s. 25(3), Sch. 8)

The two defendants had been involved in separate accidents and provided on request by police officers specimens of blood in the first case and breath in the second case for laboratory analysis. The specimens were provided over 4 hours and 3½ hours respectively after the accidents. The defendants were charged with driving with excess alcohol contrary to section 6(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972,¹ as substituted, although the readings from the specimens showed alcohol concentrations below the limits prescribed in section 12(2) of the Act of 1972, as substituted. At their trials the prosecution adduced expert scientific evidence to show that, at the time of the accident in the first case, the alcohol in the defendant's body would have been above the prescribed limit and, in the second case, the alcohol would have been likely to have been above the prescribed limit. The scientific evidence was based on a process known as back calculation by which the respective rates of elimination of alcohol from their bodies could be reckoned from the time of the accidents to the time when the specimens were provided. The defendants were convicted.

On appeal by the defendants on the ground that sections 6 and 10 of the Act of 1972, as substituted, did not permit the prosecution to adduce evidence other than that provided by a defendant's specimen of breath, blood or urine to prove the offence under section 6:—

Held, dismissing the first and allowing the second appeal, that the effect of the new section 6(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 was to make it an offence to drive or be in charge of a motor vehicle if the proportion of alcohol in the motorist's breath, blood or urine exceeded the prescribed limit; that since it was no longer a question, as posed by the original section 6(1), of the proportion of alcohol at the time the specimen of breath, blood or urine was taken, evidence was permissible to show what the proportion of excess alcohol was at the time of driving; that, accordingly, the back calculation evidence was admissible and relevant to the question to be determined under the new section 6(1) and therefore, since in the first case there was evidence that the proportion of alcohol in the defendant's blood at the time of driving was above the prescribed limit, there were no grounds for quashing the conviction but, in the second case, the conviction would be quashed since the evidence before the justices had merely been that it was likely that the proportion of alcohol in the defendant's breath at the time

B Per curiam. The prosecution should not seek to rely on evidence of back calculation save where that evidence is easily understood and is clearly persuasive of the presence of excess alcohol at the time the defendant was driving. D

CASE STATED by the Crown Court at Birmingham.

E On 28 October 1985 an information was preferred by the prosecutor, Thomas Joseph Cunningham, a police officer, against the defendant, Stephen Gary Gumbley, that the defendant on 7 May 1985 in the city of Birmingham did drive a motor car on a road, namely Queensway Tunnel, after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of alcohol in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to section 6(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as amended by section 21 of the Road Traffic Act 1974 and the Transport Act 1981.

F On 25 June 1986 justices sitting at Birmingham heard the information and found the defendant guilty of the offence. The justices adjudged that the defendant should pay a fine of £200, his licence was endorsed and he was disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for a period of 12 months. By notice of appeal dated 11 July 1986 the defendant notified his intention to appeal against the conviction to the G Crown Court on the general grounds "on a point of law as to the amount of alcohol which was said to have been in the defendant's blood stream at the material time." Before the justices there were two further informations preferred and heard; the first alleged an offence contrary to section 7(4) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted, and was found not proved. The second alleged an offence contrary to section 3 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted, and was found proved on the H defendant's own confession.

The Crown Court (Judge Ross Q.C. and a justice) heard the appeal and found the following facts. At about 8.30 p.m. on Tuesday, 7 May 1985, the defendant and his brother, Gordon, arrived at a public house in the Northfield area of Birmingham called The Dingle. The defendant left the public house at about 10.45 p.m. and with his brother as passenger began to drive to Erdington on the other side of the city. He drove for about six miles erratically and at about 11.15 p.m. the car collided at high speed with the wall of an underpass in the city centre. There was no evidence of braking and the passenger was killed. The police arrived at the scene at about 11.35 p.m. and required the defendant to provide a specimen of his breath. He refused, was arrested and taken to Steelhouse Lane police station, arriving at about 11.45 p.m. At the police station the defendant complained that he felt ill and at sometime between 11.50 p.m. and 12.20 a.m. he vomited. He was thereafter taken to the nearby general hospital. At the general hospital, at 3.35 a.m. and with the consent of the doctor having care of him, the defendant provided a specimen of blood for analysis. The later analysis of the specimen revealed a concentration of not less than 59 milligrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of blood. Further, on the basis of the unchallenged medical evidence, the Crown Court found (i) that the defendant at the material time was 34 years of age, of average height and muscular build weighing some 11 stones. He was in good physical condition. (ii) That such a person would eliminate alcohol from his blood stream at between 10 and 25 milligrammes per 100 millilitres per hour; that the most likely elimination rate was in the region of 15 milligrammes per 100 millilitres per hour and the concentration of alcohol in his body four hours and 20 minutes before the specimen was collected would have been in the region of 120 to 130 milligrammes per 100 millilitres. (iii) That even in the almost unheard of event of an elimination rate of six milligrammes per 100 millilitres per hour the defendant's blood/alcohol concentration would have been in excess of the prescribed limit at the time of the collision.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant that sections 6 to 10 inclusive of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted by the Transport Act 1981, did not permit the prosecution to adduce evidence other than the analysis of the specimen taken in pursuance of those sections, and that therefore the evidence of the doctors and forensic scientist was inadmissible, and that the difference between section 6(1) as substituted by the Act of 1981 from section 6(1) of the Act of 1972 was designed solely to remove the mischief brought to light by the peculiar facts of Rowlands v. Hamilton [1971] 1 W.L.R. 647.

It was contended on behalf of the prosecutor that the limitations upon the method of proving the amount of alcohol in a defendant's system, contained in section 6(1) of the Act of 1972 were no longer applicable given the form of section 6(1) as substituted by the Act of 1981. That section 10(2), as substituted, did not exclude the introduction of the sort of medical evidence heard in the instant case in order to prove the amount of alcohol in the defendant's system.

The Crown Court were of the opinion that the prosecutor's contentions were correct and accordingly dismissed the appeal.

The defendant appealed. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether on a true construction of sections 6(1) and 10(2) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted, the prosecutor was entitled to adduce evidence other than by way of the specimen of breath or blood provided by a defendant in order to prove the proportion of alcohol in the defendant's breath or blood at the material time.

3 W.L.R.

Gumbley v. Cunningham (D.C.)

A 1986 did drive a motor vehicle, namely a motor car, on a road or other public place, namely Hatfield Road, St. Albans, after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his breath was between 43 and 65 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath which exceeded the prescribed limit of 35 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath, contrary to section 6 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as amended by section 25 of and Schedule 8 to the Transport Act 1981.

B The justices heard the information on 16 January 1987 and found the following facts: (a) the defendant was the driver of a motor vehicle on a road at 11.58 p.m. on 3 July 1986 when an accident occurred owing to the presence of that vehicle on the road. (b) At 3.05 a.m. on 4 July 1986 the defendant was seen at his home by Police Sergeant Brooks who had reasonable cause to believe the defendant to have been the driver of the vehicle at the time of the accident and who then conveyed him to a police station. (c) At the police station the breath test procedure was lawfully carried out and the defendant provided two specimens of breath for analysis. The lower of the two specimens provided was shown on analysis by the Lion Intoximeter 3000 to contain 28 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath. (d)(i) The accident occurred at 11.58 p.m. on 3 July 1986. (ii) The defendant provided a sample of breath at 3.45 a.m. on 4 July 1986 which was shown on analysis to contain 28 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath. (iii) The defendant weighed 13 stones. (iv) The defendant confirmed his last alcoholic drink prior to the accident at 11.40 p.m. on 3 July 1986 and did not consume any more alcohol after the accident and prior to the provision of the specimen of breath. (e) It was possible by a scientific calculation to estimate the breath alcohol concentration at a time prior to the provision of the breath test but it could only be approximate. (f) The result of scientific tests and calculation by a forensic scientist based on the information contained in (c) above revealed that the defendant would have eliminated between 15 and 37 microgrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of breath between the time of the accident and the provision of the breath specimen, and thus was likely to have had a breath alcohol concentration of between 43 and 65 microgrammes per 100 millilitres of breath at the time of the accident.

E The defendant contended that the only evidence of the proportion of alcohol in his breath at the time of the accident was that provided by the scientific calculation which revealed merely that he was likely to have had a breath alcohol concentration of between 43 and 65 microgrammes per 100 millilitres of breath; that evidence of a likelihood was not sufficient to enable the justices to be sure beyond reasonable doubt of the proportion of alcohol in the breath.

G The prosecutor contended that in order to find the defendant guilty the justices had to be certain beyond reasonable doubt that the proportion of alcohol in the defendant's breath exceeded the prescribed limit of 35 microgrammes in 100 millilitres of breath and that the justices did not have to be certain of the exact proportion.

H The justices were of opinion that (a) the scientific tests and calculation could not give the precise level of the proportion of alcohol in the breath. (b) The use of the word "likely" meant that the tolerance around the deduced level provided a range reaching down to 43 microgrammes and up to 65 microgrammes, and not that the level could have been higher or lower than those extremities. (c) The lowest level of the range quoted was well in excess of the permitted level of alcohol in the blood. (d) The justices were satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the level of alcohol in the defendant's breath exceeded the prescribed limit of 35 microgrammes in 100 millilitres of breath; and accordingly they convicted him of the offence, fined him £150, disqualified him for 12 months and ordered the particulars to be endorsed on his driving licence.

The defendant appealed. The question for the opinion of the court was (a) whether section 10 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 entitled the justices to admit and consider evidence of the amount of alcohol in the defendant's breath at the relevant time by a process of back calculation from the sample of breath actually obtained when that sample was below the prescribed limit; (b) whether the justices were entitled to feel sure of the defendant's guilt beyond reasonable doubt when the only evidence in support of the prosecution in relation to the amount of alcohol in the defendant's breath was that of the forensic scientist, who, after an estimation known as the "countback" procedure, calculated that "Mr. Gould is likely to have had a breath alcohol concentration of between 43 and 65 microgrammes per 100 millilitres at the time of the incident."

Dominic Roberts for the first defendant.

Richard O'Rorke for the second defendant.

Roger D. H. Smith for the prosecution.

Cur. adv. vult.

28 July. MANN J. read the following judgment of the court. There are before the court two appeals by way of case stated. The defendant in the first appeal is Stephen Gary Gumbley and the prosecutor is Thomas Joseph Cunningham, who is a police officer. The defendant in the second appeal is Steven Adrian Gould and the prosecutor is Chief Inspector Castle. The first case was stated by Judge Ross Q.C. and a justice in respect of their adjudication as a Crown Court sitting at Birmingham on 18 November 1986 when they dismissed the first defendant's appeal against his conviction by Birmingham justices that he on 7 May 1985 did drive a motor car after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion thereof exceeded the prescribed limit contrary to section 6(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 as substituted by section 25 of, and Schedule 8 to, the Transport Act 1981. The second case was stated by Hertford justices sitting at St. Albans in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court on 16 January 1987. On that day the justices convicted the second defendant of an offence against section 6(1) of the Act of 1972 as so substituted being an offence which was alleged to have been committed on 3 July 1986.

The two cases raise a common and important question. The second case has a discrete point which is of no general significance.

The common and important question is whether evidence can be admitted to show that a defendant's alcohol level was at the time of an alleged drink and driving offence higher than that shown in an analysis. The question cannot be understood without reciting the legislative context in which it has arisen. The context is that of some of the provisions substituted by the Transport Act 1981 for sections 6 to 12 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 as originally enacted. Section 6(1) now provides:

3 W.L.R.

Gumbley v. Cunningham (D.C.)

A "If a person—(a) drives or attempts to drive a motor vehicle on a road or other public place; or (b) is in charge of a motor vehicle on a road or other public place; after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his breath, blood or urine exceeds the prescribed limit he shall be guilty of an offence."

B The "prescribed limit" is interpreted in the substituted section 12(2) of the Act of 1972 in these terms:

" 'the prescribed limit' means, as the case may require—(a) 35 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath; (b) 80 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood; or (c) 107 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of urine . . . "

C Section 10 now provides:

D "(1) The following provisions apply with respect to proceedings for an offence under . . . section 6 of this Act. (2) Evidence of the proportion of alcohol or any drug in a specimen of breath, blood or urine provided by the accused shall, in all cases, be taken into account, and it shall be assumed that the proportion of alcohol in the accused's breath, blood or urine at the time of the alleged offence was not less than in the specimen; but if the proceedings are for an offence under section 6 of this Act . . . in a case where the accused is alleged to have been unfit through drink, the assumption shall not be made if the accused proves—(a) that he consumed alcohol after he had ceased to drive, attempt to drive or be in charge of a motor vehicle on a road or other public place and before he provided the specimen; and (b) that had he not done so the proportion of alcohol in his breath, blood or urine would not have exceeded the prescribed limit . . . "

F The facts to which the legislative provisions are to be applied are as follows. In the first appeal the defendant was driving his motor vehicle on 7 May 1985 when at 11.15 p.m. he was involved in a fatal accident. At 3.35 a.m. on the next day he gave a specimen of blood in accord with the statutory procedure (under section 8) and on analysis the specimen was found to give a concentration of not less than 59 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood. The concentration was thus below the prescribed limit. However, the prosecutor gave evidence to the effect that a person of the defendant's height, age, weight and physical condition would eliminate alcohol from his blood stream at between 10 and 25 milligrammes per 100 millilitres per hour and that accordingly the concentration of alcohol in his body at the time of the accident would have been in the region of 120 to 130 milligrammes per 100 millilitres of blood. That concentration is above the limit. The justices held that the prosecutor's evidence was admissible, accepted it, convicted the defendant, fined him £200, endorsed his licence and imposed a 12 month disqualification. The Crown Court dismissed the defendant's appeal and posed the following question for the opinion of this court:

"whether on a true construction of sections 6(1) and 10(2) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted, the prosecutor is entitled to adduce evidence other than by way of the specimen of breath or blood provided by the accused in order to prove the proportion of alcohol in the accused's breath or blood at the material time."

In the second appeal, the defendant was driving his motor vehicle on 3 July 1986 when at 11.58 p.m. he was involved in an accident. At 3.45 a.m. on the next day he gave two specimens of breath in accord with the statutory procedure. On analysis the lower of the two specimens showed 28 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath. The concentration was thus below the prescribed limit. However, the prosecutor led evidence to the effect that the defendant would have eliminated between 15 and 37 microgrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of breath between the time of the accident and the provision of the specimen and was thus "likely" to have had a breath alcohol concentration of between 43 and 65 microgrammes per 100 millilitres of breath at the time of the accident. That concentration is above the limit. The justices held that the prosecutor's evidence was admissible, accepted it, convicted the defendant, fined him £150, endorsed his licence and imposed a 12 month disqualification. The justices pose the following questions for the opinion of this court:

"(a) whether the wording of section 10 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 entitled us to admit and consider evidence of the amount of alcohol in the defendant's breath at the relevant time by a process of back calculation from the sample of breath actually obtained when that sample was below the prescribed limit; (b) whether we are entitled to feel sure of the defendant's guilt beyond reasonable doubt when the only evidence in support of the prosecution in relation to the amount of alcohol in the defendant's breath was that of the forensic scientist, who after an estimation known as the 'countback' procedure, calculated that 'Mr. Gould is likely to have had a breath alcohol concentration of between 43 and 65 microgrammes per 100 millilitres at the time of the incident."

The question of the admissibility of evidence such as was in each case admitted for the prosecution has not previously been before this court. In Smith v. Geraghty [1986] R.T.R. 222 the Divisional Court held that a defendant could lead evidence to show that but for an alcoholic drink which he thought was non-alcoholic, he would have been below the prescribed limit at the time of driving and that accordingly there was a special reason for not imposing a disqualification: see section 93(1) of the Act of 1972. Glidewell L.J. said, at p. 232:

"Going back to the level of alcohol in the blood at the time of driving is clearly permissible but only practicable, in my judgment, provided that there is reasonably clear, straightforward and relatively simple evidence to show it. In other circumstances, though, as I say, it is for them, I would take the view that justices ought not to be drawn into any detailed scientific calculation."

The point in Smith v. Geraghty is plainly different from that which we now have to decide, but the cautionary words used by Glidewell L.J. about the production and reliance upon expert evidence is a matter which is of concern to us in the present case.

Counsel on behalf of the defendants showed us the provisions previous to the existing legislation. The first provision was section 1(1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. It provided:

"If a person drives or attempts to drive a motor vehicle on a road or other public place, having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood, as ascertained from a

3 W.L.R.

Gumbley v. Cunningham (D.C.)

A laboratory test for which he subsequently provides a specimen under section 3 of this Act, exceeds the prescribed limit at the time he provides the specimen, he shall be liable . . .”

B This provision was substantially reproduced as the original section 6(1) of the Act of 1972. In Rowlands v. Hamilton [1971] 1 W.L.R. 647 the House of Lords held that the prosecution could not adduce evidence to show what the blood alcohol concentration of a defendant would have been at the time of driving when he had consumed alcohol after ceasing to drive but before providing a specimen. Lord Guest said, at pp. 653–654:

C “I am sure that the Crown were right in admitting that in the case where the ‘driver’ consumes alcohol after he ceases to drive the alcohol content at the time of the test could not be taken without adjustment to allow for the whiskies subsequently consumed. Otherwise, a person might have driven and taken no alcohol before driving, but he would be liable to be convicted if, after he has ceased to drive, he had consumed alcohol which resulted in the blood specimen showing an excess over the prescribed limit. The mischief aimed at by the statute was drinking before driving, not drinking after driving.

D “For the Crown to succeed it is, therefore, necessary for them to show that the adjustment made to eliminate the post-driving alcohol content could legitimately be made under the section. It is at this point that the words in section 1(1) ‘as ascertained from a laboratory test’ become important. Detailed provisions are made in section 3 regarding laboratory tests and ‘the prescribed limit’ referred to in section 1(1) is given as the arithmetical proportion of 80 milligrams of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood. These provisions make it clear, to my mind, that the Act intended an automatic calculation to be made by means of a chemical analysis as to whether an offence had been committed. It is against the background of the disputes in the courts under the previous Road Traffic Acts as to the effect of alcohol on an individual’s capacity to drive that Parliament has in the Act of 1967 provided for automatic proof of guilt by the analysis. For Dr. Dolan to make the adjustment of the proportions it would be necessary to go outside the ‘laboratory test’ provided in section 1(1) and make calculations based upon certain assumptions as to the individual concerned and the time factor. It would ultimately depend upon the expert opinion of the doctor or chemist. I am convinced that Parliament never intended such calculations to be made and that these calculations would not be justified by the terms of the section. I am not satisfied that the section is ambiguous, but if it were I should unhesitatingly take the construction most favourable to the subject.

H “We were pressed by the Crown that if the respondent’s contention were right it would leave a loophole in the Act through which the ‘hip-flask’ driver, as he has been described, would escape. This may be so, but if the Act is not watertight then it is for Parliament and not the courts to supply the omission. I am more impressed by the argument for the respondent that if the Crown’s argument were sustained it would result in cases such as the present in lengthy arguments and evidence before the court, which would not lead to the clarity in which the law should be expressed.”

The "hip-flask" driver is now given the burden of establishing that his specimen revealed a level above the prescribed limit because of the consumption of alcohol after ceasing to drive: see section 10(2) of the Act of 1972, as substituted. It was urged upon us by the defendants that we should construe the substituted provisions in the Act of 1981 as doing no more than eliminate the loophole disclosed by Rowlands v. Hamilton [1971] 1 W.L.R. 647. We are driven to say we cannot agree. The new section 6(1) is different from the old. The question is now simply as to the proportion of alcohol at the moment of driving or of being in charge. The old section 6(1) raised the quite different question as to excess at the time of providing the specimen which was the subject of the laboratory test. Evidence which is material to the question of what was the proportion of alcohol at the moment of driving must be admissible. The provisions of section 10(2) do not preclude evidence other than that revealed by a specimen to show a greater level of alcohol although, subject to the "hip-flask" defence, the specimen will always provide a "not less" or base figure. If that figure is above the prescribed limit, other evidence is unnecessary to establish the offence.

Our conclusion means that those who drive whilst above the prescribed limits cannot necessarily escape punishment because of the lapse of time. However, our conclusion also means that in cases where a sample provided a substantial period of time after driving has ceased shows a level below the prescribed limit justices may find themselves confronted with evidence of a complicated and scientific nature. Back calculations involve a great number of factors: see Wilkinson's Road Traffic Offences, 13th ed. (1987), vol. 1, para. 4.75. This is regrettable but inevitable. We think it needs to be said, therefore, that in our view the prosecution should not seek to rely on evidence of back calculation save where that evidence is easily understood and clearly persuasive of the presence of excess alcohol at the time when a defendant was driving. Moreover, justices must be very careful especially where there is conflicting evidence not to convict unless, upon the scientific and other evidence which they find it safe to rely on, they are sure an excess of alcohol was in the defendant's body when he was actually driving as charged.

There remains the second question in the second appeal which relates to the justices' acceptance of evidence that it was "likely" that at the time of the accident the defendant's breath alcohol concentration was above the prescribed limit. We are unable to proceed on the basis that acceptance of evidence that a level was "likely" is equivalent to being satisfied so as to be sure that it was.

The result is accordingly that in the first appeal the question is answered "yes" and the appeal is dismissed. In the second appeal the first question is answered "yes" and the second "no" with the consequence that the appeal is allowed. We should add that in the second appeal the defendant was not offered an opportunity to provide a specimen of blood or urine which he should have been as the lower of his two specimens of breath contained less than 50 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath: see section 8(6) of the Act of 1972, as substituted. The specimen of breath, on which the back calculation was based, should not therefore have been admitted: see Anderton v. Lythgoe [1985] 1 W.L.R. 222. The point was not taken before the

The defendant, a motorist, was asked to take a roadside breath test. The test proved positive. He was arrested and at the police station he was asked to provide a specimen of breath on a Lion Intoximeter. The specimen which he provided gave a reading of 78 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath, a reading over twice the permitted maximum. When he was asked to give a further specimen the defendant did not blow properly into the machine which aborted the test. The defendant failed to follow the instructions given to him as to the proper method of blowing into the mouthpiece of the machine and four attempts to obtain a specimen were aborted by the machine. The defendant then refused to provide a further specimen. The defendant was charged with two offences, namely, contravening section 6(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted, and section 8(7) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted.¹ The justices convicted the defendant of both offences. On appeal by the defendant by way of case stated, the justices stated the following questions for the opinion of the High Court: (i) Whether they were correct in following Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244 in prohibiting the defendant from adducing evidence of the amount of alcohol which he had consumed, in order to show that the Lion Intoximeter machine was defective, and (ii) whether they were correct in following Duddy v. Gallagher [1985] R.T.R. 401 in convicting the defendant of both the offence of failing to supply a specimen of breath and actually supplying a specimen of breath which exceeded the prescribed limit. The Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division upheld the justices' decision and answered both questions in the affirmative.

Cracknell v. Willis (H.L.(E.))

A reasonably be drawn that the device was unreliable was admissible, since the language of section 10(2) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted, did not confine the challenge to the validity of a device to a particular type of evidence, and that accordingly, in the circumstances, the justices erred in refusing to allow the defendant to adduce evidence of the amount of alcohol he had consumed (post, pp. 1084B-D, 1095E, 1096E-F, H, 1097C, H—1098A, 1099D-F).

B Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244, D.C. and Price v. Nicholls [1986] R.T.R. 155, D.C. overruled.

(2) That the offences prescribed by section 6 and section 8(7) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted, were mutually exclusive and that the defendant should not have been convicted of an offence under section 6(1) on the evidence of only one specimen of breath; but that the error of the justices in refusing to allow the defendant to adduce further evidence to challenge the validity of the device was no ground for quashing his conviction for refusing, without reasonable excuse, to provide a specimen of breath contrary to section 8(7) (post, pp. 1084B-D, 1088D-F, 1089E-G, 1097C, G-H).

D Per curiam. In assessing the penalty for refusing to provide a specimen of breath the magistrates are entitled to take into account any evidence that indicates the motorist's consumption of alcohol and that would include the result of the analysis of the first breath specimen if he unreasonably refuses to provide a second specimen (post, p. 1089E-G).

The following additional case was cited in argument:

Reg. v. Skegness Magistrates' Court, Ex parte Cardy [1985] R.T.R. 49, D.C.

APPEAL from the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division.

H This was an appeal by leave of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook and Lord Oliver of Aylmerton) by the defendant, Robert Peter Cracknell, from the judgment dated 20 October 1986 of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division (Ralph Gibson L.J. and McNeill J.) dismissing the defendant's appeal by way of case stated against his conviction by Bromley justices on 7 April 1986, on informations preferred by the prosecutor, Police Constable Willis, of two offences, namely: (i) driving a motor vehicle on a road after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his breath exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to section 6(1)(a) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as amended by the Transport Act 1981, and (ii) failing, without reasonable excuse, to provide a specimen contrary to section 8(7) of the same Act.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Lord Griffiths.

Keith Knight for the defendant.

Ann Goddard Q.C. and Hilton Harrop-Griffiths for the prosecutor.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

5 November. LORD KEITH OF KINKEL. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of considering in draft the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Griffiths. I agree with it, and for the reasons he gives would allow the appeal to the extent which he proposes, and dismiss it as regards the conviction under the substituted section 8(7) of the Road Traffic Act 1972.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Griffiths. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would allow the appeal to the extent proposed by him.

LORD GRIFFITHS. My Lords, on 13 February 1986 the appellant was followed by the police because of the speed at which he was driving. When he stopped outside his house he was asked by the police to take a roadside breath test. The test proved positive, he was arrested and taken to Orpington Police Station. At the police station he was asked to provide a specimen of breath on a Lion Intoximeter. He provided a specimen which gave a reading of 78 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath, a reading well above the permitted maximum. When he was asked to give a further specimen the appellant did not blow properly into the machine which aborted the test. The police sergeant conducting the test explained to the appellant that he should blow continuously into the mouthpiece and asked for a further specimen. The appellant did not follow this instruction: at the next and subsequent attempts, he blew so that some of his breath went into the machine and some escaped through his hands. Four such attempts to obtain a specimen were aborted by the machine. The appellant then refused to provide a further specimen.

On these facts he was convicted on 7 April 1986 by the Bromley magistrates of the offence of driving a motor vehicle on a road with excess alcohol in his breath contrary to section 6(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted by the Transport Act 1981, for which he was fined £150 and disqualified from driving for 18 months and of the offence of failing to provide a specimen of breath contrary to section 8(7) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted by the Transport Act 1981, for which he was also fined £150 and disqualified for driving for 18 months.

At the request of the appellant the magistrates stated a case for the opinion of the High Court upon the following two questions:

3 W.L.R.

Cracknell v. Willis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Griffiths

A "1. Whether we were correct in following the case of Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244 in prohibiting the appellant from adducing evidence of the amount of alcohol which he had consumed, in order to show that the Lion Intoximeter machine was defective, and 2. Whether we were correct in following the case of Duddy v. Gallagher [1985] R.T.R. 401 in convicting the appellant of both the B offence of failing to supply a specimen of breath and actually supplying a specimen of breath which exceeded the prescribed limit."

C The Divisional Court upheld the decision of the magistrates and answered both questions in the affirmative. In so doing they followed the previous decisions of the Divisional Court in Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244 and Duddy v. Gallagher [1985] R.T.R. 401. The appellant now appeals to your Lordships' House and submits that both these previous decisions were wrongly decided.

D It will be convenient to deal first with the second question. It is common knowledge that in times past juries were very reluctant to convict motorists of the offence of driving a motor vehicle on a road when unfit to drive through drink or drugs. Why this should have been so I do not know, perhaps the public conscience had not yet fully awoken to the menace of the drink-affected driver, perhaps too many jurors in those days thought that they might one day be in the same predicament as the defendant and were over-confident of their own ability to drink and drive, perhaps the public did not yet realise that E relatively small quantities of alcohol seriously affect the reaction times of most people. Whatever the reasons, those with experience of such cases know that they were invariably bitterly contested and it was unlikely that a conviction would be secured unless the defendant was very drunk. As the law was clearly failing to provide an adequate deterrent to drinking and driving, Parliament decided to introduce in the Road Safety Act 1967 an absolute standard and to provide that it would in F future be an offence to drive with more than a permitted proportion of alcohol in the blood, and to make provision for laboratory tests of blood or urine to establish the proportion of alcohol in the blood. The level of alcohol consumption which corresponded to the level at which Parliament set the limit, although no doubt justifying the view that anyone exceeding the limit should not be driving, was undoubtedly much lower than that G required to secure a conviction of the old offence and much easier to prove. When the Act of 1967 was replaced by the Road Traffic Act 1972 the old offence remained as section 5 and the new offence became section 6 of the Act. In practice from that time onward nearly all cases of drunken driving have been prosecuted under section 6 rather than section 5 of the Act of 1972. For some years the offence was proved by H producing an analysis of a blood or urine sample provided by the motorist, but then a new device was invented that enabled the proportion of alcohol in the breath to be determined by immediate analysis. Provided that such a machine is reliable it has obvious advantages over the use of urine or blood samples. It can be operated by a trained police officer and prints out an immediate analysis of the breath, cutting out the delay involved in the laboratory analysis of urine and blood samples and the attendance of a doctor in the case of a blood sample.

But the motorist is at the mercy of the machine in the sense that he has no means of checking its performance, whereas in the case of a urine or blood sample, the statutory provisions require that the sample is divided into two, and one half given to the motorist who can, if he wishes, have it analysed himself to check the accuracy of the analysis provided by the prosecution. It was no doubt with these considerations in mind that Parliament provided certain safeguards to protect the motorist when it introduced the use of breath testing devices by the Transport Act 1981.

Section 25(3) of the Transport Act 1981 substituted the sections set out in Schedule 8 of the Act for sections 6 to 12 of the Act of 1972.

Section 6 now makes it an offence to drive with more than the prescribed limit of alcohol in breath, blood or urine. It is no longer necessary for an analyst to equate the percentage of alcohol in the urine to the alcohol in the blood. Section 12 provides that the prescribed limits are 35 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath, 80 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood and 107 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of urine.

The substituted section 8 I must set out in full:

“(1) In the course of an investigation whether a person has committed an offence under section 5 or section 6 of this Act a constable may, subject to the following provisions of this section and section 9 below, require him—(a) to provide two specimens of breath for analysis by means of a device of a type approved by the Secretary of State; or (b) to provide a specimen of blood or urine for a laboratory test. (2) A requirement under this section to provide specimens of breath can only be made at a police station. (3) A requirement under this section to provide a specimen of blood or urine can only be made at a police station or at a hospital; and it cannot be made at a police station unless—(a) the constable making the requirement has reasonable cause to believe that for medical reasons a specimen of breath cannot be provided or should not be required; or (b) at the time the requirement is made a device or a reliable device of the type mentioned in subsection (1)(a) is not available at the police station or it is then for any other reason not practicable to use such a device there; or (c) the suspected offence is one under section 5 of this Act and the constable making the requirement has been advised by a medical practitioner that the condition of the person required to provide the specimen might be due to some drug; but may then be made notwithstanding that the person required to provide the specimen has already provided or been required to provide two specimens of breath. (4) If the provision of a specimen other than a specimen of breath may be required in pursuance of this section the question whether it is to be a specimen of blood or a specimen of urine shall be decided by the constable making the requirement, except that if a medical practitioner is of the opinion that for medical reasons a specimen of blood cannot or should not be taken the specimen shall be a specimen of urine. (5) A specimen of urine shall be provided within one hour of the requirement for its provision being made and after the provision of a previous specimen of urine. (6) Of any two specimens of breath provided by any person in pursuance of this

Lord Griffiths

A section that with the lower proportion of alcohol in the breath shall be used and the other shall be disregarded; but if the specimen with the lower proportion of alcohol contains no more than 50 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath the person who provided it may claim that it should be replaced by such a specimen as may be required under subsection (4), and if he then provides such a specimen neither specimen of breath shall be used. (7) A person who, without reasonable excuse, fails to provide a specimen when required to do so in pursuance of this section shall be guilty of an offence. (8) On requiring any person to provide a specimen in pursuance of this section a constable shall warn him that a failure to provide it may render him liable to prosecution. (9) The Secretary of State may by regulations substitute another proportion of alcohol in the breath for that specified in subsection (6)."

D The terms of subsection (3) make it clear that henceforth the breath specimen is to be the principal means of establishing the quantity of alcohol that the motorist had consumed for the purpose of a prosecution under section 6. It is only if a reliable machine is not available for use at the police station or there are medical reasons why the motorist cannot supply a specimen of breath that the police can demand a specimen of urine or blood. But there are the following safeguards introduced for the protection of the motorist:

E 1. The device must be of a type approved by the Secretary of State: subsection (1). 2. Two specimens of breath must be taken and the specimen with the lower proportion of alcohol in the breath used and the other disregarded: subsection (6). This is a precaution obviously introduced to give the motorist the benefit of the doubt in the case of any variation in the performance of the machine; and in my view it must follow that it was not intended that a motorist should be convicted on the evidence of only one specimen of breath. 3. If the machine indicates that the motorist is over the prescribed limit, but not excessively so, then the motorist can opt to give a specimen of blood or urine which replaces the breath specimens and neither breath specimen shall be used: subsection (6) and subsection (4). This provision coupled with the provision that only the lower specimen should be used appear to indicate a recognition of the fact that "trial by machine" is an entirely novel concept and should be introduced with a degree of caution. 4. That the particular machine used should be reliable, which I take to be implicit in the wording of subsection (3)(b) and which must, in any event, be read into the section, for it would be unthinkable that it could be intended that anyone should be convicted by an unreliable machine: see the decision of the Divisional Court in Newton v. Woods [1987] R.T.R. 41 to this effect.

H The other relevant section is section 10:

"(1) The following provisions apply with respect to proceedings for an offence under section 5 or section 6 of this Act. (2) Evidence of the proportion of alcohol or any drug in a specimen of breath, blood or urine provided by the accused shall, in all cases, be taken into account, and it shall be assumed that the proportion of alcohol in the accused's breath, blood or urine at the time of the alleged offence was not less than in the specimen; but if the proceedings are for an offence under section 6 of this Act, or for an offence under section 5 of this Act in a case where the accused is alleged to have been unfit through drink, the assumption shall not be made if the accused proves—(a) that he consumed alcohol after he had ceased to drive, attempted to drive or be in charge of a motor vehicle on a road or other public place and before he provided the specimen; and (b) that had he not done so the proportion of alcohol in his breath, blood or urine would not have exceeded the prescribed limit and, if the proceedings are for an offence under section 5 of this Act, would not have been such as to impair his ability to drive properly.”

The object of the legislation is to provide a relatively simple way of establishing whether a motorist is driving after drinking too much, and if he is doing so to punish him. The motorist can of course frustrate the procedures by refusing to provide the necessary specimen. But if he does so without reasonable excuse he commits an offence under section 8(7) and is in effect treated as though he had driven when exceeding the prescribed limit, being subject to the same penalties as if he had committed an offence under section 6.

The appellant submits that the two offences were intended to be alternatives and that the Act should be construed so as to provide that they are mutually exclusive. Otherwise, as the appellant points out, the man who refuses to give a specimen because he knows he has drunk far too much, is better off than the man who has drunk much less and to his surprise finds he is over the limit on the first breath specimen and then panics and refuses the second specimen. The first man can only be prosecuted and convicted for a section 8(7) offence but if the present decision is right the second man can be convicted and punished under both section 6 and section 8(7). I am unwilling to think that such a result can have been intended when the Act of 1981 was passed. I must therefore consider whether Duddy v. Gallagher [1985] R.T.R. 401 was correctly decided.

The facts of that case were that the defendant was stopped when he was driving the wrong way down a one way street. His breath smelt strongly of alcohol. Despite three attempts he failed to provide a sample of breath for a roadside breath test. He was arrested and taken to the police station. He gave a specimen of breath on the Lion Intoximeter 3000 which displayed a reading of 55 microgrammes, the significance of which was explained to the defendant. The defendant then failed to provide a second specimen of breath. He was convicted of failing to provide a specimen of breath for the roadside breath test contrary to section 7 of the Act of 1972, as amended, of driving when the proportion of alcohol in his breath exceeded the prescribed limit in breach of section 6(1), and failing to provide a specimen of breath contrary to section 8(7). The Divisional Court upheld these convictions accepting the submission of the prosecution that provided the first specimen of breath was taken in accordance with the statutory procedure laid down in section 8 of the Act of 1972, it then became admissible to establish the section 6 offence by virtue of the provisions of section 10(2).

3 W.L.R.

Cracknell v. Willis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Griffiths

A My Lords, I am unable to accept this construction of the Act. As Lord Bridge of Harwich pointed out in Fox v. Chief Constable of Gwent [1986] A.C. 281, 297 section 10(2) was introduced by the Act of 1981 in order to deal with what had become known as the "hip flask defence."
B A motorist fearing that he was about to be breathalysed would drink from a flask after he had stopped driving and then claim that the subsequent analysis of blood or urine reflected this intake of alcohol and was not a reliable guide to the alcohol in his system at the time he was driving. In many cases the prosecution had difficulty in satisfying the magistrates that they had discharged the burden that lay upon them to show that despite this extra drink the accused nevertheless must have C already been over the limit when he was driving. The effect of section 10(2) is to reverse the burden of proof if an accused raises this form of defence. The magistrates must first determine the proportion of alcohol in the relevant specimen, and having done this they are to assume that at the time of the offence, i.e. when he was driving or in charge of a motor vehicle, he had not less than that proportion of alcohol in his breath, blood, or urine. This assumption can however be displaced if the motorist proves that but for the extra alcohol he had drunk after the D alleged offence he would not have been over the prescribed limit or unfit to drive. The specimen which the magistrates take into account, for the purpose of determining the proportion of alcohol in his breath, blood or urine, must be a specimen which it was intended should be relied upon by the court pursuant to the provisions of section 8. I have E already pointed to the safeguards in section 8 which are designed to give protection to the motorist against possible malfunction of the machine.
One of these is that two specimens of breath should be taken and only the lower specimen should be used. The specimen which the magistrates are entitled to rely upon for the purposes of determining the proportion of alcohol in the breath under section 10(2) is the lower of the two specimens. If only one specimen of breath has been taken it is not to be F relied upon for the purposes of a conviction, and is not a specimen which the magistrates are entitled to take into account under section 10(2).

I therefore consider that Duddy v. Gallagher [1985] R.T.R. 401 was wrongly decided and that Burridge v. East (Note) [1986] R.T.R. 328 which also held that a motorist could be convicted of an offence under section 6(1) on the evidence of one specimen of breath was also wrongly G decided.

I would therefore hold that the appellant ought not to have been convicted under section 6(1) in the present case. I would add, however, that in assessing the penalty to be imposed for refusing to provide a specimen of breath the magistrates are entitled to take into account any evidence that indicates the motorist's consumption of alcohol and this would include the result of the analysis of the first breath specimen if he H unreasonably refuses to provide a second specimen.

I turn now to the first question in the case, which to my mind raises far greater difficulties and may have disturbing consequences. The question is how far, if at all, and by what evidence is a motorist entitled to challenge the reliability of the machine which analysed his breath. In the present case the appellant wished to give evidence of his consumption of alcohol prior to his arrest for the purpose of attacking the reliability of the machine. Presumably he was going to submit that as he had drunk so little the magistrates should draw the inference that the machine which, on the first specimen had shown his breath to contain over double the prescribed limit of alcohol, must have been unreliable and inaccurate. In his printed case the appellant puts it thus:

“Such evidence would have tended to show that the reading given in respect of the single breath sample was suspect and that the machine was defective, thereby providing support for the defendant’s case that the malfunctioning of the machine was the cause of his supplying only one specimen of breath.”

The magistrates who had heard no technical evidence to suggest that the machine was not working correctly held themselves bound by Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244 and refused to allow the appellant to give evidence of the alcohol he had consumed.

In Hughes v. McConnell the magistrates had acquitted the defendant of a charge of driving with more than the prescribed limit of alcohol in his breath contrary to section 6(1). It was a remarkable decision in the light of the facts set out in the stated case, which were as follows:

“The justices heard the information on 18 April 1984 and found the following facts. (a) On 16 September 1983 the defendant went to the Dun Cow, Trench where he consumed a number of Coca-Colas (non-alcoholic drink), and then three pints of bitter shandy in the company of his wife and another couple, Mr. & Mrs. Allen. (b) The defendant left the public house with his wife between 10.34 p.m. and 10.50 p.m. and drove his car home. (c) At 11.05 p.m. a police constable on mobile patrol duty, together with a special constable noticed the defendant’s car, a blue Avenger, several times swerve across the white lines in the middle of the road then swerve back and clip the kerb. The constable stopped the defendant’s car and on speaking to the driver noticed that the defendant’s breath smelt of intoxicating liquor and that his speech was slurred. The constable requested the defendant to get out of the car and asked him to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test. The device used by the constable was an Alcotest (R) 80, tube and plastic bag. (d) The defendant’s breath test was found to be positive and he was cautioned then conveyed to Wellington police station to provide a specimen of breath for analysis. The arresting officers considered he was drunk, one saying he was very drunk. (e) At the police station at 12.03 a.m. the defendant provided two specimens of breath in the Lion Intoximeter 3000 device and the following readings were produced:

“First calibration check:	34
BLANK	0
First reading:	125
Second reading:	120
Second calibration check:	35

A "The station sergeant operating the device considered that the defendant was very drunk; he particularly remembered him as he was so drunk. (f) The defendant was then placed in a police cell and was reported and released from the police station at 03.40 a.m.
having at that time provided a negative breath test on the Alcotest B (R) 80 device. (g) The defendant had only drunk Coca-Cola and three pints of bitter shandy. (h) The defendant was sober when he called at his father's house in Brookhill Crescent, Ketley, in the early hours of the morning after his release from the police station.
(i) The defendant's driving was normal when he drove from his father's house back to his home in Haybridge Avenue, Hadley, and on the subsequent journey to Anglesey the defendant was awake and talking. (j) Having heard expert evidence on behalf of the C prosecutor, the justices found the following facts: (i) that to attain a reading of 120 microgrammes on the Lion Intoximeter 3000 the subject would have had to consume between four and five pints of beer beyond the 1½ apparently consumed; (ii) that, based on the information received in this particular case, that the defendant had only had three pints of bitter shandy—1½ pints of beer—then in the expert's opinion the defendant could not be over the legal limit of D 35 microgrammes; (iii) that a subject who gave a reading of 120 on the Lion Intoximeter 3000 device would be so under the influence of alcohol as to be in a stupor, and at the earliest would be sober at 9.00 a.m., but more likely not until 1.00 p.m. . . . Upon hearing the evidence of the defendant and his witnesses the justices could not be satisfied that the reading produced by the Lion Intoximeter 3000 E device was accurate and therefore, were not satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant had consumed so much alcohol as to exceed the prescribed limit; they, therefore, dismissed the information. . . . The question for the opinion of the court was:
1. Where a defendant is charged with driving a motor vehicle on a road after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his breath exceeds the prescribed limit contrary to section 6 of the F Road Traffic Act 1972, as substituted by section 25 of, and Schedule 8 to, the Transport Act 1981, may he challenge the validity of a statement automatically produced by an authorised device, by which the proportion of alcohol in a specimen of his breath was measured, by inferentially suggesting that it could not have been possible for the defendant to have consumed so much alcohol as would have G been required to produce this figure by reason of: (i) evidence of the amount of alcohol he had consumed prior to providing the specimen; (ii) evidence that he provided a negative specimen of breath for a breath test within a few hours of providing a positive specimen; (iii) evidence that he appeared sober within a few hours of providing a positive specimen; and (iv) expert evidence that if the matters set out at (i) to (iii) were correct, it was impossible that H the measurement was correct? 2. On the facts as found in the case was the court entitled to conclude that the validity of the statement of the proportion of alcohol in the defendant's blood was put in doubt?"

It is not surprising that the Divisional Court were disturbed by this decision of the justices. The findings of fact based on the one hand on the prosecution evidence and on the other on the defence evidence, appear to be quite irreconcilable. For example, the finding of a positive roadside breath test, the erratic driving, the opinion of all the police that the defendant was drunk, and the expert evidence showing a consumption of $5\frac{1}{2}$ to $6\frac{1}{2}$ pints of beer; contrasted with a finding that the defendant had only drunk $1\frac{1}{2}$ pints of beer. The prosecution did not however attack the decision of the magistrates upon the ground of perversity but upon the ground that the defence evidence was inadmissible to challenge the accuracy of the analysis of the specimen of breath. In upholding this submission Watkins L.J. said [1985] R.T.R. 244, 249-250:

“With great respect to Mr. Halbert, who has stoutly endeavoured to support the justices in the manner in which they permitted this case to be conducted, I perceive very considerable danger arising from a failure to recognise that a device of this kind, which is properly approved, can only be shown to be defective by evidence which goes directly to the defective nature of the instrument itself. Proof of defect cannot be produced by means of an inference drawn from such facts as I have been describing. True it is, of course, that it may be difficult for a defendant to produce evidence of an acceptable kind, the more so when he is denied access to the record of maintenance of the machine on which a defendant has taken a test. However, nowadays a defendant is otherwise not left without a defence for he is enabled to have a blood or a urine test immediately following a test upon such a machine as a Lion Intoximeter 3000. My answer therefore to the question asked by the justices in this case is that the validity and accuracy of the printout from the Lion Intoximeter 3000 cannot be challenged by reason of (1) evidence of the amount of alcohol consumed prior to arrest, (2) a defendant’s appearance before arrest (3) the fact that the test taken on an Alcotest (R) 80 just before release from a police station is negative, that (4) a defendant apparently was, according to witnesses, sober within a few hours of the test on the Lion Intoximeter 3000 and (5) the kind of expert evidence given in this case. As I have indicated, the only way in which the effectiveness of the Lion Intoximeter 3000 could have been attacked here was by direct evidence of imperfection. As to the second of the questions, namely, on the facts as found in the instant case was the court entitled to conclude that the validity of the statement of the proportion of alcohol in the defendant’s blood was put in doubt, it must follow, from what I have already said, that the answer to that is the validity of the printout could not be put in doubt in the manner in which the justices sought to do. Accordingly I would allow this appeal and remit this case to the justices with a direction to convict.”

Shortly thereafter the Divisional Court again reconsidered the same question in Price v. Nicholls [1986] R.T.R. 155. The facts were that the defendant was arrested after a positive roadside breath test. At the police station he provided:

“specimens of breath for analysis by a Lion Intoximeter 3000 device. The printout revealed that self-calibration was properly achieved and readings of 170 and 171 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath were recorded. He was tried on a charge of driving contrary to section 6(1)(a) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 as substituted. The defendant gave evidence that he had had a course of treatment for alcohol addiction two years previously, that he had

3 W.L.R.

Cracknell v. Willis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Griffiths

A not taken alcohol for some months and that, before driving, he had consumed three glasses of barley wine and a glass of wine in the course of 3½ hours. He adduced a letter from the Home Office Forensic Science Laboratory that that amount of drink would have been likely to result in a breath-alcohol level below the prescribed limit and that the printout readings would require minimum rapid consumption of three-quarters of a bottle of spirits or equivalent.

B The justices, in view of the defendant's evidence and the letter, were not satisfied that he had more than the prescribed limit of alcohol in his breath, rejected the printout evidence and dismissed the information."

The Divisional Court allowed the prosecutor's appeal, relying both upon Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244 and upon the wording of section 10(2). Watkins L.J. said, at pp. 160-161:

C "Mr. Curran, never lacking in courage has endeavoured in effect to cause this court to reconsider its decision in Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244. He very stoutly maintains that there are good reasons why we should not follow that decision. Broadly speaking, he contends that the evidence which comes from the Lion Intoximeter 3000 in the form of a printout is merely evidence which is capable of being rebutted by evidence from a defendant of the amount of drink which he had taken, the more so if his account of the matter is supported by other persons or by some such information as is contained, for example, in the letter from the forensic scientist to whom I have already referred. It is evidence which the court is enjoined, he reminds us, to take account of by section 10 of the Act of 1972, as amended. It is not bound to accept the evidence of the printout, it merely takes account of it as it takes account of any other admissible form of evidence which comes before it. There is, in my view, an obvious flaw in that argument. Parliament has not simply enjoined a court to take account of that evidence, it has gone further and stated that 'it shall be assumed that the proportion of alcohol in the accused's breath . . . at the time of the alleged offence was not less than in the specimen.' So there is a direct assumption to be made by the court that the specimen shall be the indication of the amount of alcohol which was on the breath of the defendant at the time when he was driving.

G "However, the highest hurdle in the way of Mr. Curran is the decision in Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244. It is abundantly clear that the attempt being made in this case, as was made in Hughes v. McConnell, is to take this court and courts below back to former days when there were long drawn out battles between on the one hand the prosecutor and on the other the defence as to the amount of drink taken by a defendant as compared with an analysis, usually produced as a result of the taking of a sample of urine. Parliament has by the legislation of more recent times set its face against contests of that kind and has, in my estimation, clearly indicated that when a device of the nature of the Lion Intoximeter 3000 shows on its face that its self-calibrating exercise has properly been gone through and has produced readings of the amount of alcohol in the breath those readings, unless there is direct evidence of some malfunction in the machine itself, are to be regarded as conclusive of the amount of alcohol on a defendant's breath at the relevant time. For those reasons, I would allow this appeal and send this case back to the justices for them to convict the defendant."

In Lucking v. Forbes [1986] R.T.R. 97 the facts were as follows:

"The defendant, a motorist, provided two breath specimens in compliance with a requirement under section 8(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 as substituted. They were analysed by a Lion Intoximeter 3000 device and the printout revealed breath-alcohol of 54 and 58 microgrammes in 100 millilitres. Some 10 minutes thereafter he was charged with driving after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his breath exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to section 6(1). He accepted a proffered opportunity to provide a blood sample for analysis, it was taken some 80 minutes after he had been charged and one half was given to him. At the hearing of the information the prosecutor produced the printout and a statement by a forensic scientist that the analysis of the defendant's blood found it to contain not less than 87 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood. The defendant adduced the evidence of an analytical chemist who used a chromatograph to analyse the defendant's part sample of blood for four readings, which varied between 79.17 to not more than 81.2 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood. The defendant challenged the accuracy of the Lion Intoximeter 3000 device's breath analysis. The justices were of opinion that, since they could not reconcile the various readings of the printout and the blood analyses in the light of the evidence of the analytical chemist called by the defendant, the reliability of the device was impugned and they dismissed the information."

On appeal by the prosecutor, on the question whether the justices could have found the defendant not guilty of driving after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his breath exceeded the prescribed limit, the Divisional Court upheld the finding of the justices upon the ground that the defence was entitled to impugn the Lion Intoximeter 3000 by reference to a blood or urine test carried out immediately. In giving judgment Lloyd L.J. took into account a Home Office circular (No. 32/84) which had advised the police that during the introductory period of operation of the Lion Intoximeter they should offer a motorist the option of giving a blood or urine sample even though the reading exceeded the figure of 50 microgrammes per 100 millilitres of breath. It will be remembered that if there is a reading between 35 and 50 microgrammes the police are under a statutory obligation to offer a blood or urine specimen and, if accepted, this replaces the breath specimen: section 8(6). The material part of the circular (paragraph 6) reads as follows:

"It is expected that in these cases the prosecution will proceed on the basis of the breath test printout as happens at present in cases over 50 microgrammes. The difference will be that the defendant will have available to him the certificate of analysis of the blood/urine sample and he will be free to apply to introduce this as evidence at his trial if he wishes to do so. The police have been advised that where this option is exercised a decision as to whether

A to proceed with prosecution should take account of the results of both tests. . . .”

B In McGrath v. Field, The Times, 20 November 1986, the Divisional Court held that a failure by the police to provide a defendant with this non-statutory option to provide a blood or urine sample, did not prevent the justices relying upon a breath specimen when the reading was over 50 microgrammes.

C My Lords, I share the dismay of Watkins L.J. at the prospect of putting the clock back to the days when every drink and driving charge turned upon voluminous conflicting evidence as to the activities and alcoholic consumption of the defendant before he was stopped by the police and as to his condition after arrest. But I have the greatest difficulty in seeing any indication in the statutory provisions that point to only one type of evidence being admissible to challenge the reliability of the breath testing device used in a particular case. As matters now stand in the light of the decision of the Divisional Court only “direct” evidence of the malfunction of the machine is admissible—although as the Divisional Court has pointed out such evidence will rarely be available to a motorist. However, a specimen of urine or blood which indicates a lower level of alcohol than the reading in the breath testing machine is treated as “direct” evidence. It is not of course “direct” evidence of malfunction but merely evidence from which it is reasonable to draw the inference that the machine is not working properly. Whether or not the motorist has such evidence available to him will in any case when the reading is over 50 milligrammes depend upon whether or not the police chose to offer him the opportunity of providing a blood or urine specimen.

E I am unable to agree with the Divisional Court that the wording of section 10(2) gives any support for the view that Parliament intended any challenge to the reliability of a device to be limited to a particular type of evidence. The assumption in section 10(2) is not an assumption that the device is working correctly but an assumption that the proportion of alcohol in the relevant specimen was not less than the proportion of alcohol at the time of the offence. The specimen may be breath, urine or blood. Before making the “assumption” for the purposes of section 10(2) the magistrate will have to be satisfied, in the case of a urine or blood specimen, that they can rely upon the analysis of the specimen, and they may have to choose between the analysis supplied by the prosecution, and that supplied by the defence. In such a case they obviously cannot “assume” that the prosecution specimen is the reliable one because such an assumption would render nugatory the statutory requirement that the motorist should be provided with half the specimen so that he can have his own analysis carried out. In the case of a breath specimen there is of course a presumption that the machine is reliable but if that presumption is challenged by relevant evidence the magistrates will have to be satisfied that the machine has provided a reading upon which they can rely before making the “assumption.”

H We all know that no machine is infallible and, if despite this knowledge Parliament had intended that breath testing devices should be treated as virtually infallible I would have expected such an intention to be expressed in clear and direct language. I say virtually infallible because that is the effect of limiting a challenge to “direct evidence of malfunction” which the motorist cannot, in practice, obtain, or a blood or urine test which the police are entitled to refuse unless the reading is below 50 microgrammes. Nowhere in the legislation can I find any indication that Parliament intended such a result.

Suppose that a teetotaler after dining with people of the highest repute, two bishops if you will, forgets to turn on his lights and is stopped by the police. He is asked to take a roadside breath test and indignantly but inadvisedly refuses. He is arrested and taken to the police station. There he thinks better of his refusal. He agrees to supply two specimens of breath and the machine to his astonishment shows very high readings. He asks to be allowed to prove the machine wrong by supplying a blood or urine specimen. The police agree and he gives a blood specimen. An analysis shows no alcohol in the specimen. It is virtually certain that the police would accept the analysis and he would not be prosecuted. But if he were prosecuted it is equally certain that the magistrates would prefer the analysis and he would be acquitted. But now suppose that the police refused his request to supply a blood or urine specimen because the reading on the machine was over 50 microgrammes. Is he to be convicted without the opportunity of calling the two bishops as witnesses to the fact that he had drunk nothing that evening and inviting the magistrates to draw the inference that the machine must have been unreliable? If he can invite the magistrates to draw such an inference from the work of the analyst, why should he not invite them to draw the inference from the word of the bishops?

In my view it would require the clearest possible wording to show that Parliament intended such an unjust result. If Parliament wishes to provide that either there is to be an irrebuttable presumption that the breath testing machine is reliable or that the presumption can only be challenged by a particular type of evidence then Parliament must take the responsibility of so deciding and spell out its intention in clear language.

Until then I would hold that evidence which, if believed, provides material from which the inference can reasonably be drawn that the machine was unreliable is admissible. I am myself hopeful that the good sense of the magistrates and the realisation by the motoring public that approved breath testing machines are proving reliable will combine to ensure that few defendants will seek to challenge a breath analysis by spurious evidence of their consumption of alcohol. The magistrates will remember that the presumption of law is that the machine is reliable and they will no doubt look with a critical eye on evidence such as was produced by Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244 before being persuaded that it is not safe to rely upon the reading that it produces.

My Lords for these reasons I feel compelled to hold that Hughes v. McConnell and Price v. Nicholls [1986] R.T.R. 155 were wrongly decided, they should not have been followed in the present case, and the Divisional Court should have answered the first question in the negative and held that the magistrates were wrong in refusing to allow the appellant to adduce evidence of the amount of alcohol he had consumed.

However although the magistrates erred in refusing to admit this evidence, it provides no ground for quashing the appellant's conviction for refusing, without reasonable excuse, to provide a specimen of breath contrary to section 8(7). The fact that a motorist does not believe that he has drunk more than the prescribed limit does not provide a reasonable excuse entitling him to refuse to provide a specimen of

3 W.L.R.

Cracknell v. Willis (H.L.(E.))

Lord Griffiths

A breath. The appellant in the present case himself proved that the machine would provide a reading by blowing into it properly for the first specimen. Thereafter the machine aborted because the appellant did not blow into it properly but allowed his breath to escape from his hands. There was no evidence either given or offered to suggest that this failure was in anyway connected with the amount of alcohol in his
B enough breath for a specimen to be taken. If evidence had been given of the amount of alcohol the appellant had consumed it could have provided no excuse for his behaviour when asked to give the second specimen and his ultimate refusal to give it.

C For these reasons I would allow this appeal to the extent of quashing the appellant's conviction under section 6(1)(a) of the Act of 1972 but the conviction under section 8(7) must stand.

LORD OLIVER OF AYLMEYTON. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Griffiths. I agree that, for the reasons which he has given, the appeal should be allowed to the extent which he has indicated.

D LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY. My Lords, I add a few words to the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Griffiths, if only because E your Lordships' House is deciding, in my opinion rightly, to overrule a decision, Duddy v Gallagher [1985] R.T.R 401, to which I myself was party and indeed in which I delivered the leading judgment of the court. The question in that case was whether the defendant, having provided
F one specimen of breath which showed a reading over the prescribed limit but having failed to provide a second specimen, could be convicted not only of an offence under section 8(7) of the Act of failing without reasonable excuse to provide a specimen of breath, but also of an offence under section 6(1) of having driven a motor vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion of alcohol in his breath exceeded the prescribed limit. The Divisional
G Court held that the defendant could properly be convicted of both offences. Section 10(2) of the Act provides that "evidence of the proportion of alcohol . . . in a specimen of breath . . . provided by the accused shall, in all cases, be taken into account . . ." Such a specimen must have been provided pursuant to the provisions of the Act: see Howard v. Hallett [1984] R.T.R 353. We were satisfied that the first specimen of breath had been provided pursuant to the provisions of the Act; and further that, since two specimens of breath had not been provided, no question arose of disregarding the specimen with the higher proportion of alcohol in it as required in such circumstances by section 8(6). However, I have now been persuaded by Mr. Knight that this approach involves too narrow a construction of the Act. I accept his submission that the broad intention of the Act is that evidence of a H specimen of breath shall only be given where two specimens of breath have been provided and the one with the higher proportion of alcohol has been disregarded, it being sufficient where the defendant has without reasonable excuse failed to provide more than one specimen that he should be convicted of the offence under section 8(7).

On the second and more fundamental question in the case, I too can see no escape from the conclusion reached by my noble and learned friend Lord Griffiths. The crucial provision in the Act, as I see it, is section 10(2), to which I have already referred. The opening sentence provides that:

“Evidence of the proportion of alcohol or any drug in a specimen of breath, blood or urine provided by the accused shall, in all cases, be taken into account, and it shall be assumed that the proportion of alcohol in the accused’s breath, blood or urine at the time of the alleged offence was not less than in the specimen; . . .”

The function of that provision, as I see it, is that, where a specimen has been taken in accordance with the provision of the Act, evidence of such a specimen (given in accordance with the provisions of the Act) shall be admissible in evidence, and furthermore shall be evidence not only of the proportion of alcohol in the defendant’s breath, blood or urine (as the case may be) at the time when such specimen was taken, but also of such proportion at the time when the defendant was driving, attempting to drive or in charge of a motor vehicle. That of course is why the statutory assumption is required to be made; and that is also why the exception relating to the so called “hip-flask” defence is here relevant. Such evidence, being so admissible, has, if tendered, to be considered by the court in all cases under section 5 or section 6 of the Act; it has, as the statute provides, to be “taken into account.” But it is one thing for evidence to have to be taken into account, and it is another thing for such evidence to be conclusive. For a court may take evidence into account, and yet reject it as unreliable. This may plainly occur in cases under the statute where the defendant has provided a specimen of blood or urine. In such cases, it is expressly provided by section 10(6) that one part of the specimen shall be provided to the defendant. This must be to enable him to obtain an independent analysis of his part of the specimen, thereby avoiding any possibility of a conviction on the basis of a mistaken analysis presented in evidence by the prosecution. But if conflicting analyses are in such a case put in evidence before the court, the court has to decide whether to reject that presented by the prosecution; and if it does so, then, although it will have complied with its duty under section 10(2) to take such evidence into account, it will also have acted properly in rejecting it.

It must follow that, since section 10(2) provides equally for evidence relating to specimens of breath, blood or urine, evidence relating to a specimen of breath may likewise be rejected if the court comes to the conclusion that the print-out from the particular machine is unreliable. I have considered carefully whether any distinction can properly be drawn between specimens of breath on the one hand, and specimens of blood or urine on the other, having regard to the many safeguards built into the Act in relation to specimens of breath. These safeguards are as follows. First, specimens of breath have to be analysed by means of a machine. Second, such a machine has to be a device of a type approved by the Secretary of State. Third, as is well known, the relevant approved device has built into it a mechanism by which it tests itself, and prints out the results of such a test on the statement automatically produced by it, each time it analyses a person’s specimen of breath. Fourth, a requirement to provide a specimen of breath can only be made at a police station. Fifth, two specimens have to be given, and that with the higher reading has to be disregarded. Sixth, if the specimen with the lower reading contains less than a specified quantity of alcohol, the defendant may ask that it be replaced with a specimen of

of Chieveley

A blood or urine, in which event, if he provides such a specimen, no specimen of breath shall be used. This is a formidable list of protections for the motorist. Having so provided, it was open to Parliament to consider whether a specimen of breath so provided should constitute conclusive evidence of the quantity of alcohol in the defendant's breath at the time of driving, attempting to drive or being in charge of a motor vehicle, or whether it should be conclusive subject only to certain specified limited defences (such as the "hip-flask" defence), possibly coupled with the safeguard that the motorist should in every case be given the opportunity of providing a specimen of blood or urine in substitution for his specimen of breath. Parliament might have decided so to provide on the ground that the public interest in securing convictions in the case of an offence which is known to cause so much suffering to other citizens was so great that a defence founded, for example, on an allegation that the defendant had drunk so little that the print out from the particular device could not be accepted as reliable, should not be permitted. But in my opinion, on a true construction of the present Act, no such provision has been enacted. It has been enacted only that evidence of the proportion of alcohol in a specimen of breath taken in accordance with the statute shall be taken into account; and the exception to the statutory assumption relating to the "hip-flask" defence is not expressed to be the only defence and is only here referred to because it relates to drinking during the period between driving, attempting to drive or being in charge of a motor vehicle and providing the specimen, and is concerned to place the burden of proof upon the defendant who raises the "hip-flask" defence. Once it is accepted, as in my opinion it must be, that evidence of the proportion of alcohol in a specimen of breath, blood or urine is not conclusive but can be rejected by the court as unreliable, I can, like my noble and learned friend, see no basis in the statute for limiting the ground on which the court may reject the evidence as unreliable in the manner decided by the Divisional Court in Hughes v. McConnell [1985] R.T.R. 244. Take the following example. Suppose that a specimen of breath is provided by the defendant which is shown by the printout to contain just over 50 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath. The defendant asks that it should be replaced by a specimen of blood or urine. He has no right to this under section 8(6) of the Act. The police officer, however, causes a urine specimen to be taken and provides the defendant with part of the specimen. The defendant has his part of the urine specimen analysed; the analysis shows that he was not over the limit.
Under the Act, evidence of the proportion of alcohol in the specimen of breath is nevertheless admissible. Like my noble and learned friend Lord Griffiths, I find it difficult to believe that, upon the defendant tendering in evidence the analysis of his part of the urine specimen, it should not be open to the magistrates to reject the printout relating to the specimen of breath as unreliable.

H I fear that I do not share the optimism of my noble and learned friend that motorists will desist from seeking to persuade magistrates to reject evidence from printouts as unreliable on the ground that they have drunk so little that the reading cannot be right. It is notorious that there is an industry devoted to assisting motorists in defeating charges brought under section 6 of the Act; and once the decision in the present case is reported, attention will rapidly be drawn to this new possibility. Furthermore, the consequences of a conviction can be so serious for many motorists that there is a great temptation to grasp at any straw which may assist them in their defence. I have little doubt that the point will be taken time and time again. I place greater faith in the good sense of magistrates who, with their attention drawn to the safeguards for defendants built into the Act to which I have referred earlier in this opinion, will no doubt give proper scrutiny to such defences, and will be fully aware of the strength of the evidence provided by a printout, taken from an approved device, of a specimen of breath provided in accordance with the statutory procedure. Even so, I anticipate that the responsible authorities will be keeping the situation arising from the decision of your Lordships' House under very careful review, in order to consider whether the provisions of the Act require to be strengthened in the public interest.

Negligence—Foreseeability of risk—Nervous shock—Plaintiff's home set on fire by negligence of central heating installers—Plaintiff suffering psychiatric illness due to witnessing fire—No physical injury to plaintiff or other persons—Damage to property only—Whether plaintiff entitled to damages for nervous shock

The plaintiff engaged the defendants to instal central heating in her home. In the course of the installation the defendants' employees negligently caused a fire which extensively damaged the home and its contents. The defendants admitted liability and settled the plaintiff's claim for damage to the home and its contents. The plaintiff subsequently brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for nervous shock alleging that she had suffered a psychiatric illness as a result of witnessing the fire. The parties agreed that the question whether the plaintiff could recover damages should be determined as a preliminary issue on assumed facts to save costs. The judge held that damages for nervous shock could only be recovered if consequent upon physical injury, that therefore it was not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff might suffer psychiatric illness as a result of the defendants' negligence in starting the fire and he dismissed the plaintiff's claim.

On appeal by the plaintiff:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that a plaintiff who suffered psychiatric illness caused by witnessing damage to her property rather than personal injury to another person could recover damages for nervous shock if she could prove causation and reasonable foreseeability; that those were issues of fact which should be determined on full and proven facts rather than assumed facts; and that, in the circumstances, the matter should proceed to trial (post, pp. 1104H—1105C, 1106A–D, 1109D–G, 1112B–D, H—1113B, D–E).

APPEAL from Sir Douglas Frank Q.C. sitting as a deputy judge of the Queen's Bench Division.

By a writ dated 18 May 1984 the plaintiff, Madiha Attia, claimed against the defendants, British Gas Plc., damages for nervous shock suffered as a result of witnessing a fire in her home which was caused by the defendants' negligence while installing central heating there. The parties agreed that the matter should proceed by way of preliminary issue raising the question:

"Can the plaintiff recover damages for nervous shock caused by witnessing her home and possessions damaged and/or destroyed by a fire caused by the defendants' negligence while installing central heating in the plaintiff's home?" C

On 19 December 1986 the judge gave judgment in the defendants' favour by answering the question in the negative.

By a notice of appeal dated 11 February 1987 the plaintiff appealed on the grounds that (1) the judge had misdirected himself in posing the question "was it readily foreseeable by the defendants that the ordinary householder exposed to the experience undergone by the plaintiff might break down under the shock of the event and suffer psychiatric illness as opposed to grief and sorrow at losing one's home?" The question ought to have been was it reasonably foreseeable and not readily foreseeable; (2) the judge was wrong to hold, if he did so hold, that damages for nervous shock could only be recovered if consequent upon physical injury. Nervous shock was itself a form of injury and whether damages were recoverable therefore depended upon the question of whether the defendants ought reasonably to foresee that psychiatric illness to the plaintiff might arise from their acts or omissions; and (3) the judge ought to have held that the defendants ought reasonably to have foreseen that the plaintiff, exposed to the consequences of the fire caused by their admitted fault, might be so affected through her senses that she might suffer psychiatric damage. D E F

The facts are stated in the judgment of Dillon L.J.

David Tucker for the plaintiff. G

Janet Turner for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

26 June. The following judgments were handed down.

DILLON L.J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff in the action against a decision of Sir Douglas Frank Q.C., sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court in the Queen's Bench Division, which was given on 19 December 1986 by way of determination of a preliminary issue in the action. H

As to the facts, in the summer of 1981 the plaintiff, Mrs. Attia, lived (as I apprehend she still does) at 11, Leaver Gardens, Greenford, Middlesex, and the defendants, British Gas Plc., were engaged to instal

3 W.L.R.

Attia v. British Gas Plc. (C.A)

Dillon L.J.

A central heating there. When she was returning home at about 4 p.m. on 1 July 1981 she saw smoke coming from the loft of the house. She telephoned the fire brigade, but by the time the firemen arrived, the whole house was on fire and it took the firemen over four hours to get the fire under control. Obviously the house and its contents were extensively damaged.

B The defendants admit that the fire was caused by their negligence, i.e., by the carelessness of their employees who were working at the house, and we were told that the plaintiff's claims for damage to the house itself and its contents have been settled. In this action the plaintiff's only claim is for a different type of damage, namely, damages for nervous shock; by this is meant that, though she did not suffer any physical injury, the plaintiff, as the result of seeing her home and its contents ablaze, has suffered a psychiatric or mental illness, the effects of which are set out in some detail in her statement of claim.

C The defendants dispute this claim of the plaintiffs, but in order to save costs, especially as the plaintiff has legal aid, the parties agreed, and the master ordered, that the following question should be set down for determination as a preliminary issue, viz:

D "Can the plaintiff recover damages for nervous shock caused by witnessing her home and possessions damaged and/or destroyed by a fire caused by the defendants' negligence while installing central heating in the plaintiff's home?"

E For the purpose of this preliminary issue, the facts alleged in the statement of claim are to be assumed to be true; in particular it is to be assumed that the plaintiff has suffered a psychiatric illness which was caused by the shock of seeing her home and its contents ablaze. Causation does not therefore have to be considered on the preliminary issue, though it will have to be considered at the trial if the preliminary issue is not answered in the negative, as the defendants would wish. The defendants say on the preliminary issue that the plaintiff cannot succeed in this action for either of two reasons, viz: (1) that it was not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff might suffer any psychiatric illness as a result of the defendants' negligence in starting the fire; or (2) that, even if it was reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff might suffer psychiatric illness, damages for "nervous shock" can, as a matter of law and public policy, only be recovered if the shock was caused by the death or injury of a person, or by fear of the death or injury of a person, normally a person closely related to the plaintiff, and cannot be recovered if it was merely caused by injury to property.

G The preliminary issue was raised to test these two contentions of the defendants. The deputy judge decided in favour of the defendants on contention (1) and therefore dismissed the action. The plaintiff now appeals.

H The law as to "nervous shock" has recently been considered very carefully and helpfully by the House of Lords in McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410 and by the High Court of Australia in Jaensch v. Coffey (1984) 58 A.L.J.R. 426. In McLoughlin v. O'Brian Lord Bridge said, at p. 431:

"The common law gives no damages for the emotional distress which any normal person experiences when someone he loves is killed or injured. Anxiety and depression are normal human emotions. Yet an anxiety neurosis or a reactive depression may be recognisable psychiatric illnesses, with or without psychosomatic symptoms. So, the first hurdle which a plaintiff claiming damages of the kind in question must surmount is to establish that he is suffering, not merely grief, distress or any other normal emotion, but a positive psychiatric illness.”

The plaintiff accepts this statement of the law, and accordingly it is claimed that what she has suffered, as described in the statement of claim, amounts to a positive psychiatric illness. Where exactly the line is to be drawn between possibly extravagant grief, distress or other normal emotion and a positive psychiatric illness, may perhaps be difficult to discern in what may, for all I know, be a matter of degree; but that is a matter for the trial and does not arise on the preliminary issue.

In the next place it is to be assumed that the plaintiff is of a normal disposition or toughness, possessing, as it has been put in the cases, “the customary phlegm”. Whatever the position may be at the trial, on this preliminary issue we are not concerned with the possibility of it being shown that she has suffered psychiatric illness because, though the defendants did not know and she herself may not have known, she was particularly or “abnormally” susceptible to some form of psychiatric illness.

A third point which emerges from the cases cited is that damage for “nervous shock,” i.e., for psychiatric illness occasioned by shock, is regarded as a separate head of damage, distinct, for example, from damage for personal injury. The law has developed step by step and is still developing. In those circumstances I would be particularly reluctant to lay down any general rule as to the conditions in which such damages can or cannot be recovered as a matter of public policy. For that reason the procedure of a preliminary issue on assumed facts, somewhat briefly stated, has disadvantages where what is under consideration is how the law should develop in a matter of some general importance.

That said, however, as appears from the speeches in McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410 and the judgments in the Australian case, Jaensch v. Coffey, 58 A.L.J.R. 426, a great deal of the difficulty which has been felt over the development of the law as to damages for “nervous shock” has arisen in relation to what, in the terminology of the tort of negligence, is described as the question of proximity. How far is it right that the law should allow a claim for damages against a wrongdoer, where the wrong done by the wrongdoer was primarily a wrong done to someone other than the claimant, and the claimant is a person of whom, at the relevant time, the wrongdoer had no knowledge and who may then have been far away from the scene of the wrongdoer's act? This difficulty is particularly concerned with whether the wrongdoer owed any duty of care to the claimant. But that difficulty does not arise in the present case because in the present case there is no problem of proximity. The defendants knew about the plaintiff and unquestionably owed a duty of care to her not to start a fire in her house. If her claims for damage to the house and contents had not been settled, she would have brought the one action against the defendants in which she would have pleaded the negligence of the defendants in starting the fire and would have gone on to assert that, by reason thereof, she had suffered and was suffering damage and loss, which would be put under two headings, viz. (1) damage to the house and contents; and (2) damage for nervous shock. The issues at the trial, assuming the facts pleaded,

3 W.L.R.

Attia v. British Gas Plc. (C.A.)

Dillon L.J.

A including the psychiatric illness, were proved, would have been (a) causation and (b) foreseeability of the damage as a question of remoteness. I can see no good reason why, in such a context, the law should have refused to allow her damages for "nervous shock" if she could get over the hurdles of causation and foreseeability as an aspect of remoteness. It cannot make any difference that in the event her claim for damage to the house and contents has been settled; the duty was B nonetheless there.

I am not therefore prepared to hold that the fact that the shock which caused the plaintiff's assumed psychiatric illness was caused by damage to property must preclude her from recovering damages for "nervous shock" even if it was reasonably foreseeable that she might suffer psychiatric illness as a consequence of the defendants' negligence
C in causing the fire in her house.

Are the defendants right, then, in asserting a priori that it was not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff might suffer any psychiatric illness as a result of their negligence in starting the fire? It is not necessary that any particular psychiatric illness should have been foreseen.

D Whether it was reasonably foreseeable to the reasonable man—whether a reasonable onlooker, or, in the context of the present case, a reasonable gas fitter employed by the defendants to work in the plaintiff's house—is to be decided, not on the evidence of psychiatrists as to the degree of probability that the particular cause would produce the particular effect in a person of normal disposition or customary phlegm, but by the judge, relying on his own opinion of the operation of cause and effect in psychiatric medicine, treating himself as the E reasonable man, and forming his own view from the primary facts as to whether the chain of cause and effect was reasonably foreseeable: see per Lord Bridge in McLoughlin [1983] 1 A.C. 410, 432C–D. The good sense of the judge is, it would seem, to be enlightened by progressive awareness of mental illness: per Lord Bridge at p. 443D. One consequence of this approach is, however, that the view of the courts as to what is F reasonably foreseeable is, in this field, likely to lag behind informed medical opinion. Another consequence is that a view which finds favour with the courts at one time may well be considered unacceptable and out of date a few years later—when progressive awareness has progressed further.

The question which the deputy judge asked himself in the present case was whether it was readily foreseeable by the defendants that the ordinary householder exposed to the experience undergone by the plaintiff might break down under the shock of the event and suffer psychiatric illness as opposed to grief and sorrow at losing one's home.
If "reasonably" is substituted for "readily"—as the judge probably intended—I would for my part endorse that as a correct direction. It is not however a test of probability, as opposed to possibility.

H Was the damage, in the way of psychiatric illness from shock, though of a different kind from the damage to the house itself and contents most obviously foreseeable, nonetheless itself foreseeable? Would the reasonable man, endowed with appropriately progressive awareness of mental illness, have regarded the danger of psychiatric illness from shock as so fantastic or far-fetched that he would have paid no attention to it or would he have thought that it was something that the plaintiff might suffer from seeing her house and its contents in flames?

That, if the house caught fire from the defendants' workmen's fault, the plaintiff would see and hear it burning was foreseeable. But how much she saw and heard, and how extensive was the damage to or destruction of the house and contents by the fire we are left to guess at on this preliminary issue. We are asked to say, in effect, that psychiatric illness caused by the shock can never, as a matter of fact rather than law, be a foreseeable consequence when a woman sees her home and its contents burning down. I am not prepared to make any such general a priori ruling on such scanty material. Whether the plaintiff's assumed illness caused by the shock was or was not a foreseeable consequence of the defendants' negligence must depend on the actual evidence given at the trial.

Accordingly I would allow this appeal, set aside the order of the deputy judge and leave this action to proceed to trial.

It follows that the attempt to decide this action on a preliminary issue has, in my judgment, failed. But in view of the expense and delays of litigation at the present time and of the difficult position of a defendant who is not legally aided when sued by a legally aided plaintiff, I would not for my part criticise the parties' advisers at all for making the attempt.

WOOLF L.J. There have now been a series of decisions by courts of the highest authority both in this country and in the Commonwealth dealing with the problems created by actions for damages where the plaintiff is seeking to recover compensation for psychiatric illness due to what has been colloquially called "nervous shock." On this appeal counsel on both sides relied on two of these decisions, namely, a decision of the House of Lords in McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410 and the decision of the High Court of Australia in Jaensch v. Coffey (1984) 58 A.L.J.R. 426. However, the circumstances giving rise to the preliminary issue with which this appeal is concerned differ from the circumstances of those two decisions in two significant respects.

The first difference is that in those two decisions the plaintiff was contending that she suffered her injuries because she had learnt that members of her family had been involved in a serious accident as a result of which they had either been killed or seriously injured while in this case no one had suffered any personal injury. The plaintiff alleges that her injury was caused in consequence of her seeing her home, of which she was proud, on fire, a fire which continued to burn for over four hours before the fire was brought under control by the fire brigade.

The second difference is that in both of the earlier decisions the plaintiff had not witnessed the accident which caused the injuries to their respective family and the judgments therefore focused on the question as to whether the plaintiffs were owed a duty of care by the defendants, it being contended by both defendants that it could not be foreseen that their acts could injure the plaintiffs. However, in this case undoubtedly the defendants owed a duty of care to the plaintiff in respect of the damage which was caused to her home and indeed she has been compensated for this damage. Furthermore, if the plaintiff, who entered the house to telephone the fire brigade had been physically injured, as could have happened, then in relation to that physical injury the defendants would have owed her a duty of care and she would be entitled to be compensated by them for that injury. The problem raised by the preliminary issue is therefore as to whether the damage actually Woolf L.J.

A alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff is too remote and is not as to whether there was a breach of a duty of care. The distinction between the two situations was discussed in eloquent terms by Denning L.J. in King v. Phillips [1953] 1 Q.B. 429, 439–440:

B “What is the reasoning which admits a cause of action for negligence if the injured person is actually struck, but declines it if he only suffers from shock? I cannot see why the duty of a driver should differ according to the nature of the injury. I should have thought that every driver was under a plain duty which he owed to everyone in the vicinity. He ought to drive with reasonable care. If he drives negligently with the result that a bystander is injured, then his breach of duty is the same, no matter whether the injury is a wound or is emotional shock. Only the damage is different. The bystander may be so close as to be put in fear for himself, or he may be just a little way off and be shocked by fear for the safety of others. In either case he has been injured by the driver’s negligence. If you view the duty of care in this way, and yet refuse to allow a bystander to recover from shock, it is not because there was no duty owed to him, nor because it was not caused by the negligence of the driver, but simply because it was too remote to be admitted as a head of damage.

D “A different result is reached by viewing the driver’s duty differently. Instead of saying simply that his duty is to drive with reasonable care, you say that his duty is to avoid injury which he can reasonably foresee, or, rather, to use reasonable care to avoid it. Then you draw a distinction between physical injury and emotional injury, and impose a different duty on him in regard to each kind of injury, with the inevitable result that you are driven to say there are two different torts—one tort when he can foresee physical injury, and another tort when he can foresee emotional injury. I do not think that that is right. There is one wrong only, the wrong of negligence. I know that damage to person and damage to property are for historical reasons regarded as different torts; but that does not apply to physical injury and emotional injury. Lord Wright clearly treated impact and shock as one cause of action when he said in Bourhill v. Young [1943] A.C. 92: ‘The man who negligently allows a horse to bolt, or a car to run at large down a steep street, or a savage beast to escape is committing a breach of duty towards every person who comes within the reach of foreseeable danger, whether by impact or shock.’

G “The true principle, as I see it, is this: Every driver can and should foresee that, if he drives negligently, he may injure somebody in the vicinity in some way or other; and he must be responsible for all the injuries which he does in fact cause by his negligence to anyone in the vicinity, whether they are wounds, or shocks, unless they are too remote in law to be recovered. If he does by his negligence in fact cause injury by shock, then he should be liable for it unless he is exempted on the ground of remoteness.”

H The position must be the same if, instead of causing a traffic accident, what is being considered is causing a fire at someone’s home. Later in the same judgment Denning L.J. went on to say, at p. 441, whether the issue was one of duty of care or remoteness of damage since in Bourhill v. Young [1943] A.C. 92 the test of liability for shock is foreseeability of injury by shock. This dicta was expressly endorsed by Viscount Simonds when giving the judgment of the House of Lords in Overseas Tankship (U.K.) Ltd. v. Morts Dock & Engineering Co. Ltd. (The Wagon Mound) [1961] A.C. 388, 426.

However, notwithstanding the fact that the test both in the case of breach of duty and remoteness is foreseeability, it is helpful to identify the true nature of the problem in considering the two reasons relied upon by the defendants for saying that it is possible on this preliminary issue to decide that the plaintiff cannot succeed in her action. Those reasons being (1) that the defendants could not reasonably foresee that as a result of their being responsible for starting the fire, the plaintiff would suffer psychiatric injury, and, (2) that in any event as a matter of policy the law does not allow damages for psychiatric injury to be recovered in the absence of personal injury either to the plaintiff or a member of her family.

In Jaensch v. Coffey, 58 A.L.J.R. 426 Brennan J. in a judgment in which he helpfully analysed virtually all the authorities on recovering damages for "nervous shock," with regard to the test of foreseeability referred to the present rule in negligence as being that stated by Lord Reid in C. Czarnikow Ltd. v. Koufos [1969] 1 A.C. 350. In that case Lord Reid was considering foreseeability in the context of remoteness of damage. He said, at p. 385:

"The defendant will be liable for any type of damage which is reasonably foreseeable as liable to happen even in the most unusual case, unless the risk is so small that a reasonable man would in the whole circumstances feel justified in neglecting it."

In the same case a similar approach was adopted by Lord Upjohn, who said, at p. 422:

"The test in tort, as now developed in the authorities, is that the tortfeasor is liable for any damage which he can reasonably foresee may happen as a result of the breach however unlikely it may be, unless it can be brushed aside as far fetched."

In deciding the preliminary issue in favour of the defendants Sir Douglas Frank, before whom the issue was argued, as it was before this court, on the basis that it raised a question of duty of care, said:

"It is widely recognised that the burning of one's home can be a frightening experience and give rise to a sense of grief and sorrow at the loss of all that is embodied in the word 'home' and of one's possessions. It can result in great inconvenience and sometimes hardship. Nevertheless the loss of possessions from various causes happens to a large proportion of the population. A burglary can not only result in the loss of valued and irreplaceable possessions but to some people it is a traumatic and frightening experience. Nevertheless, in my judgment the ordinary householder endures such incidents and the shock of them without suffering mental illness. I think that the same applies to nervous shock caused by a fire, albeit in one's own house, unless the fire caused injury which in turn triggered off the nervous shock. That is where I would draw the line. In my judgment, therefore, it was not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff would suffer mental illness as a result of the defendants' negligence and this action fails."

3 W.L.R.

Attia v. British Gas Plc. (C.A.)

Woollf L.J.

A Especially if the question of foreseeability is approached in the manner indicated by Lord Reid, as I consider it should be, the judge was not entitled to come to this conclusion. I can conceive of circumstances where it would be readily foreseeable that intense distress would be caused to an "ordinary householder" who saw her home being destroyed by fire particularly if the process was as protracted as it appears to have been on the basis of the facts set out in the statement of claim which for the purpose of the determination of the issue have to be assumed to be true. Such distress could well be of the order of the "acute emotional trauma" which "like a physical trauma can well cause a psychiatric illness in a wide range of circumstances and in a wide range of individuals" as indicated by Lord Bridge in McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410, 433D.

C It appears from the passage which I have quoted that the judge came to his decision in favour of the defendants not only on the basis of foreseeability but also as a matter of policy in accordance with the second ground relied upon by the defendants. With regard to this part of Sir Douglas Frank's judgment, differing views were taken by the members of the House of Lords in McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410 and by the members of the High Court of Australia in Jaensch v. Coffey, 58 A.L.J.R. 426 as to whether, if the injury was foreseeable, liability could be excluded as a matter of policy. Fortunately, for the purposes of this appeal I do not consider that it is necessary to resolve this divergence of opinion. Even assuming that the test is not confined to being one of foreseeability, I cannot conceive that, if the injury which the plaintiff alleges that she suffered was a foreseeable consequence of the defendants' negligence, there could be any overriding policy reason for preventing her recovering damages. As I have already pointed out, she could well have sustained physical injuries as well as the psychiatric injuries of which she complains when she would have been entitled to damages and in my view there can be no reason of policy for distinguishing between the two types of injury.

F In agreement therefore with the judgments of Dillon and Bingham L.JJ., which I have had the advantage of seeing in draft, I would allow this appeal. I would also not determine finally the preliminary issue in favour of the plaintiff on the facts before this court. Like Dillon and Bingham L.JJ., I consider that it is preferable that an issue of this sort should only be determined after the court has had an opportunity of exploring all the relevant facts as to liability. The statement of claim which contains the only facts before this court only indicates in outline the circumstances in which the plaintiff sustained her injuries. While the facts which are before this court do not disclose a situation where as a matter of law the plaintiff cannot succeed, whether she is entitled to succeed should only be finally determined after a trial.

H BINGHAM L.J. The plaintiff's claim pleaded in this action is a simple one. She alleges that the defendants were installing central heating in her house and that a fire occurred as a result of the defendants' negligent work. This the defendants admit. The plaintiff further pleads that she returned home to see smoke coming from the loft of the house and then witnessed the burning of the house for over four hours until the fire was brought under control. This experience, she alleges, caused her "nervous shock in the form of a serious psychological reaction evidenced by an anxiety state and depression."

Her claim is accordingly one for what have in the authorities and the literature been called damages for nervous shock. Judges have in recent years become increasingly restive at the use of this misleading and inaccurate expression, and I shall use the general expression "psychiatric damage," intending to comprehend within it all relevant forms of mental illness, neurosis and personality change. But the train of events (all of which must be causally related) with which this action, like its predecessors, is concerned remains unchanged: careless conduct on the part of the defendant causing actual or apprehended injury to the plaintiff or a person other than the defendant; the suffering of acute mental or emotional trauma by the plaintiff on witnessing or apprehending that injury or witnessing its aftermath; psychiatric damage suffered by the plaintiff.

There is, however, one respect in which this case differs from all the decided cases; or almost all: Owens v. Liverpool Corporation [1939] 1 K.B. 394 would appear to be an exception. Although the plaintiff suffered injury in that her home and presumably her possessions were burned and damaged, it is not said that she was at any time in fear for her own personal safety or that of anyone else, nor is it said that physical injury (as opposed to the psychiatric damage of which she complains) was suffered by anyone. It was no doubt this singular feature of the case which led the parties to agree to the trial of a preliminary issue:

"Can the plaintiff recover damages for nervous shock caused by witnessing her home and possessions damaged and/or destroyed by a fire caused by the defendants' negligence while installing central heating in the plaintiff's home?"

The parties are not to be criticised for adopting a procedure which they conscientiously believed would save costs and time. But it would, I think, have been better if the action had proceeded to trial, at any rate on liability, perhaps leaving the assessing of damages, if any, to a later date. For I think that there are, within the issue set down for trial, two distinct questions. One is a question of far-reaching legal principle: is a claim for damages for psychiatric damage suffered by one who has witnessed the destruction of her property, in the absence of any actual or apprehended physical injury, one that must necessarily fail as a matter of law? In the light of such illustrious precedents as Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562 and Dorset Yacht Co. Ltd. v. Home Office [1970] A.C. 1004, questions such as this cannot be regarded as unsuitable for determination on, in effect, demurrer. But there is in this case a special feature to which I shall return, namely, a pre-existing relationship between the defendants as contractors and the plaintiff as occupant of a house in which they were working. I would be happier deciding even this legal question against a background of full and proven, rather than outline and assumed, facts. The second question is much more limited. It is whether on the facts pleaded it was reasonably foreseeable by the defendants that careless performance of their work might cause psychiatric damage to the plaintiff. This is a question of fact which, for reasons I shall give, cannot in my view be fairly decided at this stage.

The question of principle

As Lord Russell of Killowen pointed out in Bourhill v. Young [1943] A.C. 92, 101, what the defendant ought to have contemplated as a

3 W.L.R.

Attia v. British Gas Plc. (C.A.)

Bingham L.J.

A reasonable man is relevant both to testing the existence of a duty as the foundation of alleged negligence and to the question of remoteness of damage. The leading cases on psychiatric damage have very largely concentrated on examining what was reasonably foreseeable by the defendant in order to determine whether the careless defendant owed a duty of care to the particular plaintiff at all. This is understandable and perhaps inevitable. A defendant, however careless, cannot owe a duty of care towards the whole world. It is accordingly necessary to apply the tests of proximity and foreseeability derived from Lord Atkin's classic statement in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562 in order to define the class to whom the defendant owes a duty and decide whether the plaintiff falls within it. This is a particularly necessary exercise in the psychiatric damage cases, where the defendant will ordinarily have no awareness of the plaintiff as an individual before the act of carelessness occurs. Unless, therefore, it can be shown that the plaintiff is a person who is so closely and directly affected by the defendant's act that he ought reasonably to have him or her in contemplation as being so affected when he directs his mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question, the plaintiff cannot surmount the first hurdle which confronts any plaintiff in negligence, that of establishing a duty of care.

D In this case the problem is somewhat different. Since the defendants were working in the house where the plaintiff lived, it must have been obvious to them that she would be so closely and directly affected by their performance of their work that they ought reasonably to have her in contemplation as being so affected when they carried out the work. It is not, I think, contested that the defendants owed her a duty to take reasonable care to carry out the work so as to avoid damaging her home and property. But it is said that the defendants owed her no duty to take reasonable care to carry out the work so as to avoid causing her psychiatric damage. This analytical approach cannot, I think, be said to be wrong, but it seems to me to be preferable, where a duty of care undeniably exists, to treat the question as one of remoteness and ask whether the plaintiff's psychiatric damage is too remote to be recoverable because not reasonably foreseeable as a consequence of the defendant's careless conduct. The test of reasonable foreseeability is, as I understand, the same in both contexts, and the result should be the same on either approach. So the question in any case such as this, applying the ordinary test of remoteness in tort, is whether the defendant should reasonably have contemplated psychiatric damage to the plaintiff as a real, even if unlikely, result of careless conduct on his part.

G McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410 is the most recent House of Lords authority on psychiatric damage and the ratio of that decision is of course binding upon us. All members of the House were agreed that for the plaintiff in that case to succeed it was necessary for her to show that the psychiatric damage which she in fact suffered was a reasonably foreseeable result of the defendant's careless driving. A minority of the House (Lord Scarman and Lord Bridge of Harwich) held that, if causation was established, that was all that the plaintiff need show and that it was not for the courts on policy grounds to limit a right to recover for reasonably foreseeable psychiatric damage caused by the defendant. Lord Wilberforce and Lord Edmund-Davies, although agreeing in the result, rejected the contention that reasonable foreseeability was the sole test of liability for the consequence of wrongdoing. It was, they held, proper for the courts to limit on grounds of policy the class of those, within the larger class of those to whom psychiatric damage was reasonably foreseeable, to whom a duty of care should be held to be owed. Lord Russell of Killowen accepted policy as something which might in an appropriate case feature in a judicial decision, but saw no policy requirement to restrict the plaintiff's right to recover on the facts of that case. The majority ratio of this decision is, therefore, if I have correctly understood their Lordships' speeches, that reasonable foreseeability of psychiatric damage to the plaintiff is a necessary condition of a successful claim, but that even where reasonable foreseeability of such damage is shown a right to recover may be denied on grounds of policy.

Whether the psychiatric damage suffered by this plaintiff as a result of the carelessness of the defendants was reasonably foreseeable is not something which can be decided as a question of law. In considering the present question of principle reasonable foreseeability must for the present be assumed in the plaintiff's favour. So the question is whether, assuming everything else in the plaintiff's favour, this court should hold this claim to be bad in law because the mental or emotional trauma which precipitated the plaintiff's psychiatric damage was caused by her witnessing the destruction of her home and property rather than apprehending or witnessing personal injury or the consequences of personal injury.

It is submitted, I think rightly, that this claim breaks new ground. No analogous claim has ever, to my knowledge, been upheld or even advanced. If, therefore, it were proper to erect a doctrinal boundary stone at the point which the onward march of recorded decisions has so far reached, we should answer the question of principle in the negative and dismiss the plaintiff's action, as the deputy judge did. But I should for my part erect the boundary stone with a strong presentiment that it would not be long before a case would arise so compelling on its facts as to cause the stone to be moved to a new and more distant resting place. The suggested boundary line is not, moreover, one that commends itself to me as either fair or convenient. Examples which arose in argument illustrate the point. Suppose, for example, that a scholar's life's work of research or composition were destroyed before his eyes as a result of a defendant's careless conduct, causing the scholar to suffer reasonably foreseeable psychiatric damage. Or suppose that a householder returned home to find that his most cherished possessions had been destroyed through the carelessness of an intruder in starting a fire or leaving a tap running, causing reasonably foreseeable psychiatric damage to the owner. I do not think a legal principle which forbade recovery in these circumstances could be supported. The only policy argument relied on as justifying or requiring such a restriction was the need to prevent a proliferation of claims, the familiar floodgates argument. This is not an argument to be automatically discounted. But nor is it, I think, an argument which can claim a very impressive record of success. All depends on one's judgment of the likely result of a particular extension of the law. I do not myself think that refusal by this court to lay down the legal principle for which the defendants contend, or (put positively) our acceptance that a claim such as the plaintiff's may in principle succeed, will lead to a flood of claims or actions, let alone a flood of successful claims or actions. Insistence that psychiatric damage must be reasonably foreseeable, coupled with clear recognition that a plaintiff must prove psychiatric damage as I have defined it, and not merely

3 W.L.R.

Attia v. British Gas Plc. (C.A.)

Bingham L.J.

A grief, sorrow or emotional distress, will in my view enable the good sense of the judge to ensure, adopting Lord Wright's language in Bourhill v. Young [1943] A.C. 92, 110, that the thing stops at the appropriate point. His good sense provides a better, because more flexible, mechanism of control than a necessarily arbitrary rule of law.

I would therefore answer this broad question of principle in favour of the plaintiff.

B

The question of fact

We were asked to determine, assuming the truth of the facts pleaded, whether psychiatric damage to the plaintiff was reasonably foreseeable by the defendants. This might fairly have been done in McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410, where the plaintiff was the mother, or in Jaensch v. Coffey, 58 A.L.J.R. 426, where the plaintiff was the wife, of the alleged tortfeasor's immediate victim, although in each of those cases there was a full trial. But one must be very cautious in determining questions of fact on assumed facts, and the risk of doing so unfairly to one side or the other is increased where, as here, the parties were by no means strangers to each other before the careless act occurred. In deciding what the defendants should reasonably have foreseen I would wish to have a much fuller picture than pleadings can give of the plaintiff's personality and circumstances as manifested to and known by the defendants. I therefore decline to answer this question because I do not think it is fairly answerable on existing materials at this stage.

D

I am accordingly of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The case should be remitted to a judge for trial of all live issues related to reasonable foreseeability, causation and damage on the footing that, if the plaintiff succeeds on all these issues, her claim may in principle be upheld. Whether the parties wish to defer the assessment of damages (if any) is a question for them.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

KYTE v. KYTE

1987 June 15;
July 22Purchas, Nicholls and Russell L.JJ.

Husband and Wife—Financial provision—Conduct of parties—“Inequitable to disregard it”—Husband suffering from depression and suicidal—Wife at first rescuing husband from attempted suicides—Wife forming adulterous relationship—Wife assisting husband to attempt suicide—Whether inequitable to disregard wife’s conduct—Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 (c. 18), s. 25(2)(g) (as substituted by Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984 (c. 42), s. 3)

The husband and wife married in July 1975. By early 1980 the marriage was in difficulties. The husband suffered from depression and was suicidal and unpredictable. He went into hospital for treatment several times. In the summer of 1982 he attempted to commit suicide but was rescued by the wife. He made other attempts and, in July 1983, the wife complied with the husband’s request to help him commit suicide by taking drink and a drug to his office and she did not try to dissuade him. By that time the wife had, unknown to the husband, formed an association with the party cited and wanted to set up home with him. She knew that she stood to gain by the husband’s death. Thereafter, she started divorce proceedings and obtained an injunction in February 1984 ousting the husband from the matrimonial home. By October 1984 the wife and the party cited were living together in the matrimonial home. She applied for ancillary relief. The registrar concluded that on the evidence before him the wife’s conduct had been such that it would be inequitable to disregard it by virtue of section 25(2)(g) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973¹, as amended. He made a property adjustment order and dismissed her claim for a lump sum. On the wife’s appeal the judge granted her a lump sum of £14,000.

On appeal by the husband:

Held, allowing the appeal, that, under section 25(2)(g) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, the court had to consider the conduct of both parties if it was conduct that might or might not have contributed to the breakdown of the marriage or if in some other way the nature of the conduct was such that it would be inequitable to ignore it in determining financial or property adjustment orders; that even in relation to the conduct of the husband which contributed to the unhappiness of the marriage, the wife’s conduct motivated by gain in relation to the husband’s suicide attempt in July 1983 together with her deceitful conduct in relation to her association with the party cited was conduct of such a nature that it was inequitable to disregard it; and that, accordingly, the judge’s order should be varied and the lump sum awarded reduced to £5,000 (post, pp. 1123B–C, F–H, 1124G).

APPEAL from Ewbank J.

- C The wife, Diana Kathleen Kyte, applied in her divorce proceedings for financial relief and property adjustment orders. Mr. Registrar Gee in chambers at the Manchester County Court made an order on 7 October 1986 that the husband, Graham Rodger Kyte, should forthwith transfer to the wife all his interest in the matrimonial home, 111, Downham Crescent, Prestwich; on completion of the transfer the wife should forthwith transfer to the husband or to his nominees her shareholding in G.R. Kyte Ltd. and the wife's claims for periodical payments for herself and for a lump sum order were dismissed. The registrar also made
- D certain orders for the maintenance of the children.

The wife appealed from that order and, on her application, the case was transferred to the High Court. On 16 January 1987 Ewbank J. in chambers at Manchester allowed the appeal. He ordered that in addition to the orders made on 7 October 1986 the husband should pay to the wife a lump sum of £14,000 within two months.

- E By a notice of appeal dated 13 February 1987 the husband appealed against the order for a lump sum on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) on the evidence before the court, it having been established before the registrar that on two occasions the wife had assisted the husband to commit suicide, the judge misdirected himself in holding that the conduct complained of was not such that it would be inequitable to disregard it; (2) the judge misdirected himself in holding (a) that the registrar had considered the behaviour of the wife in isolation and not in the context of the marriage, (b) that the registrar had not had sufficient regard to the well being of the children as first consideration and the needs of the wife and children were not satisfied by the registrar's order.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Purchas L.J.

- G F. J. Burns for the husband.
M. P. Allweis for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

22 July. The following judgments were handed down.

- H PURCHAS L.J. This is an appeal by Graham Rodger Kyte ("the husband") against an order made by Ewbank J. on 16 January 1987 at Manchester when the judge allowed an appeal from an order made by the registrar (Mr. Registrar Gee) on 7 October 1986 to the extent that, in addition to the orders made by the registrar, the husband was ordered to pay to Diana Kathleen Kyte ("the wife") a lump sum of £14,000. The central issue raised in the appeal relates to section 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 as substituted by section 3 of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984. The parts of the section relevant to this appeal are:

“(1) It shall be the duty of the court in deciding whether to exercise its powers under section 23, 24 or 24A above and, if so, in what manner, to have regard to all the circumstances of the case, first consideration being given to the welfare while a minor of any child of the family who has not attained the age of 18. (2) As regards the exercise of the powers . . . in relation to a party to the marriage, the court shall in particular have regard to the following matters— . . . (g) the conduct of each of the parties, if that conduct is such that it would in the opinion of the court be inequitable to disregard it . . .”

After hearing evidence on 20 August 1986 and submissions made by counsel, the registrar delivered a reserved judgment on 5 September 1986. The wife's application claimed all the usual forms of ancillary relief but as recorded in the registrar's judgment the only live issues were: (a) what provision should be made in respect of the matrimonial home at 111, Downham Crescent, Prestwich; (b) what lump sum, if any, should the husband pay to the wife; (c) what level of periodical payments should be ordered in respect of the three relevant children of the family.

The short background to the application was as follows. The parties were married on 25 July 1975. There are four children of the family, two of whom were the wife's children by a former marriage, namely Paul, born on 21 September 1965, and Andrea, born on 29 January 1969; and two who were the issue of the parties to the marriage, Victoria, born on 7 October 1977, and Rachel, born on 17 January 1980. The marriage appears to have come under stress at or soon after the birth of Rachel. The husband suffered from depression and spent numerous periods in hospital under treatment for this condition. In the particulars of behaviour upon which the wife relied in support of her petition for dissolution of marriage based upon section 1(2)(b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, which generally were accepted by the husband, it appears that, as a result of his depression, he was unpredictable and suicidal. Particularly severe incidents are recorded in April 1981. In the summer of 1982 he attempted suicide at his office and was rescued only by the wife and his office driver who, missing him, had called the wife for assistance. Other suicidal incidents occurred in the summer of 1983.

On the findings of fact reached by the registrar, which were generally accepted by the judge on appeal, the wife started associating with a Mr. Gregory as early as June 1983, although she did not start living with him permanently until 1984. The husband's case, which was accepted by the registrar, was that, although one of the serious suicidal attempts in the summer of 1983 was caused by the wife withdrawing her support from him, he was not at that time aware of the wife's association with Mr. Gregory. Subsequently, he realised that she was only using his conduct as a means to dissolve the marriage and set up home with Mr. Gregory.

Having initiated the suit, the wife obtained an injunction ousting the husband from the matrimonial home in February 1984. It is his assertion that this application was contrived to enable her to set up home with Gregory in the matrimonial home. The registrar found that, in presenting her version of these events to him, the wife had lied on oath.

After hearing evidence at length from the wife, the husband, from other witnesses including Gregory's wife, the registrar came to certain

3 W.L.R.

Kyte v. Kyte (C.A.)

Purchas L.J.

A firm findings of fact on the issues. The relevant parts of his judgment can conveniently be set out at this stage:

"I think there is no doubt that, as stated in paragraph 1 of the particulars of behaviour in the petition the husband's behaviour was unpredictable and suicidal and he spent many periods in hospital. I need not repeat them but the incidences of the husband's behaviour, which were brought about by his condition, are set out in the particulars of behaviour and notwithstanding that no 'fault' as such can be attached to the husband in the sense that his behaviour was brought about by his condition, there is no doubt that the wife had just cause for complaint and which more than justified a petition under section 1(2)(b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973. The husband for the most part accepts the allegations which were made against him, although he did file an answer denying that the marriage had broken down and asking that the prayer for dissolution be rejected. Subsequently when he found out about the wife's relationship with Gregory his answer was with leave amended to include a cross prayer for dissolution based on an allegation of adultery with Gregory who became the party cited. At the decree hearing, by agreement, cross decrees were granted on the petition and answer. The husband's case is that until his first really serious suicide attempt in July 1983 the wife had been supportive and understanding. It was her withdrawal of support which led to him seriously attempting to take his own life. He could not understand why her attitude had changed. He knew nothing of Gregory at the time of this attempt in July 1983 but now believes that the wife only used his 'conduct' as a basis for a divorce so that she could set up house with Gregory and, as he believes, inherit all his estate in the likely event that he successfully committed suicide. The wife's case is that her relationship with Gregory only started some time after the proceedings were commenced and after the suicide attempt in July and that this gradually blossomed until the stage was reached only in about October 1984 that she started to live with him permanently. I am quite satisfied on the evidence I heard that the wife has not told me the truth about her relationship with Gregory. She denied writing a 'love letter' to Gregory as early as June 1983 but Gregory's former wife Barbara Gregory gave evidence to me that she found such a letter on 17 June 1983 which read something like: 'Dear Michael, Miss you very much. Can't wait for our meeting. Love You. Diana.' Mrs. Gregory appeared on witness summons and had no reason to tell me any untruths. I accept her evidence which I think proves conclusively that the relationship between the wife and Gregory, for it to have reached the stage in which a letter such as that was written, must have started some time well before June 1983. The wife therefore in my view lied to me on that point.

"Next, the husband asserts that the obtaining by the wife of an injunction ousting him from the matrimonial home in February 1984 was a manufactured set of circumstances to give her premises in which she could set up house with Gregory. The wife asserts that whilst Gregory, after she returned, stayed from time to time it was much later in that year before he moved in finally. Certainly in April 1984 the wife's solicitors wrote to the husband's then solicitors asserting that there in effect was no relationship at all. That was clearly not the case. Mrs. Gregory gave evidence that she believed that her husband had started to live with [the wife] at the Kyte matrimonial home in about February 1984. She had been told that his taxi (he was then a taxi driver) was there day and night and she asked him about it and he told her that he was living there. He had already admitted to her that 'sex was involved' when she had found the letter to which I have referred. I accept Mrs. Gregory's evidence on this point and accordingly conclude that again the wife has not told me the truth on this issue and that Gregory was effectively living with her from shortly after she moved back to the matrimonial home.

"The husband put to the wife that she had thrown a party for Gregory in February 1984. The wife whilst accepting that there had been a party at this time at which Gregory was present, denied that it was for him (his birthday being on 10 February) and said that the birthday party she threw for him was in February 1985 which was after he had admittedly moved in. Mrs. Gregory gave evidence on this point as well. Gregory had told her of a party in February 1984 which was 'for his birthday and because [the husband] had left the house.' Again I think the wife was less than truthful. I think the husband is right. She wanted him out of the house 'to set up shop' with Gregory and having successfully attained her objective she threw a party to celebrate this and Gregory's birthday."

The registrar also found in the husband's favour over an incident which occurred in April 1984 on the day that the husband was discharged from hospital and went to the outside of the matrimonial home, where he had a shouted conversation with the wife who was speaking from an upstairs window. The husband alleged that he asked the wife what she wanted and received an answer to the effect: "I want the house, the contents and £50,000." Having had this conversation the registrar accepted evidence of admissions made by the wife to a third party that she, the wife, returned to the adulterous bed, which she was, at the time of the conversation, sharing with Gregory.

The first major suicidal attempt with which the registrar dealt was in July 1983. He made this finding:

"I therefore conclude that on this occasion, whilst the wife did not give active assistance in the attempted suicide, she left him alone to get on with it. In the result it would seem that the husband, whilst taking sufficient drugs and alcohol to kill himself, came downstairs (although he could not recall it) with the result that medical assistance was called (presumably by the wife) and after a period in intensive care he recovered. I conclude that the wife only called for medical assistance because she was really left with no alternative."

Turning to the second incident, the registrar found the facts in these terms:

"The next and perhaps most serious incident was when the husband was in a psychiatric ward following his period in intensive care after his July 1983 suicide attempt. The husband's case is that he telephoned the wife indicating that he again wished to kill himself and asked her to bring round some tablets and some alcohol to his office, which in fact was only just round the corner. He walked

3 W.L.R.

Kyte v. Kyte (C.A.)

Purchas L.J.

A round to the office having told the wife where there [were] some more tablets hidden under a bed and having told her to park her car on a main road and walk round so that her car would not be seen nearby. She arrived after about 10 minutes and rang the bell. When he answered the door she was there but no car was in view. She had a bag in her hand which contained a bottle of whisky and some cans of lager and some sodium amytol and other tablets. He asked her to come in but she didn't want to. He asked if he could kiss her or touch her one last time and she refused. She then left but in the result the husband felt unable to go through with it and having drunk some of the alcohol did not take the tablets. He phoned his father who came for him. Before this he had again telephoned the wife and said that he could not go through with it to which she replied, 'I knew you had no guts.'

C Finally, before parting with the facts as found by the registrar, I wish to quote one further passage:

D "I do however conclude that the wife's main objective was to set up house with the party cited and to get as much from the husband as possible. If she had admitted the allegations concerning her assistance with the husband's attempts at suicide but said that they arose from humanitarian principles I would have been more sympathetic to her. However, she denied the allegations and I accordingly do conclude that it was in the back of her mind, if not in the forefront, that if he was successful she would inherit all his estate."

E The registrar applied the provision of section 25(2)(g) of the Act of 1973 in these terms:

F "I think the right question I have to ask myself is whether a right thinking member of society, faced with the conclusions I have reached, would say that the matters of conduct were such as to reduce or extinguish the wife's entitlement. Many, I am sure, would say that on these facts she should get as little as possible but in my view the position is not so simple. I certainly conclude that the conduct is such that it would be inequitable to disregard it but that is only one of the factors I have to take into account under section 25 of the Act of 1973."

G The registrar then carefully reviewed all the features of the financial resources and needs of the parties in accordance with the provisions of section 25. I do not find it necessary to rehearse this careful appraisal of the position which is shown in the notes of the registrar's judgment. It is not criticised by Ewbank J. nor has it been attacked on appeal save only as to one respect: that is that the registrar's estimation of the total capital assets of the family was too low.

H In the event, the registrar ordered that the wife should have the whole of the interest in the property 111, Downham Crescent, Prestwich, and that, on completion of the transfer to her of the husband's interest, she should transfer to him or to his nominee her shareholding in the husband's limited company. The registrar then dismissed the wife's claim for periodical payments and lump sum and ordered periodical payments at the nominal amount of 5p per annum in favour of Andrea and periodical payments at the rate of £25 per week until the age of 17 or further order in favour of Victoria and Rachel.

The wife appealed against the order of the registrar and sought a transfer of the proceedings to the High Court District Registry at Manchester. Thus the matter came on before Ewbank J. The procedure to be adopted by the judge in dealing with an appeal of this sort must be essentially a matter for his own discretion. There may be occasions which call for a complete hearing of the evidence de novo and others where the appropriate course is to deal with the matter on the evidence before, and findings of fact by, the registrar. Mr. Allweis, who appeared for the wife before Ewbank J., has told the court that he, and indeed the husband, had arrived prepared for a full hearing by Ewbank J. of all the evidence de novo.

Somewhat to the parties' surprise the judge indicated at the outset that the witnesses would not be required, except that evidence would be received from the husband to deal with his financial position. If a judge decides to adopt the course taken by Ewbank J. in this application, then the exercise of his discretion in determining facts, other than the financial position of the husband, will be constrained in the same manner as this court is inhibited on appeal. By the same token, this court is in just as good a position as the judge to review the findings of the registrar, particularly as regards the central issue of conduct.

Turning now to the transcript of the judgment of Ewbank J., the judge recorded the respective ages of the husband and wife (48 and 39 respectively) and the ages of the children, and then continued to deal with the financial position of the husband's company and the financial position he enjoyed in relation to the company, namely that he was substantially living on the capital and income of the company as a wasting asset. It is only necessary to refer to one finding in detail:

"The registrar had rather diffuse evidence about the company, and he came to the conclusion that the total assets with which he had to deal were in the region of £160,000. This was an underestimate, and I have to say that the figures I have got, on the evidence I have heard today, bring the total assets to £200,000, rather than £160,000."

It is accepted by Mr. Burns, who appears for the husband, that the judge's finding on the total assets is correct.

The judge then passed to deal with the question of conduct. It is not apparent that he criticised any of the findings of fact or assessments of credit reached by the registrar. Indeed, in view of the course that he decided to take in hearing the appeal, it would be quite impossible for him so to do. He dealt with this aspect of the case in the following terms:

"The registrar went into great detail about the wife's conduct, and took a very adverse view of her conduct. Now, it was right to say, to an extent at any rate, that the husband was not responsible for his behaviour since it developed from his mental ill health, but it is not right to divorce the wife's behaviour from the general history—that is made clear in Vasey v. Vasey [1985] F.L.R. 596. The wife's behaviour has to be weighed in the light of the history of the marriage and not taken in isolation, and I fear the registrar has treated it in isolation. The wife is blameworthy in some of the things she has done. She has committed adultery; she has been less than kind to the husband; and she has told lies to the court. But that has to be taken in the context of the deep unhappiness caused

3 W.L.R.

Kyte v. Kyte (C.A.)

Purchas L.J.

A to her by the husband's behaviour, albeit as a result of his mental ill health, and, having considered all the factors in this case, I would have thought the registrar was wrong to come to the conclusion that it would be inequitable to disregard the wife's conduct."

The judge eventually decided to allow the appeal in these terms:

B "The registrar, in my judgment, was wrong in two aspects, as I have mentioned. First of all, in the assessment of the total capital, I have had up-to-date evidence from the husband himself on this and, as I have mentioned, the registrar's figure of £160,000 is wrong. The right figure is about £200,000. The second ground on which the registrar was wrong was in deciding that it would be inequitable to disregard the wife's conduct, and thereby reducing what would otherwise have been her entitlement. Having come to that conclusion, I come to the decision that there should be a lump sum to the wife, as well as the house, to meet the requirements of section 25, and I assess that lump sum at £14,000."

D Turning now to the central issue raised in this appeal, namely that of conduct, it is first necessary to notice the alterations in the statutory law achieved by the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984. This Act in its preamble is described:

"An Act to amend the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 . . . so far as [it relates] to the exercise of the jurisdiction of courts in England and Wales to make provision for financial relief . . ."

E Mr. Burns informed the court that the alterations to section 25 so far as conduct is concerned have been viewed by the Bar as confirming but in no way affecting the law as it existed immediately prior to the passing of the Act under the wording of section 25 in the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 before amendment together with the case law ensuing thereon. The relevant parts of section 25 as originally enacted are:

F "(1) It shall be the duty of the court in deciding whether to exercise its powers . . . in relation to a party to the marriage and, if so, in what manner, to have regard to all the circumstances of the case including the following matters, that is to say— . . . and so to exercise those powers as to place the parties, so far as it is practicable and, having regard to their conduct, just to do so, in the financial position in which they would have been if the marriage had not broken down and each had properly discharged his or her financial obligations and responsibilities towards the other."

G The new form of section 25 in its relevant provisions for this purposes has already been set out in this judgment.

H The significant changes involve: (a) an emphasis that the welfare of the minors must be given "first consideration;" (b) that subject to (a) the various factors of the parties, e.g. income, financial needs, standard of living, age, physical disability, etc., all of which are incorporated in the original form of section 25(1), with the addition, as a specific matter to be taken into account, the question of conduct and (c) the revocation of the duty subject to conduct making it "just so to do" to place the parties in the financial position in which they would have been, etc. The first and third differences are substantive amendments to the law as originally provided so far as financial relief: the first emphasising that not only as regards provision for the children under section 23 and section 24, first regard must be had to their welfare in all other aspects of the case; and, secondly, a recognition of the futility of the third provision, attention to which was repeatedly drawn by the courts having to deal with applications for ancillary relief. It may well, therefore, be argued that the Matrimonial and Family Provisions Act 1984, being an amending Act, should in the first instance be read so as to give effect to the ordinary meaning of the words used. These are not the test of gross and obvious conduct as developed in Wachtel v. Wachtel [1973] Fam. 72, or conduct such as to make it repugnant to ignore it as between the parties. It may well be that the use of the words "it would in the opinion of the court be inequitable to disregard it" (the conduct of each of the parties) may give a broader discretion to the court than that envisaged hitherto under the authorities. Happily, in this case, it is not necessary to decide this matter as, in my judgment, the behaviour established against the wife would satisfy the test under either approach and, as the point has not been argued, it would be wrong for me to express a concluded view.

Mr. Burns referred the court to a number of cases which involved violent physical conduct: Hall v. Hall [1984] F.L.R. 631; M. v. M. (Financial Provision: Conduct) (1982) 3 F.L.R. 83 and Vasey v. Vasey [1985] F.L.R. 596, which was an authority to which the judge referred in his judgment. That case was an appeal from the justices, although the relevant statutory provisions were in equivalent terms: namely, that the financial needs and capacities of the parties must all be weighed in the balance and, if appropriate, conduct must also be placed in the scales. Mr. Burns submitted (and in my view rightly) that Ewbank J. was not justified when he criticised the registrar for failing to consider the conduct against the whole context of the marriage.

Mr. Allweis submitted that the inclusion of conduct as one of a number of paragraphs in section 25(2) in the new form indicated that, if the court came to the conclusion conduct should be considered, it must be considered along with all the other factors to which reference is specifically made in the paragraphs in section 25(2). He submitted that the authorities showed a general theme that conduct is only to be taken into account when the victim of the conduct is "blameless." In support of this submission he referred to part of the judgment of Waller L.J. in Robinson v. Robinson [1983] Fam. 42, 50, where Waller L.J. said in referring to West v. West [1978] Fam. 1:

"There is, however, an important point of difference in that in West v. West the judge found that the husband had to accept a share of the responsibility for the breakdown or failure to start the marriage, although by far and away the greater burden was on the wife. In the present case the husband was said to be blameless. In my opinion there is very little to choose between them. For the husband to be blameless is an unusual feature and the fact that the marriage broke down in just over four years does not make the case so different when this feature is taken into account. This is not the kind of case that Ormrod J. refers to when he says in Wachtel v. Wachtel [1973] Fam. 72, 80B: 'generally speaking, the causes of breakdown are complex and rarely to be found wholly or mainly on one side . . .'"

Mr. Allweis emphasised the finding of the registrar and the judge that, during the marriage, notwithstanding that the husband "could not

Kyte v. Kyte (C.A.)

Purchas L.J.

A help himself" as a result of his manic depression, the wife must have suffered. In the present case the husband, therefore, could not be said to be "blameless."

B With respect to the submissions of Mr. Allweis, I am not impressed by this approach. The section refers to "the conduct of each of the parties" and this must relate to relevant conduct and does not envisage one or the other being blameless. Again, under the old authorities, the conduct did not necessarily have to be conduct contributing to the breakdown of the marriage, and frequently conduct subsequent to the breakdown was taken into account: see Hall v. Hall [1984] F.L.R. 631; W. v. W. (Financial Provision: Lump Sum) [1976] Fam. 107 and Martin v. Martin [1976] Fam. 167 and [1976] Fam. 335, C.A. As I have indicated earlier in this judgment, I see no restricting words or meaning to be inferred in the wording of the section 25(2). The court is entitled, in my judgment, to look at the whole of the picture, including the conduct during the marriage and after the marriage which may or may not have contributed to the breakdown of the marriage or which in some other way makes it inequitable to ignore the conduct of each of the parties. A clear example of such a case is where the parties may each not have been blameless (almost inevitably in a normal marriage) but where the imbalance of conduct one way or other would make it inequitable to ignore the comparative conduct of the parties.

E I accept the submission made by Mr. Burns that it is abundantly clear from the long and careful judgment of the registrar that he took into account the conduct of the wife in the context of the conduct of the husband and all the circumstances arising during the marriage and that the judge, with great respect to him, was not entitled to criticise his judgment in this respect in the way in which he did. I add only one comment, namely that the findings of the registrar as to the credibility of the wife cannot be ignored when viewing the contents of her petition as being reliable evidence of the specific facts there set out. The husband did in general terms accept that many of the allegations were true and to this extent, subject to the qualification just mentioned, the contents of the petition are reliable. The suit was finally determined by consent on cross-decrees and it is not clear to me to what extent the allegations in the petition were ever fully examined.

G I have, reluctantly, come to the conclusion that the judge was wrong to have reversed the registrar on the findings of conduct. The test as to conduct which the registrar set for himself is as apt an interpretation of the phrase "inequitable to ignore it" that I can readily envisage. The conduct of the wife not only in actively assisting or, alternatively, taking no steps to prevent the husband's attempts at suicide in the presence of the motive of gain which the registrar found on ample evidence to be established, together with her wholly deceitful conduct in relation to her association with Gregory, would amount to conduct of a gross and obvious kind which would have fallen within the concept under the old law and, in my judgment, could certainly render it inequitable to ignore it even against the conduct of the husband which contributed to the unhappy conditions which existed during the marriage and afterwards as a result of the husband's manic depression.

H I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that his appeal must be allowed on one of the two aspects upon which the judge in turn reversed the order of the registrar. This leaves the question of what this court ought to do in those circumstances. I am unable to accept Mr. Burns' submission that the court should adopt the view that the order of the registrar provided the financial provision that was required to comply with the interests of the minors within section 25(1) of the Act of 1973 and that, therefore, no further payment should be made to the wife in any event. This would place too much weight on the conduct of the wife and would be inconsistent with the approach of the registrar ("I do not think that her conduct is such as to disentitle her altogether . . ."). On the other hand, I cannot accept Mr. Allweis' submission that conduct should not affect the distribution of the extra £40,000 of capital assets and that the judge's decision to give the wife £14,000 of it as a matter of discretion ought not to be disturbed. This ignores the fact that the judge was working on the basis that conduct was irrelevant, and we have found that he was in error in doing this. The judge also had the matter of costs in mind. Although the husband appeared in person in order to reduce costs, the wife has at all stages been an assisted person under the Legal Aid Act 1974. Before the registrar the wife's costs of the ancillary relief proceedings were expected to be in the region of £5,000. Before the judge her costs were said to be £15,000 in respect of which there would be a charge in the favour of The Law Society. On inquiring about this extraordinary difference, the court was told that the figure for the wife's costs included costs incurred in numerous applications involving the children. Although the information given to the court was not very clear, I understand that certainly not all the additional £10,000 costs related to the costs of this appeal. Again on the basis that the registrar was wrong over conduct, the judge awarded costs to the wife both before the registrar and on appeal.

In view of the decision we have reached in this court, it would be quite wrong to allow the judge's orders on costs to stand. The order of the registrar, i.e. no order as to costs, should be restored and, subject to further argument, it would appear that the husband should be awarded the costs of the appeal against the wife, such order not to be enforced without leave of the court. In these circumstances, it appears probable that, apart from the protected part of any lump sum award, The Law Society charge will absorb the balance. This is, of course, no reason for not making an award.

The approach which I propose to adopt is to vary the judge's apportionment of the £40,000 additional capital to take into account the question of conduct which he wrongly ignored. Bearing in mind that the interests of the minors have already been catered for and that the wife enjoys the support of Gregory, and her conduct, which I considered was extremely grave, even taking into account the difficulties of the marriage, I would reduce the lump sum to £5,000.

NICHOLLS L.J. I agree.

RUSSELL L.J. I also agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Order for costs not to be enforced without leave of court.

No order for costs before registrar.

C

Regulation 58 of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1985, made pursuant to paragraph 2(1) of Schedule 7 to the Value Added Tax Act 1983 provides:

“every person who is registered [for value added tax] shall . . . furnish the controller, not later than the last day of the month next following the end of the period to which it relates, with a return on the form numbered 4 in the Schedule to these Regulations showing the amount of tax payable by or to him . . .”

The taxpayers, who were registered for value added tax, posted their returns in a prepaid and preaddressed envelope supplied by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise for that purpose within the relevant period and on the form prescribed by regulation 58. Officers of the Customs and Excise preferred informations against the taxpayers alleging a failure to furnish the returns, contrary to section 39(8)(b) of the Act of 1983¹. Before the justices, the officers adduced evidence in the form of certificates, pursuant to paragraph 11(1)(b) of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1983, that there was no record of the returns having been received by the commissioners. In the first case, the justices accepted the taxpayers' evidence that they had posted the return and dismissed the informations, but the justices in the second case were of opinion that the evidence of the certificate could only be rebutted by proof of receipt of the return and that proof of posting was insufficient. They found the taxpayer guilty, fined him £100 and ordered him to make payment in addition of £75 for the costs of the prosecution.

Held, dismissing the first appeal and allowing the second, that a taxpayer, registered for value added tax, fulfilled his obligation to “furnish” a return within the terms of regulation 58(1) by completing the prescribed form, complying with the instructions printed on that form and returning it with any tax payable in the prepaid and preaddressed envelope supplied for that purpose; that the commissioners had adopted the Post Office as their agents in facilitating delivery of the return and were obliged to accept responsibility if the return was duly posted and not delivered; and that, accordingly, since the

HAYMAN V. GRIFFITHS

CASE STATED by Dyfed justices sitting at Aberystwyth.

On 4 June 1986 informations were preferred by Peter Arthur Hayman, a customs officer, against the taxpayers, Arthur Owen Griffiths and Elizabeth Mary Griffiths, that they being registered under the Value Added Tax Act 1983 for the purpose of value added tax as persons carrying on a business in partnership failed to comply with regulation 58 of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1985 by failing to furnish to the Controller, Customs and Excise, Value Added Tax Central Unit, Southend-on-Sea, a return for the period from 1 December 1985 till 28 February 1986 in the form prescribed by the Regulations of 1985 not later than 31 March 1986, contrary to section 39(8)(b) of the Value Added Tax Act 1983, as amended by section 12(8) of the Finance Act 1985.

The justices heard the information on 26 September 1986 and found the following facts. (a) The officer adduced in evidence (1) a certificate under paragraph 11(1)(a) of Schedule 7 to the Value Added Tax Act 1983, dated 22 May 1986, certifying that the taxpayers were registered for value added tax on 1 December 1985 and remained so on 31 March 1986; (2) A certificate showing that the return of value added tax posted by the taxpayers on 20 March 1986 had not been processed at his headquarters at Southend. (b) The officer could give no evidence whatsoever as to the posting of the return in question and could not prove beyond reasonable doubt that the return had not been received or mislaid on receipt. (c) The only proof as to the posting of the return to Southend was given by one of the taxpayers, Elizabeth Mary Griffiths, and the person who actually posted the return, namely, Gordon Rees. The latter was called as a witness by the taxpayers. (d) Gordon Rees gave evidence that he had posted the return to the officer on 20 March 1986 in a prepaid and preprinted envelope supplied by the officer for that purpose and the justices accepted that undisputed evidence.

It was contended by the officer that the return had not been "furnished" by the taxpayers as he had no record of the return having been received or processed at his office at Southend.

It was contended by the taxpayers that the return had been posted to the officer on 20 March 1986 in a prepaid and preprinted envelope for that purpose provided by the officer and that the return had therefore been "furnished."

The justices were of the opinion that (a) direct evidence had been given by the taxpayers that the return had been posted to the officer in a prepaid and preprinted envelope supplied by him for that purpose. (b)

3 W.L.R.

Hayman v. Griffiths (D.C.)

A The only evidence produced by the officer was the certificate under paragraph 11(1)(b) of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1983. (c) As the only direct evidence as to posting came from the taxpayers, and in the light of Aikman v. White [1986] S.T.C. 1, the justices were of the opinion that the return had been “furnished” by the taxpayers by posting the return in the prepaid and preprinted envelope referred to above on 20 March 1986.

B The customs officer appealed. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the return had been “furnished” to the officer when posted by the taxpayers in a prepaid and preprinted envelope supplied by the officer for that purpose.

WALKER v. HANBY

C CASE STATED by North Yorkshire justices sitting at Northallerton.

On 28 February 1986 an information was preferred by Allison Kathryn Hanby, a customs officer, against the taxpayer, Peter Allyn Walker, that he being registered for the purpose of value added tax under the Value Added Tax Act 1983 failed to comply with regulation 58 of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1985 by failing to furnish to the Controller, Customs and Excise, Value Added Tax Central Unit, Southend-on-Sea, a return for the period from 1 September 1985 until 30 November 1985 in the form prescribed by the Regulations of 1985 not later than 31 December 1985, contrary to section 39(8)(b) of the Value Added Tax Act 1983, as amended by section 12(8) of the Finance Act 1985.

E The justices heard the information on 4 June 1986 and found the following facts. (a) The taxpayer was on 1 September 1985 registered for the purpose of value added tax and remained so on 31 December 1985. (b) No return of value added tax had been made by the taxpayer as at 8 April 1986, as shown by the certificate made pursuant to paragraph 11(1)(b) of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1983. (c) The taxpayer posted the return at Northallerton post office on 24 December 1985 but he was unable to prove that it had been received at Southend by the Controller of Customs and Excise.

F It was contended by the taxpayer that he was entitled to rely upon section 46 of the Act of 1983 which dealt with service of documents. It provided for the service of such documents by sending them by post in a letter addressed to a person at his last or usual residence or place of business. The taxpayer submitted that by compliance with section 46 he had complied with the law's requirements as to the furnishing of his value added tax return.

G It was contended on behalf of the officer that the obligation to furnish such a return, as contained in section 39(8)(b) of the Act of 1983 and regulation 58 of the Regulations of 1985, was absolute. In support of that contention, it was pointed out that paragraph 4(1) of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1983 provided that where a person had failed to make a return the commissioners might assess the amount of tax due from him to the best of their judgment and notify that to him. That would mean that if a person complied with the requirements as to service his legal obligations under the Act of 1983 would be at an end. Not only would he be deemed to have furnished a return when it had not been received at Southend, but the commissioners would thereby be prevented from making an assessment under paragraph 4(1) of Schedule 7.

H

Having heard the evidence on 4 June 1986 the justices reserved judgment until 25 June 1986, when they were of opinion that the evidence of posting the return to Southend was not sufficient to rebut the presumption raised by the production of the certificate, pursuant to paragraph 11(1)(b) of Schedule 7, that the return was not furnished. The justices' view was that the evidence of such a certificate could only be rebutted by proof of receipt of the return and that proof of posting would not suffice. Accordingly they found the taxpayer guilty, fined him £100 and ordered him to pay £75 towards the costs of the prosecution.

The taxpayer appealed. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the justices were correct in the view that the requirement to furnish a return was absolute and would not be complied with merely by proof of posting.

Cur. adv. vult.

27 July. MANN J. read the following judgments.

HAYMAN v. GRIFFITHS

There is before the court an appeal by way of case stated by Peter Arthur Hayman who is an officer of the Customs and Excise. The taxpayers are Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Griffiths who carry on an hotel business in partnership and who were at the material time registered as taxable persons under the Value Added Tax Act 1983. The case has been stated by justices for the county of Dyfed acting in and for the petty sessional division of Gogledd Ceredigion in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Aberystwyth on 26 September 1986. On that day the justices dismissed informations which on 4 June 1986 the officer had preferred against the taxpayer. Those informations alleged the commission of an offence contrary to section 39(8)(b) of the Act of 1983 as substituted by section 12 of, and Schedule 6 to, the Finance Act 1985. The offence was that of failing to furnish a return of value added tax for the period 1 December 1985 to 28 February 1986 not later than 31 March 1986.

The case cannot be understood without a consideration of certain provisions of the Act of 1983 and of regulations made thereunder. By reason of section 38 of the Act of 1983 Schedule 7 has effect with respect to the administration, collection and enforcement of value added tax. Paragraph 2(1) of Schedule 7 provides:

"Regulations under this paragraph may require . . . the making of returns in such form and manner as may be specified in the regulations . . ."

Paragraph 4(1) provides:

"Where a person has failed to make any returns required under this Act . . . the commissioners . . . may assess the amount of tax due from him to the best of their judgment and notify it to him."

Paragraph 11(1) provides:

"A certificate of the commissioners . . . (b) that any return required by or under this Act has not been made or had not been made at

Hayman v. Griffiths (D.C.)

Mann J.

A any date . . . shall be sufficient evidence of that fact until the contrary is proved.”

Regulations made under paragraph 2(1) of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1983 include regulation 58 of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1985. Sub-paragraph (1) of that regulation provides:

B “Save as the commissioners may otherwise allow, every person who is registered . . . shall, in respect of . . . every period of three months ending on the dates notified either in the certificate of registration issued to him or otherwise, furnish the controller, not later than the last day of the month next following the end of the period to which it relates, with a return on the form numbered 4 in the Schedule to these Regulations showing the amount of tax payable by or to him and containing full information in respect of the other matters specified in the form and a declaration that the return is true and complete.”

The form numbered 4 which is in the Schedule is headed “Return of Value Added Tax” and contains the following instruction:

D “Please complete the whole of this form. The notes on the back and Filling in your VAT return will help you to do this. Return it, with any VAT due, in the enclosed envelope to the Controller, VAT Central Unit, HM Customs and Excise, 21 Victoria Avenue, SOUTHEND-ON-SEA X.”

A “failure” to comply with regulation 58(1) is a summary offence: see section 39(8)(b) of the Act of 1983 as amended.

E The facts of the case are in a short compass. The officer adduced a certificate under paragraph 11(1)(b) of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1983 to the effect that the return for the relevant period had not been made by the taxpayers and said that there was no record of a return having been received by the commissioners. The taxpayers’ answer was that a form 4 had been posted on 20 March 1986 in a prepaid and preaddressed envelope supplied by the commissioners for the purpose and that accordingly a return had been “furnished.” The justices accepted the evidence as to the posting on 20 March and were of the opinion that accordingly the return had been “furnished.” They pose the following question for the opinion of this court:

G “whether the return had been ‘furnished’ to the officer when posted by the taxpayers in a prepaid and preprinted envelope supplied by the officer for that purpose.”

H Mr. Pannick for the customs officer submitted that the answer to be given is, “no.” The offence, he said, was that of a failure to “furnish.” He is plainly correct in so saying. His statement invites an inquiry as to the meaning of the word furnish. The court’s attention was drawn to the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, 3rd ed., vol. 1, p. 763 where furnish is, amongst other meanings, given the meaning of provide or supply. I would not dissent from the proposition that this is the ordinary English meaning which is appropriate to the word as it is used in regulation 58(1) of the Regulations of 1985. The meaning involves a receipt of a thing before it can be said that the thing has been furnished. The apparent consequence for present purposes is that if a taxable person posts a form 4 in accord with what is printed on the form then he is guilty of a criminal offence if the form is not received by the addressee.

Such a consequence seems surprising but is not impossible should primary and secondary legislation combine to secure its achievement. A

However, the consequence was rejected by the High Court of Justiciary in Aikman v. White [1986] S.T.C. 1. In that case the facts, although (and immaterially) set in the context of the Value Added Tax (General) Regulations 1980 (S.I. 1980 No. 1536), were identical to those in the present case. The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Wheatley said, at pp. 5-6: B

“The second chapter was in fact the main argument advanced by counsel for the respondent. It ran thus. The statutory form was sent by the controller to the respondent. It contained the following instruction: ‘The person named here must complete the whole of the form in accordance with the Notes overleaf and return it in the enclosed envelope to the Controller, VAT Central Unit, HM Customs and Excise, 21 Victoria Ave., Southend-on-Sea.’ The envelope was a prepaid and preaddressed one supplied by the commissioners for the express purpose of sending the return to the controller. There is a finding that this envelope containing the completed return was posted to the controller. Accordingly, the special circumstances warranted the submission that the commissioners were directing the taxpayer on how to meet the requirements of the regulation in regard to furnishing the return to the controller, and were thus using the Post Office as their agents. Thus, if the envelope went missing in these circumstances and was not received, the finding of fact that it was posted meant that the failure to deliver was the fault of the Post Office, which had been chosen by the controller as his agent in the delivery process. That being so, the respondent should not be convicted of failing to furnish the return. C D E

“The counter to this argument was that all that the controller was doing was facilitating the work of the taxpayer in making the return by giving her instructions on how to complete the form correctly and providing a prepaid addressed envelope for convenience. This was done to secure an accurate and speedy return of the information required for a tax assessment, but it could not be regarded as altering the statutory responsibility for seeing that the return was furnished and accordingly delivered. If this responsibility remained with the taxpayer, the latter had to bear the burden of non-delivery resulting in non-furnishing. In other words, the form could not detract from or alter the requirements imposed by the regulations. F G

“Even on the basis of the general principle to which I have referred applying, the certificate issued by the commissioners, on which their case was based, can be negated by proof to the contrary. In this case a completed return was made and posted, all in accord with the instructions given by the commissioners in the form. The respondent had done all that she was required to do by the commissioners, who, by giving these instructions, were clearly indicating how the return should be furnished to them. In doing so, they were adopting the Post Office as their agents, and must accept responsibility for the non-delivery of the return which was posted. H

“I am accordingly of the opinion that the respondent carried out what she was requested to do by the regulations and the Act—she

Hayman v. Griffiths (D.C.)

Mann J.

A furnished the commissioners with the return in the manner in which they asked her to do. This, in my view, both qualifies the general definition of 'furnishing' and negatives the evidential value of the certificate, and, this being a criminal charge, with all the stringencies attached thereto, the sheriff was right in acquitting her in the circumstances."

B Lord Robertson said, at p. 7:

C "As the controller on the form specifically instructs the sender of the form to return it in an envelope specially enclosed for the purpose, stamped and addressed, it seems to me that it is the controller who is using the Post Office as his agent, not the sender, and he is indicating that he accepts that the return is furnished when it is posted in the prescribed way. A further indication of this is in the terms of the complaint, which charges that the failure to comply with the order took place at the respondent's premises, not the controller's office."

Lord Dunpark said, at p. 8:

D "In terms of the note on form 5 they invited the respondent to complete the return, place it in the hands of the Post Office for delivery to them at their office in Southend. In effect they were saying to the respondent 'This is all that you have to do "to furnish" us with the return.' In my opinion they thereby intimated to the respondent that they were appointing the Post Office as their agent to receive the return on their behalf. This I believe to be the reason why the sheriff acquitted the respondent, although he makes no reference to agency."

E A decision of the High Court of Justiciary is a persuasive authority for this court. The more is it so when regard is had to the desirability of a uniform system of taxation being uniformly interpreted throughout the Kingdom. However, Mr. Pannick submitted that the decision was a wrong one. He advanced three reasons. First, that which is printed on form 4 cannot limit the obligation to furnish. Second, that which is so printed does no more than give aid in facilitating the making of a return. Third, that the court was not correct in allowing the commissioners to erode the taxable person's duty to furnish by making the Post Office an agent, that there was no factual basis for such an agency and that the agency was an agency to carry and not to receive, i.e. was not an agency to complete the act of furnishing.

G I cannot accept the force of these criticisms. The obligation to "furnish" derives from regulation 58(1) and is an obligation to furnish a return on the form numbered 4. Form number 4 informs the taxable person what he is to do. I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Wheatley, when he observed, at p. 6:

H "The respondent had done all that she was required to do by the commissioners, who, by giving these instructions, were clearly indicating how the return should be furnished to them. In doing so, they were adopting the Post Office as their agents, and must accept responsibility for the non-delivery of the return which was posted."

Regulation 58(1) of the Regulations of 1985 by its own adoption of form 4 has effected a refined meaning of furnish. This seems to me to remove any force from Mr. Pannick's criticisms. I respectfully agree with the decision of the High Court of Justiciary. Accordingly, in this case the taxpayers establish that there was no failure to furnish, the certificate under paragraph 11(1)(b) of Schedule 7 to the Act of 1983 lost its potency and the justices were right to acquit.

I would accordingly answer the question posed "yes" and in accordance with the intimation already given, dismiss the appeal.

WALKER V. HANBY

There is before the court an appeal by way of cases stated by the taxpayer, Peter Allyn Walker, who is a solicitor and who at the material time was registered as a taxable person under the Value Added Tax Act 1983. The respondent is an officer of the Customs and Excise. The case has been stated by justices for the county of North Yorkshire acting in and for the petty sessional division of Allertonshire in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Northallerton on 4 June 1986. On that day the justices found the taxpayer guilty on an information which charged him with an offence contrary to section 39(8)(b) of the Act of 1983 as amended by section 12 of, and Schedule 6 to, the Finance Act 1985. The offence was that of failing to furnish a return of value added tax for the period 1 September 1985 to 30 November 1985 not later than 31 December 1985.

The justices found that the taxpayer had posted a return to the commissioners on 24 December 1985. There was no evidence that the return had been received by the commissioners. On those facts the justices found the taxpayer guilty, fined him £100 and ordered him to pay £75 towards the costs of the prosecution.

The result in this case is the converse of that which was achieved in the previous case. The result in that case has determined this case. Accordingly, in response to the justices' question as to whether they were correct in the view that the requirement to furnish a return is absolute and would not be complied with merely by proof of posting I would return the answer "no" and would in accordance with the intimation already given, allow this appeal.

WATKINS L.J. I agree with both judgments. Accordingly, the appeal of Hayman will be dismissed and the appeal of Walker will be allowed.

Appeal in first case dismissed with costs.

Appeal in second case allowed with costs.

Certificate under section 1 of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 that point of law of general public importance involved in decision refused.

APPEAL from Hoffmann J.

The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal of the plaintiff, Albert Gregorio Hines, from the decision of Hoffmann J. [1986] Ch. 524; [1986] 2 W.L.R. 97, who had ordered to be struck out his claims against the first defendant, Birkbeck College, for a declaration that its dismissal of him from his employment as a professor of economics was ultra vires, null and void, and against the second defendant, the University of London, for an injunction restraining it from depriving him of his title of professor and status as an appointed teacher, on the basis that they fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the visitor of the respective defendants and that the court therefore lacked jurisdiction to intervene.

DILLON L.J., in a judgment with which Stephen Brown and Neill L.JJ. agreed, said, after considering fully the arguments advanced and authorities cited by the plaintiff: The judgment of Hoffmann J. has, as a matter of law, been approved by the House of Lords in Thomas v. University of Bradford [1987] 2 W.L.R. 677, 690; it is not for us to differ. The House of Lords has not of course decided the plaintiff's case but the views expressed by the House of Lords are the guidelines by which we have to decide that case. We are concerned particularly with the application of what are now those guidelines by Hoffmann J. I can see no beginnings even of a successful argument that Hoffmann J. has erred in his judgment and, without any hesitation, I would dismiss this appeal.

BUSINESS COMPUTERS INTERNATIONAL LTD. v.
REGISTRAR OF COMPANIES AND OTHERS

1987 June 18, 19

Scott J.

Negligence—Duty of care to whom?—Litigant—Petition to wind up company—Petition served at incorrect address—Company unaware of petition—Winding up order made but later set aside—Company's claim against petitioner for negligence—Whether petitioning company owing duty of care—Whether statement of claim to be struck out

The second defendant company, claiming to be the assignee of a debt owed by the plaintiff company, presented a petition to wind up the plaintiff company. The petition was served at an address stated in the petition to be the plaintiff's registered office in Wembley, and the petition was subsequently advertised. On 21 July 1986, the petition came before the Companies Court, but nobody appeared on behalf of the plaintiff company, and a winding up order was made. The Wembley address was not in fact the plaintiff's registered office, but that of another company. On learning of the making of the winding up order, the plaintiff successfully applied for it to be set aside. On 4 February 1987, the plaintiff issued a writ against, inter alia, the Registrar of Companies and the second defendant claiming damages in respect of the damage alleged to have been caused by the making of the winding up order.

On the second defendant's motion for an order that the plaintiff's action against it to be struck out as failing to disclose a reasonable cause of action:—

Held, granting the motion, that no duty of care was owed by one litigant to another as to the manner in which the litigation was conducted, whether in regard to the service of process or in regard to any other step in the proceedings; and that, accordingly, the plaintiff company's statement of claim as against the second defendant did not disclose any reasonable cause of action, and ought to be struck out (post, pp. 1140A–G, 1142D–H, 1143H–1144H).

MOTION

- C The plaintiff company, Business Computers International Ltd., issued a writ, dated 4 February 1987, accompanied by a statement of claim, against the first defendant, the Registrar of Companies, and the second defendant, Alex Lawrie Factors Ltd., and others, alleging negligence in respect of the facts that on 11 June 1986 the second defendant company presented a petition for the winding up of the plaintiff company and served it at 65, Castleton Avenue, Wembley, an address that was not
- D the registered office of the plaintiff company which was at an entirely different address, namely 5/7, Singer Street, London E.C.2, with the result that when the petition came on for hearing before the Companies Court on 21 July 1986, the plaintiff company was unaware of the existence of the petition and no one appeared on its behalf, and the usual winding up order was made. Having heard of the making of the winding up order, the plaintiff company at once applied for the order to
- E be set aside, and the order was duly set aside. In its statement of claim the plaintiff company alleged, inter alia, that the second defendant, in presenting the petition, owed a duty to the plaintiff company to take reasonable steps to ensure that the registered address of the plaintiff company was correctly stated, that the matters alleged in the petition could be conscientiously verified and that the petition was properly
- F served on the plaintiff company at its registered office. The prayer for relief claimed damages in respect of loss and damage to the plaintiff company, in various respects.

By a notice of motion dated 10 April 1987, the second defendant applied for the statement of claim to be struck out as against it.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

- G M. F. Harris for the second defendant.
J. D. Martineau for the plaintiff company.

- H SCOTT J. I have before me an application by the second defendant, Alex Lawrie Factors Ltd., that the claim made against it by the plaintiff, Business Computers International Ltd., be struck out on the ground that the claim discloses no reasonable cause of action.

The circumstances which give rise to the claim are unusual. The second defendant claimed to be the assignee of a debt owed by the plaintiff. On 11 June 1986 the second defendant presented a petition to wind up the plaintiff. The petition was based on the plaintiff's failure to pay the alleged debt. In the petition the plaintiff's registered office was stated to be "65, Castleton Avenue, Wembley." The second defendant served the petition at 65, Castleton Avenue, Wembley. Subsequently the petition was advertised. On 21 July 1986 the petition came before the Companies Court. Nobody appeared for the plaintiff, and the usual winding up order was made.

No. 65, Castleton Avenue was not in fact the registered office of the plaintiff, which was at 5/7, Singer Street, London, E.C.2. The circumstances which gave rise to the error in the petition and to the service of the petition at 65, Castleton Avenue are not relevant to the application before me. Suffice it to say that the other defendants in the plaintiff's action include the Registrar of Companies, Monorell Ltd., whose registered office was at the material time 65, Castleton Avenue, and one of the directors of Monorell Ltd.

Having learnt of the winding up order the plaintiff at once applied to the Companies Court for the order to be set aside. The order was set aside. The plaintiff contends that it has suffered damage caused by the winding up order.

The writ in this action was issued on 4 February 1987 and was accompanied by a statement of claim. I will read the paragraphs of the statement of claim that plead the plaintiff's case against the second defendant:

"4.(a) On or about 26 June 1985 the plaintiff duly presented to the registrar form 4A, dated 26 June 1985, notifying the registrar that its registered office was 5/7, Singer Street, London EC2 (being the office of the plaintiff's accountants)"

Paragraphs 4(b) and (c) I need not, I think, read. The paragraph concludes:

"Such forms were all duly recorded by the registrar. . . . 9. The second defendant is and was at all material times a company engaged in the business of debt factoring. 10. At the material time the second defendant believed that there had been assigned to it by Trinitec Ltd. a debt owed to Trinitec by the plaintiff. (The plaintiff disputes that the debt to Trinitec was in fact owed by the plaintiff but such dispute is not material to these proceedings). 11. On a date unknown to the plaintiff, the second defendant, acting by itself or its agent, searched in the plaintiff's register at the companies registry and recorded the registered office of the plaintiff as being 65, Castleton Avenue, Wembley, Middlesex. . . . 13. On 11 June 1986, the second defendant presented a petition for the compulsory winding up of the plaintiff, based upon the aforesaid alleged debt. In so doing, the second defendant owed a duty to the plaintiff to take reasonable steps to ensure that the registered office of the plaintiff was correctly stated in the petition, that the matters alleged in the petition could be conscientiously verified and that the petition was properly served on the plaintiff's registered office. 14. In the petition it was falsely alleged that the plaintiff's registered office was 65, Castleton Street. The second defendant then purported to serve the petition at 65, Castleton Avenue aforesaid and subsequently advertised the petition. 15. The petition did not come to the notice of the plaintiff prior to its hearing in the High Court of Justice on 21 July 1986 at which hearing it was ordered, in the absence of the plaintiff, that the plaintiff should be compulsorily wound up. 16. On 23 July 1986 the plaintiff first became aware of the petition and that a winding up order had been made against it when it was so informed by the official receiver acting as provisional liquidator of

The prayer for relief claims damages for negligence.

The plaintiff's action against the second defendant is, therefore, an action in negligence. The alleged negligent conduct was the inclusion of the incorrect address in the winding up petition, the service of that petition at the incorrect address and the advertisement of a petition which had, in the event, never been properly served. The second defendant's application to strike out was dated 10 April 1987.

The question for decision is whether the pleading that I have read discloses a reasonably arguable cause of action against the second defendant.

Mr. Harris, for the second defendant, has presented an attractively simple argument. The alleged negligence was negligence in the presentation and prosecution of a winding up petition. A claim based upon the improper commencement or prosecution of legal proceedings can only be entertained as an action for malicious prosecution: malice is required. Negligence does not suffice. A tortious duty of care is not owed by one litigant to another.

Mr. Harris supported these propositions by references to authority. In Radivojevic v. L.R. Industries Ltd. (unreported), 22 November 1984; Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 514 of 1984, the first instance judge, Sir Douglas Frank Q.C. sitting as a deputy High Court judge, had dismissed the plaintiff's claim for damages against the defendants for maliciously bankrupting him. The Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiff's appeal. I have been supplied with a transcript of the judgments in the Court of Appeal. May L.J. said:

"Although such a claim does not come frequently before the courts, an action does lie in respect of injury to reputation caused by maliciously and unreasonably commencing liquidation proceedings against a company, or bankruptcy proceedings against an individual. It is necessary to show, first, that the proceedings terminated favourably in favour of the plaintiff; secondly that there was absence of reasonable and probable cause for bringing them; and thirdly, that there was malice or improper motive."

It is implicit in the decision that the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings or the presentation of a winding up petition cannot found an action in damages unless associated with malice.

It is clear also that a civil action can never be based on the falsity of evidence given in judicial proceedings. In Marrinan v. Vibart [1963] 1 Q.B. 528 the plaintiff alleged that two police officers had conspired to give false evidence about him, first in a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions, secondly at a trial at the Central Criminal Court, and, thirdly, at an inquiry before the Benchers of his Inn of Court. Salmon J. held that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action. The Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiff's appeal. Sellers L.J. cited with approval, at p. 536, the following passage from the judgment of Starke J. in Cabassi v. Vila (1940) 64 C.L.R. 130, 140-141:

"No action lies in respect of evidence given by witnesses in the course of judicial proceedings, however false and malicious it may be, any more than it lies against judges, advocates or parties in respect of words used by them in the course of such proceedings or against juries in respect of their verdicts. . . . the rule of law is that no action lies against witnesses in respect of evidence prepared (Watson v. M'Ewan [1905] A.C. 480), given, adduced or procured by them in the course of legal proceedings. The law protects witnesses and others, not for their benefit, but for a higher interest, namely, the advancement of public justice . . ."

In the present case the winding up petition must have been verified by an affidavit sworn on behalf of the second defendant. That affidavit must, therefore, have verified 65, Castleton Avenue as the registered

Scott J.

A office of the plaintiff. There must also have been an affidavit deposing to service of the petition on the plaintiff at its registered office. Both these affidavits must, if the plaintiff's pleaded case is right, have been negligently false. Marrinan v. Vibart [1963] 1 Q.B. 528 establishes that an action cannot be based on the falsity of these affidavits.

B Mr. Harris referred me also to Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 A.C. 191 in support of his submission that the negligent prosecution of an action cannot be made the basis of an action in damages for negligence. The facts of the case are too well known to need rehearsing. Lord Pearce said, at p. 268:

C "It is a hardship that a man who has done no wrong should be subjected by a plaintiff to a baseless charge, in meeting which he will incur large expense. The charge may be reported largely in the newspapers and injure his reputation . . . But the basic hardship is inevitable and will always remain, namely, that any plaintiff can use the legal machine as a sounding board for untruthful allegations and cause harm, trouble and expense to an innocent defendant, and yet the law holds him (and the press who report the case) immune from paying damages for their untruth. Yet to remove this immunity would create a great injury to justice. Without it, the honest litigant might not dare to bring an honest claim for fear that if he fails he might be sued for damages."

D Mr. Martineau for the plaintiff, emphasised that the plaintiff's claim in negligence against the second defendant was not based on the incorrect statement in the petition of the plaintiff's registered office and was not based on the falsity of the affidavit verifying the petition or on the falsity of the affidavit of service. He accepted that a claim so based would be barred by the authorities on which Mr. Harris relied. The plaintiff's claim, he said, was based on the second defendant's negligent failure to serve the petition on the plaintiff. That failure had deprived the plaintiff of the opportunity of taking steps to prevent the advertisement of the petition and the making of the winding up order. The need for a petitioner to take care that his winding up petition was properly served on the respondent company was, Mr. Martineau submitted, manifest. The potential damage to the respondent company if care were not taken demonstrated the need. Mr. Martineau distinguished Marrinan v. Vibart [1963] 1 Q.B. 528 as being concerned only with the position of witnesses. He distinguished Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 A.C. 191 as being concerned with a claim arising out of the conduct of a trial. There was, he submitted, no authority which prevented a duty of care in regard to proper service of proceedings from being imposed on petitioners.

H As to Mr. Harris's malicious prosecution point, the requirement of malice for malicious prosecution was, submitted Mr. Martineau, no more of a bar to the plaintiff's negligence action than the requirement of dishonesty in an action for deceit was a bar to an action for negligent mis-statement.

I accept that both Marrinan v. Vibart [1963] 1 Q.B. 528 and Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 A.C. 191 are distinguishable on their facts. And I accept that the availability of an action for malicious prosecution where malice can be shown is not a conclusive answer to the plaintiff's negligence action.

The propriety of the plaintiff's negligence action against the second defendant depends, in my judgment, on the proposition that a person who institutes legal process owes a duty of care to the respondent or defendant in regard to service of the proceedings. Naturally enough Mr. Martineau confined his submissions to winding up petitions. He accepted that bankruptcy petitions would be on all fours with winding up petitions. But he did not accept that the same principles would necessarily apply to ordinary actions. For my part, I can see no reasonable ground of distinction. Any and every inter partes originating process is capable of leading to an order against the defendant. If a defendant does not appear an order may be made against him in his absence. No doubt an affidavit of service would be required before the order was made. But if the affidavit was in regular form the court would not usually question whether the address given for service was the correct address. If the originating process gave the wrong address for the defendant and the service thereof was made at the wrong address, an order might well be made against the absent defendant. The order might cause considerable damage before it could be set aside. The damage could be said to have been caused by the negligent default of the plaintiff in correctly identifying the address of the defendant and in serving the originating process at that correct address.

In my view, if the second defendant owed a duty of care as alleged in the present case, every petitioner or plaintiff would have a like duty.

There is, as Mr. Martineau pointed out, no authority which establishes that an action for damage caused to a defendant by the negligent failure of a plaintiff to effect proper service on him of the originating process cannot be brought. Equally, there is no authority which establishes that such an action can be brought. Mr. Martineau relied, therefore, on the Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562 neighbour principle. It is foreseeable, he submitted, that failure to serve at the right address may result in damage to the defendant. So, he submitted, the neighbour principle established by Donoghue v. Stevenson justifies imposing on plaintiffs and petitioners a duty to take reasonable care to serve at the correct address. In my judgment, however, this argument is too superficial. A number of recent cases in the House of Lords and the Privy Council have established that foreseeability of harm does not of itself automatically lead to the imposition of a duty of care. In Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, Lord Wilberforce said, at p. 751:

"the position has now been reached that in order to establish that a duty of care arises in a particular situation, it is not necessary to bring the facts of that situation within those of previous situations in which a duty of care has been held to exist. Rather the question has to be approached in two stages. First one has to ask whether, as between the alleged wrongdoer and the person who has suffered damage there is a sufficient relationship of proximity or neighbourhood such that, in the reasonable contemplation of the former, carelessness on his part may be likely to cause damage to the latter—in which case a prima facie duty of care arises. Secondly, if the first question is answered affirmatively, it is necessary to consider whether there are any considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed or the damages to which a breach of it may give rise."

Scott J.

A In Governors of Peabody Donation Fund v. Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co. Ltd. [1985] A.C. 210, Lord Keith of Kinkel said, at p. 239:

B “Lord Atkin’s famous enunciation of the general principles upon which the law of negligence is founded, in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562, 580, has long been recognised as not intended to afford a comprehensive definition, to the effect that every situation which is capable of falling within the terms of the utterance and which results in loss automatically affords a remedy in damages.”

Lord Keith then referred to Dorset Yacht Co. Ltd. v. Home Office [1970] A.C. 1004, 1027 and to Lord Wilberforce’s remarks in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728, 751–752, and went on, at pp. 240, 241:

C “There has been a tendency in some recent cases to treat these passages as being themselves of a definitive character. This is a temptation which should be resisted. The true question in each case is whether the particular defendant owed to the particular plaintiff a duty of care having the scope which is contended for, and whether he was in breach of that duty with consequent loss to the plaintiff. A relationship of proximity in Lord Atkin’s sense must exist before any duty of care can arise, but the scope of the duty must depend on all the circumstances of the case. . . . So in determining whether or not a duty of care of particular scope was incumbent upon a defendant it is material to take into consideration whether it is just and reasonable that it should be so.”

E In Leigh and Silavan Ltd. v. Aliakmon Shipping Co. Ltd. [1986] A.C. 785, 815, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook said about Lord Wilberforce’s remarks in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council:

F “Lord Wilberforce was dealing, as is clear from what he said, with the approach to the questions of the existence and scope of a duty of care in a novel type of factual situation which was not analogous to any factual situation in which the existence of such a duty had already been held to exist.”

The present case involves, I think, that novel type of factual situation.

G The most recent decision is that of the Privy Council in Yuen Kun Yeu v. Attorney-General of Hong Kong, The Times, 11 June 1987 (now reported in [1987] 3 W.L.R. 776). Lord Keith of Kinkel is reported as saying this of Lord Wilberforce’s dictum in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] A.C. 728:

H “There were two possible views of what Lord Wilberforce meant. The first was that he meant to test the sufficiency of proximity simply by the reasonable contemplation of likely harm. The second was that he meant the expression ‘proximity or neighbourhood’ to be a composite one, importing the whole concept of necessary relationship between plaintiff and defendant described by Lord Atkin in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562, 580. The second view was the correct one. As Lord Wilberforce observed in McLoughlin v. O’Brian [1983] 1 A.C. 410, 420 it was clear that foreseeability did not of itself, and automatically, lead to a duty of care. Foreseeability of harm was a necessary ingredient of a relationship apt to give rise to a duty of care, but it was not the only one.”

Then a little further on in the report of the judgment Lord Keith is reported as saying:

"The second stage of Lord Wilberforce's test was one which would rarely have to be applied. One of those rare cases was Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 A.C. 191. Such a policy consideration was invoked in Hill v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (The Times, 21 February 1987 [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1126). In view of the direction in which the law had since been developing, their Lordships considered that for the future it should be recognized that the two stage test in Anns [1978] A.C. 728 was not to be regarded as in all circumstances a suitable guide to the existence of a duty of care."

In the present case Mr. Martineau is contending for a duty of care

"in a novel type of factual situation which [is] not analogous to any factual situation in which the existence of such a duty had already been held to exist:" per Lord Brandon in the Leigh and Silavan case [1986] A.C. 785, 815.

So, as Lord Keith observed in the Yuen Kun Yeu case [1987] 3 W.L.R. 776, the second stage of Lord Wilberforce's test becomes relevant. The right approach is, I think, summarily expressed by Lord Keith's dictum in the Peabody case [1985] A.C. 210, 241:

"in determining whether or not a duty of care of particular scope was incumbent upon a defendant it is material to take into consideration whether it is just and reasonable that it should be so."

Is it just and reasonable that a plaintiff should owe a duty of care to a defendant in regard to service of the originating process? I do not think that it is. The plaintiff and the defendant, the petitioner and the respondent, are antagonists. The plaintiff, or the petitioner, is seeking a legal remedy in an adversarial system. The system stipulates the rules and requirements that must be observed by the two parties. The plaintiff must issue his process and must serve it on the defendant. If there is default in service the process may be struck out. If an order is obtained without the prescribed rules or regulations having been observed, the order may be discharged or set aside, sometimes by an application at first instance, sometimes on appeal. The prosecution of the action or of the petition is subject throughout its career from institution to final judgment to judicial control. Service of process is a step, and usually an essential step, in the prosecution. It must usually be proved before an order can be obtained against an absent defendant. The proposition that a duty of care is owed by one litigant to another and can be superimposed on the checks and safeguards that the legal system itself provides is, to my mind, conceptually odd. The safeguards against ineffective service of process ought to be, and I think must be, found in the rules and procedures that govern litigation. The rules and procedures require that, save on ex parte applications, proof of service be shown before an order is made against an absent party. If the proof of service is false, be it through negligence or design, an order may be made that should not have been made. The injured party's remedy is to have the order set aside. An action for damages cannot be based on the falsity of the proof of service. Nor, in my judgment, can the adequacy of the efforts made to effect service be subjected to a tortious duty of care.

It would, I suppose, be possible for an undertaking in damages to be required to be given by every plaintiff or petitioner who obtained a final

3 W.L.R.

Scott J.

A order against an absent defendant or respondent in case the proof of service of process turned out to be false. If that were ever to become the practice it would protect parties in the position of the plaintiff. The practice would become part of the rules and regulations governing the prosecution of actions and would represent an additional safeguard against the damage that might be caused to a defendant by inadequate B efforts by a plaintiff to effect proper service. But there is no such practice.

C In Kelly v. London Transport Executive [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1055, Lord Denning M.R., in an obiter passage, suggested that a tortious duty of care might be owed by the solicitors of a legally aided party to the other party. This passage was commented on by Sir John Donaldson M.R. in Orchard v. South Eastern Electricity Board [1987] Q.B. 565. He pointed out that Lord Denning M.R.'s remarks were not supported by the other two members of the court, and then said, at p. 571:

D "I have quoted from the judgment [of Lord Denning M.R.] at some length for two reasons. First, because it provides a useful summary of the duties of a solicitor acting for a legally aided client. Whether that duty is owed to the opposing party is open to considerable doubt, at least where the solicitor is acting with the authority of his client and is not carrying on the litigation on his own account.
However, the duty is undoubtedly owed to the court (see Myers v.
Elman [1940] A.C. 282, 302 per Lord Atkin), the duty being to conduct the litigation with due propriety, and the court may, in the E exercise of its traditional jurisdiction over its own officers, order the solicitor to compensate the opposing party where the solicitor is in breach of that duty to the court."

F I take this passage from Sir John Donaldson M.R.'s judgment as supporting the view that I have endeavoured to express, namely, that control of litigation and of the various steps taken in prosecuting litigation lies in the court and the rules and procedures that govern litigation and cannot be sought via a tortious duty of care imposed on one party for the benefit of the other.

G This view is not, in my opinion, undermined but is reinforced by the facts of the present case. Mr. Martineau has submitted forcefully that the plaintiff has been damnified, through no fault of its own, and that, on the plaintiff's pleaded case, the damage would not have happened had the second defendant exercised proper care in ascertaining the correct address of the plaintiff's registered office. All this I am prepared to accept. But the damage of which the plaintiff complains was caused by the legal process instituted by the second defendant and by the winding up order made by the court. Damage of this character is not, H in my judgment, apt to be remediable in an action based on tortious negligence.

In my judgment, there is no duty of care owed by one litigant to another as to the manner in which the litigation is conducted, whether in regard to service of process or in regard to any other step in the proceedings. The safeguards against impropriety are to be found in the rules and procedure that control the litigation and not in tort. I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff's statement of claim does not disclose a reasonable cause of action against the second defendant and ought to be struck out.

TCB LTD. v. GRAY

NOTE

1987 June 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10;

Purchas, Nicholls and Russell L.JJ.

APPEAL from Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal of the defendant, Victor William Arthur Gray, from the decision of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. [1986] Ch. 621; [1986] 2 W.L.R. 517, who had given judgment for the plaintiff, TCB Ltd., on its claim on a personal guarantee given by the defendant to secure loans to two companies. The Court of Appeal upheld the Vice-Chancellor's findings of fact that the defendant had known and accepted that the guarantee would be unlimited and that he had given specific authority for it to be made unlimited, and further upheld the contention raised in the plaintiff's respondent's notice that the Vice-Chancellor could not on the evidence have concluded, had he considered the question, that it had been a term of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant that the guarantee was to be conditional on the validity of the debenture granted by one of the companies. It was not therefore necessary for the Court of Appeal to consider the issues of law dealt with by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. below, and it did not do so.

Negligence—Duty of care to whom?—Fireman—Occupier's negligence causing fire—Fireman injured while attending fire—Injury from steam from water played onto fire—Whether occupier liable for damages

E

The occupier of a small terraced house was using a blow lamp to burn off paint from the fascia boards beneath the eaves of his house and in so doing set fire to the premises. The fire brigade were called. Having been unable to locate the fire from the outside one of the firemen entered the house wearing breathing apparatus and protective clothing. He squeezed through a narrow hatch into the roof space, where the fire was confined, and played the hose onto the fire. When the fire had been extinguished, the fireman discovered that he had serious burn injuries from the scalding steam which must have penetrated his protective clothing. He brought an action against the occupier for damages alleging that the fire had been started by the occupier's negligence and that he had been injured as a result of that negligence. Nolan J., dismissing the fireman's action, held that the occupier owed the fireman a duty of care and was in breach of that duty, but that the fireman's injuries were not a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the breach. On his appeal, the Court of Appeal held that the fireman's injuries were reasonably foreseeable and entered judgment in the agreed sum of £12,902 plus interest.

F

On appeal by the occupier:—

G

Held, dismissing the appeal, that there was no principle which precluded professional firemen from recovering damages, from a person who by his negligent act had started a fire, in respect of injuries received as a result of fighting the fire, in that fire out of control, whether described as ordinary or exceptional, was inherently dangerous even to men with special skills, training and equipment; that regardless of the fact that the nature and severity of the injuries might not have been foreseen, the occupier, in using a blow lamp on the wooden rafters must have foreseen that there was a real risk of fire developing whereby firemen would be called who might have to enter the narrow roof space where they would be subject to the risks of injury inherent in that situation, of which a scalding injury was one; that there being a clear duty of care on the part of the occupier, with no break in the chain of causation, the occupier was liable to the fireman for the injuries sustained (post, pp. 1146F–G, 1147H–1148C, F, 1149H–1150B, 1152B–D, 1146F, 1152B–D).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the defendant, Robert Arnold Taylor, against the order of the Court of Appeal (Dillon, Stephen Brown and Neill L.JJ.) [1987] 2 W.L.R. 988 allowing an appeal by the plaintiff, Michael Chiagoro Ogwo, from the judgment of Nolan J. on 25 November 1985 dismissing his claim against the defendant for damages for personal injuries sustained and losses and expenses incurred as a result of an accident which occurred at 91, Laburnum Avenue, Hornchurch, Essex on 11 August 1982.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Lord Bridge of Harwich.

William Crowther Q.C. and Robert Moxon Browne for the defendant.
B. A. Hytner Q.C., John Leighton Williams Q.C. and Stephen Rubin for the plaintiff.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

19 November. LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN L.C. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge of Harwich. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons which he gives. I am glad to note that my noble and learned friend's reasoning accords with the opinion of Lord Guthrie in Flannigan v. British Dyewood Co. Ltd., 1969 S.L.T. 223.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I shall refer to the parties to the appeal before your Lordships as the plaintiff and the defendant. The defendant was the occupier of a small terrace house on two floors in Hornchurch. He attempted to burn off paint from the fascia boards beneath the eaves of his house with a blow lamp and in so doing set fire to the premises. The fire brigade were called and the plaintiff, an acting leading fireman, arrived with the first fire appliance. Smoke was coming from the house, but it was impossible to locate the seat of the fire from outside. The plaintiff and a colleague entered the house wearing

A breathing apparatus and the usual fireman's protective clothing and armed with a hose. In due course they located the seat of the fire in the roof space. The rafters to the rear of the house were well alight from the eaves to the ridge. The two firemen were able, with the aid of a step-ladder, to squeeze through a small hatch to get into the roof space and in due course to bring the fire under control by playing their hose on it. The heat within the roof space was intense until they were able to relieve it by kicking out some of the roof tiles, as they had been trained to do in such a situation. The plaintiff, although he did not realise it until after he came down from the roof, suffered serious burn injuries to his upper body and face from scalding steam which must have penetrated his protective clothing.

C The plaintiff's claim for damages was tried by Nolan J. who had no difficulty in finding that the defendant had negligently started the fire, but nevertheless dismissed the plaintiff's claim on the ground that the injuries he sustained were not a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the defendant's negligence. The Court of Appeal [1987] 2 W.L.R. 988 (Dillon, Stephen Brown and Neill L.JJ.) reversed the judge and gave judgment for the plaintiff in the agreed sum, inclusive of interest to the date of judgment, of £14,402. The defendant appeals by leave of your Lordships' House.

D The finding of negligence is not challenged. Mr. Crowther for the defendant, expressly disclaimed any intention to rely on the defence of volenti and accepted that the appeal turned solely on the issues of foreseeability, proximity and causation. He relied on the judge's conclusion as a finding of fact which an appellate court should not disturb.

E I find it convenient to examine the issues first in the light of basic and well established principles of general application and only later to consider the authorities concerned specifically with injuries sustained by professional firemen performing their duties in fighting fires occasioned by negligence. It is important, however, to emphasise at the outset that no suggestion of any kind is made of fault on the part of the plaintiff and the chain of events leading to his injuries must accordingly be considered on the footing that he himself acted throughout precisely as was to be expected of a properly trained and properly equipped fireman in the circumstances which confronted him.

F The trial judge expressed his conclusion on foreseeability in the following passage:

G "The question here is whether it could be foreseen that Mr. Ogwo, going up into the roof and remaining there, in conditions of intense heat, would suffer the burns from which he did suffer, even though he was a trained fireman and had been sent to a fire without extraordinary features. Here it seems to me that the plaintiff cannot succeed, because it seems that neither the plaintiff himself nor his colleague were able to foresee, looking into that apparently ordinary loft of an ordinary house, the danger that confronted them to the the extent of the injuries caused. Of course they saw there was danger, but they did not anticipate that Mr. Ogwo would come out badly burned, as he was."

H The emphasis added is mine and the words emphasised demonstrate where the judge appears to me to have fallen into error. The proper question to be asked is not whether the particular injuries sustained by the plaintiff were reasonably foreseeable, still less whether they were actually foreseen. As Lord Reid put it in Hughes v. Lord Advocate [1963] A.C. 837, 845, a negligent defendant "can only escape liability if the damage can be regarded as differing in kind from what was foreseeable." Of course, the plaintiff entering the loft did not foresee the nature or severity of the injuries he was going to suffer. As the judge said, he could see there was danger, but a man with the courage which a fireman must constantly be called on to show has no time in such a situation to reflect on the precise nature and extent of the risks he is running. Looked at, as it should be, from the point of view of the negligent defendant who started the fire in the loft, he could foresee that the fire brigade would be called, that firemen would use their skills to do whatever was both necessary and reasonably practicable to extinguish the fire and that, if this involved entering the loft and playing a hose on the fire, they would be subject to any risks inherent in that operation, of which the risk of a scalding injury was certainly one. This was a real risk occasioned by setting fire to the rafters of a small terrace house, a risk which the defendant could have avoided by elementary care and without difficulty or expense to himself and certainly not a risk which a reasonable man would brush aside as far fetched. It therefore satisfies the criterion of foreseeability posed as the test of remoteness by Lord Reid, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Overseas Tankship (U.K.) Ltd. v. Miller Steamship Co. Pty. (The Wagon Mound (No. 2)) [1967] 1 A.C. 617, 643-644.

Mr. Crowther also sought to argue that the defendant owed the plaintiff no duty of care. Here again, the case to me seems to fall clearly within the principle enunciated in the classic passage from the speech of Lord Atkin in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562, 580. The plaintiff was a person so closely and directly affected by the defendant's act that the defendant ought reasonably to have had him in contemplation as being so affected when directing his mind to the acts or omissions called in question, in this case using the blow lamp without taking care to avoid setting the rafters alight.

So far as causation is concerned, no more need be said than that the links in the chain of causation from the negligence which started the fire to the injuries which the plaintiff sustained were clearly continuous and unbroken.

On the face of it, therefore, this seems to me a straightforward case of a plaintiff to whom the defendant owed a duty of care suffering injury as a reasonably foreseeable consequence of a breach of that duty by the defendant.

The principal theme by which Mr. Crowther sought to avoid that conclusion was that, in the case of a professional fireman, a distinction could be drawn between the "ordinary" risks inherent in fire-fighting and "exceptional" risks created by some unusual feature of the fire which arises from the nature or condition of the premises where the fire occurs or in some other way. The submission, as I understand it, is that the party who negligently starts the fire is not liable to a professional fireman injured by the "ordinary" risks of fire-fighting, but only to one injured by an "exceptional" risk which the defendant could have foreseen and avoided by warning or otherwise. If the submission is well founded, Mr. Crowther has the advantage of a factual foundation for its application here in findings by the judge that there was nothing unusual about this fire, that there was no unusually combustible material in the

3 W.L.R.

Ogwo v. Taylor (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A loft and that attending fires in terrace houses was a regular part of a fireman's duties.

B The first case relied on in support of the submission is Merrington v. Ironbridge Metal Works Ltd. [1952] 2 All E.R. 1101, a decision at first instance of Hallett J. This was a claim by a fireman injured in fighting a fire at a factory where the defendants had allowed large quantities of fine dust containing aluminium and carbon particles to accumulate. The plaintiff was injured by a dust explosion caused, as the judge held, by the defendants allowing their premises to be in a condition which created "exceptional and serious risks" of fire and explosion. Having considered and rejected a defence of volenti, Hallett J. said, at p. 1104:

C "This may be a convenient moment to say emphatically that I do not accept the submission of leading counsel for the plaintiff that, if a fireman sustains injury as the result of performing his duty at a fire, he ipso facto becomes entitled to recover compensation from any person whose carelessness has caused the fire in question."

D This is the cornerstone of Mr. Crowther's argument that negligence in starting a fire to which the fire brigade have to be called can never, per se, be sufficient to establish liability in damages to a fireman injured by a hazard of a kind to which the inherent dangers of the fireman's profession necessarily subject him. There must always, so it is argued, be some extraneous or exceptional feature in the circumstances of the fire which imposes an additional hazard for which the tortfeasor can be held responsible.

E Further support for this view is sought in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hartley v. British Railways Board, The Times, 2 February 1981; Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Transcript No. 67 of 1981. There a railway servant, responsible for manning a station building, left it unattended without telling his employers that he was doing so and left a coal fire burning inside in an open stove. The stove was piled high with coal and a burning coal fell from it and set fire to the building. When the fire brigade were called by the railway authorities, they inquired whether the building was occupied and were told that it was. Consequently, on arrival at the scene, the plaintiff fireman was sent in to search the building for the servant believed to be still inside and in the course of the search he sustained the injuries which were the subject of the claim. The Court of Appeal, reversing the trial judge, held that the servant's negligence was responsible for the fire, but they founded their attribution of liability to the employers on the additional element of negligence on the part of the servant in failing to inform his employers that he was leaving the building unattended at a time when he was supposed to be on duty there. It was this failure, as the Court of Appeal held, which led foreseeably to the unnecessary search of the building by the plaintiff fireman and hence to his injury.

H Of course I accept that not everybody, whether professional fireman or layman, who is injured in a fire negligently started will necessarily recover damages from the tortfeasor. The chain of causation between the negligence and the injury must be established by the plaintiff and may be broken in a number of ways. The most obvious would be where the plaintiff's injuries were sustained by his foolhardy exposure to an unnecessary risk either of his own volition or acting under the orders of a senior fire officer. But, subject to this, I can see no basis of principle which would justify denying a remedy in damages against the tortfeasor responsible for starting a fire to a professional fireman doing no more and no less than his proper duty and acting with skill and efficiency in fighting an ordinary fire who is injured by one of the risks to which the particular circumstances of the fire give rise. Fire out of control is inherently dangerous. If not brought under control, it may, in most urban situations, cause untold damage to property and possible danger to life. The duty of professional firemen is to use their best endeavours to extinguish fires and it is obvious that, even making full use of all their skills, training and specialist equipment, they will sometimes be exposed to unavoidable risks of injury, whether the fire is described as "ordinary" or "exceptional." If they are not to be met by the doctrine of volenti, which would be utterly repugnant to our contemporary notions of justice, I can see no reason whatever why they should be held at a disadvantage as compared to the layman entitled to invoke the principle of the so-called "rescue" cases.

Mr. Crowther suggested it would be anomalous that a fireman should recover damages for injuries sustained in fighting a fire caused by negligence when his colleague who suffers similar injuries in fighting another fire of which the cause is unknown has no such remedy. If this be an anomaly, it is one which is common to most, if not all, injuries sustained by accident and is inevitable under a system which requires proof of fault as the basis of liability. The existence of the suggested anomaly is the strongest argument advanced by those who support the introduction of a "no fault" system of compensation. But it has no special application to the case of firemen.

At the end of the day I am happy to find my views in full accord with those expressed in the latest authority directly in point, which is the decision at first instance of Woolf J. in Salmon v. Seafarer Restaurants Ltd. [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1264. The facts and the grounds of the decision are conveniently summarised in the headnote, which I quote:

"The plaintiff fireman attended a fire at the defendants' fish-and-chip shop, which had been caused by the failure of the defendants to put out a light under a chip fryer before closing the shop for the night. While in attendance at the fire, the plaintiff was ordered by a senior officer to use a ladder to obtain access to the second floor, via a flat roof. As the plaintiff stood footing the ladder on the flat roof an explosion occurred, caused by the heat from the fire melting seals on gas meters on the premises and allowing gas to escape. The explosion caused the plaintiff to be thrown to the ground and sustain injury. He brought an action for damages for personal injuries alleging that the fire had been started by the defendants' negligence and that he had been injured as a result of that negligence. The defendants denied that they owed a duty of care to the plaintiff. On the question as to the duty owed by an occupier to a fireman attending at his premises to put out a fire:—

"Held, that notwithstanding the special training received by firemen to deal with the dangers inherent in fires, the duty owed by an occupier causing fire on premises to a fireman attending that fire extended to the ordinary risks and dangers inherent in a fireman's occupation and was not limited to a requirement to protect the fireman only against special, exceptional, or additional risks; that the fireman's special skills and training were relevant in determining liability but, where it was foreseeable that a fireman exercising

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A those skills would be injured through the negligence of the occupier, the occupier was in breach of his duty of care; that as the fire had been caused by the defendants' negligence and since it was foreseeable that the plaintiff would be required to attend the fire and would be at risk of the type of injuries he received from the explosion which was caused by the negligence, the defendants were liable for those injuries and damages were recoverable by the plaintiff."

I would particularly wish to adopt and indorse a passage in the judgment where the judge said, at p. 1272:

C "Where it can be foreseen that the fire which is negligently started is of the type which could, first of all, require firemen to attend to extinguish that fire, and where, because of the very nature of the fire, when they attend they will be at risk even though they exercise all the skill of their calling, there seems no reason why a fireman should be at any disadvantage when the question of compensation for his injuries arises."

D There was some discussion in argument before your Lordships as to whether in the phrase "because of the very nature of the fire" the definite article which I have emphasised might not have been superfluous and unintended. It is perhaps arguable that any fire, once out of control, may put firemen at risk and that accordingly it is "the very nature of fire" which makes the risk foreseeable. But I prefer the view that the judge was using language with his usual precision and accuracy and recognising that there may be some fires which, although calling for the services of the fire brigade, pose no foreseeable risk to firemen acting with due skill and care.

F The appellant's written case indicated an intention to rely on what is known as the "fireman's rule" as applied in the jurisprudence of some of the states of the United States of America and cited as the rationale of the rule the following passage from the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Jersey delivered by Weintraub C.J. in Krauth v. Geller (1960) 157 A. 2d 129, 130-131:

G "That the misfortune here experienced by a fireman was well within the range of foreseeability cannot be disputed. But liability is not always co-extensive with foreseeability of harm. The question is ultimately one of public policy, and the answer must be distilled from the relevant factors involved upon an inquiry into what is fair and just. . . . it is the fireman's business to deal with that very hazard [the fire] and hence, perhaps by analogy to the contractor engaged as an expert to remedy dangerous situations, he cannot complain of negligence in the creation of the very occasion for his engagement. In terms of duty, it may be said there is none owed the fireman to exercise care so as not to require the special services for which he is trained and paid. Probably most fires are attributable to negligence, and in the final analysis the policy decision is that it would be too burdensome to charge all who carelessly cause or fail to prevent fires with the injuries suffered by the expert retained with public funds to deal with those inevitable, although negligently created, occurrences."

H

In oral argument, however, Mr. Crowther did not feel able to derive any assistance from this source and, as I think prudently, did not pursue the matter.

In the Supreme Court of California in Walters v. Sloan (1977) 571 P. 2d 609 the "fireman's rule" was affirmed in the majority judgment delivered by Clark J., but was exhaustively analysed, criticised and rejected as unsound in the dissenting judgment of Tobriner Acting C.J. Having read those two judgments, I am left in no doubt whatever that the American "fireman's rule" has no place in English law.

I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

POLKEY APPELLANT

1987 Oct. 12, 13, 14; Lord Mackay of Clashfern L.C.,

Employment—Unfair dismissal—Redundancy—Selection for redundancy—Failure to consult employee prior to dismissal—Whether employers acting reasonably—Whether dismissal unfair—Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 (c.44), s. 57(3)¹ (as amended by Employment Act 1980 (c. 42), s. 6)

The employee was one of four van drivers employed since 1978 by a company dealing with components for the motor industry. In 1982, the employers decided to replace the four van drivers with two van salesmen and a representative. Only one of the van drivers was considered suitable for transfer to the new duties, and it was then decided that the other three van drivers, including the employee, would have to be made redundant. Without prior warning, the employee was called into the branch manager's office and informed that he had been made redundant. He was handed a redundancy letter setting out the payments due to him and sent home. On his complaint that he had been unfairly dismissed because he had been made redundant without any consultation, the industrial tribunal held that the employers had been in breach of their obligation to consult the employee under the provision of the code of practice. They went on, however, to consider whether, if there had been consultation, the result would have been any different, concluded that the result would have been the same and dismissed the employee's complaint. The employee appealed, contending that the industrial tribunal had applied the wrong test in inquiring whether the employee would have been made redundant if he had been consulted. The appeal tribunal dismissed the appeal, and the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by the employee.

On appeal by the employee:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the question that the industrial tribunal had to consider under section 57(3) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 was whether the employer had been reasonable or unreasonable in deciding that his reason for dismissing his employee was a sufficient reason, not whether the employee would nevertheless have been dismissed even if there had been prior consultation or warning within the code of practice; that whether the employer could reasonably have concluded that consultation or warning would be useless so that his failure to consult or warn would not necessarily render dismissal unfair was a matter for the industrial tribunal to consider in the light of the circumstances known to the employer at the time when he took his decision to dismiss; and that, accordingly, the matter should be remitted to a differently constituted industrial tribunal for consideration of the correct question (post, pp. 1156C–F, 1163E–F, H—1164A, E–G, 1165B–D, 1166E–F).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the employee, Dennis Polkey, by leave of the Court of Appeal (Neill and Nicholls L.JJ. and Sir George Waller) [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1147 from their decision on 22 October 1986 dismissing his appeal from the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Popplewell J., Mr. T. S. Batho and Mrs. M. L. Boyle) who on 2 October 1984 dismissed his appeal from an industrial tribunal. The industrial tribunal had dismissed his complaint that he had been unfairly dismissed as redundant by the respondent employers, A. E. Dayton Services Ltd. (formerly Edmunds Walker (Holdings) Ltd.).

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Mackay of Clashfern L.C.

Eldred Tabachnik Q.C. and Robin Allen for the employee.
Frederic Reynold Q.C. and John Wardell for the employers.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

19 November. LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN L.C. My Lords, the appellant was employed by the respondents ("the employers") from 19

3 W.L.R.

Polkey v. Dayton Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

A June 1978 until 27 August 1982 as a van driver. On that date he was dismissed as redundant. On 8 November 1982 he applied to an industrial tribunal to hold that he had been unfairly dismissed. On 23 February 1983 the industrial tribunal dismissed the application. It was accepted on behalf of the appellant before the industrial tribunal that at the time of his dismissal it was urgently necessary for the employers to reduce their overheads in their undertaking and that, in consequence, it was necessary to make certain of their van drivers redundant. They had three male van drivers and one female van driver and it was decided that for the future only two van salesmen should be appointed. The manager immediately responsible for the appellant decided that none of the three male van drivers was capable of performing the task of a van salesman but that the female van driver was so capable. Some four weeks after the appellant's dismissal a second van salesman was appointed from outside the employers' work-force. On 20 August the appellant's branch manager informed his superior of his decision and without any consultation with employees or their representative or earlier warning to the appellant his branch manager called him into his office on the afternoon of 27 August, told him quite out of the blue that he was redundant and handed to him his redundancy letter. The appellant was immediately driven home by a fellow employee. The industrial tribunal characterised this aspect of the appellant's dismissal by saying: "There could be no more heartless disregard of the provisions of the code of practice than that." The code of practice referred to is the statutory code presently in force under the Employment Protection Act 1975, Schedule 17, paragraph 4 in which paragraph 46 provides:

E "If redundancy becomes necessary, management in consultation, as appropriate, with employees or their representatives, should: (i) give as much warning as practicable to the employees concerned . . . ; (iii) establish which employees are to be made redundant and the order of discharge; . . ."

F The industrial tribunal further found: "There is nothing that excuses their failure to consult but"—this is the matter that gives rise to the point of principle in the present appeal—

G "at the end of the day we have no alternative but to find that in this case had they acted in accordance with the code of practice, as interpreted in the recent case [Williams v. Compair Maxam Ltd. [1982] I.C.R. 156], the result would not have been any different, and we have therefore unhappily to reject this application."

H The appellant appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal but on his behalf it was conceded that the appeal tribunal was bound by authority to dismiss the appeal. The only question the Employment Appeal Tribunal had to consider was whether to give leave to appeal which they did. The Court of Appeal, Neill and Nicholls L.JJ. and Sir George Waller [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1147, dismissed the appeal, held that they were bound by authority to do so, and granted leave to the appellant to appeal to this House.

This appeal raises an important question in the law of unfair dismissal. Where an industrial tribunal has found that the reason for an applicant's dismissal was a reason of a kind such as could justify the dismissal and has found that there has been a failure to consult or warn the applicant in accordance with the code of practice, should the tribunal consider whether, if the employee had been consulted or warned before dismissal was decided upon, he would nevertheless have been dismissed? The answer depends upon the application to this situation of section 57(3) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, as amended, which is in these terms:

“Where the employer has fulfilled the requirements of subsection (1), then, subject to sections 58 to 62, the determination of the question whether the dismissal was fair or unfair, having regard to the reason shown by the employer, shall depend on whether in the circumstances (including the size and administrative resources of the employer’s undertaking) the employer acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating it as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee; and that question shall be determined in accordance with equity and the substantial merits of the case.”

Where there is no issue raised by sections 58 to 62 the subject matter for the tribunal’s consideration is the employer’s action in treating the reason as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee. It is that action and that action only that the tribunal is required to characterise as reasonable or unreasonable. That leaves no scope for the tribunal considering whether, if the employer had acted differently, he might have dismissed the employee. It is what the employer did that is to be judged, not what he might have done. On the other hand, in judging whether what the employer did was reasonable it is right to consider what a reasonable employer would have had in mind at the time he decided to dismiss as the consequence of not consulting or not warning.

If the employer could reasonably have concluded in the light of the circumstances known to him at the time of dismissal that consultation or warning would be utterly useless he might well act reasonably even if he did not observe the provisions of the code. Failure to observe the requirement of the code relating to consultation or warning will not necessarily render a dismissal unfair. Whether in any particular case it did so is a matter for the industrial tribunal to consider in the light of the circumstances known to the employer at the time he dismissed the employee.

I turn to consider how these views accord with the decided cases. Very early in the history of this legislation and its statutory predecessors Sir John Donaldson in Earl v. Slater & Wheeler (Airlyne) Ltd. [1973] 1 W.L.R. 51, 57 said:

“With respect to the tribunal, we think that it erred in holding that an unfair procedure which led to no injustice is incapable of rendering unfair a dismissal which would otherwise be fair. The question in every case is whether the employer acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating the reason as sufficient for dismissing the employee and it has to be answered with reference to the circumstances known to the employer at the moment of dismissal. If an employer thinks that his accountant may be taking the firm’s money, but has no real grounds for so thinking and dismisses him for this reason, he acts wholly unreasonably and commits the unfair industrial practice of unfair dismissal, notwithstanding that it is later proved that the accountant had in fact been guilty of embezzlement. Proof of the embezzlement affects the amount of the compensation, but not the issue of fair or unfair dismissal.”

3 W.L.R.

Polkey v. Dayton Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Mackay
of Clashfern

A Again in Vokes Ltd. v. Bear [1974] I.C.R. 1, 5 Sir Hugh Griffiths, referring to the statutory predecessor of this section, said:

B “We are unable to accept the submission that ‘the circumstances’ are limited to those directly affecting the ground of dismissal, in the sense submitted by [counsel for the employers]. ‘The circumstances’ embrace all relevant matters that should weigh with a good employer when deciding at a given moment in time whether or not he should dismiss his employee. [Section 24(6) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971] is focusing the tribunal’s attention upon ‘the dismissal’, that is, the dismissal on March 2. The question they have to ask themselves is whether on March 2 the employers were acting reasonably in treating redundancy as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee on that date. The tribunal are entitled to take into account all the circumstances affecting both the employers and the employee at the time of the dismissal. In the present case, no doubt the time would have come when the employers would have to dismiss the employee for redundancy for the good of the company as a whole, but the tribunal were fully entitled to take the view that that moment had not yet arrived by March 2. The employers had not yet done that which in all fairness and reason they should do, namely, to make the obvious attempt to see if the employee could be placed somewhere else within this large group. The position is somewhat analogous to the case of a warning. An employer may have good grounds for thinking that a man is not capable of doing his job properly, but in the general run of cases it will not be reasonable for him to regard that lack of capability as a sufficient reason for dismissing him until he is given a warning so that the man has the chance to show if he can do better. So in this case there was a redundancy situation but there was no compelling reason why the axe should fall until the employers had done their best to help the employee. It is therefore with satisfaction that we find that there is nothing in the wording of section 24(6) of the Act of 1971 which compels us to take the view that behaviour which we think most people would consider manifestly unfair is nevertheless to be deemed fair under the Act. If the employers had made all reasonable attempts to place the employee in the group and had failed, then the time might have come when it would be reasonable for them to regard the redundancy as a sufficient reason for the dismissal, but until that moment had come the tribunal were entitled to take the view that it was not reasonable to dismiss for redundancy and accordingly that it was unfair.”

H This approach to the legislation was endorsed in this House in W. Devis & Sons Ltd. v. Atkins [1977] A.C. 931. Viscount Dilhorne, in a speech with which the other members of the House sitting on the appeal agreed, said of the statutory predecessor of section 57(3), at p. 952:

“[Paragraph 6(8) of Schedule 1 to the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1971] appears to me to direct the tribunal to focus its attention on the conduct of the employer and not on whether the employee in fact suffered any injustice.”

After quoting, with approval, the principal part of the passage I have already cited from Sir John Donaldson in Earl v. Slater & Wheeler (Airlyne) Ltd. [1973] 1 W.L.R. 51 and after referring to the statutory provision then entitling the tribunal to take the code into account Viscount Dilhorne said, at p. 955:

"It does not follow that non-compliance with the code necessarily renders a dismissal unfair, but I agree with the view expressed by Sir John Donaldson in Earl v. Slater & Wheeler (Airlyne) Ltd. [1973] 1 W.L.R. 51 that a failure to follow a procedure prescribed in the code may lead to the conclusion that a dismissal was unfair, which, if that procedure had been followed, would have been held to have been fair."

So far, the current of decision is entirely in accordance with the views I have expressed, but the tribunal in the present case were bound by a stream of authority applying the so-called British Labour Pump principle [British Labour Pump Co. Ltd. v. Byrne [1979] I.C.R. 347].

Browne-Wilkinson J. in Sillifant v. Powell Duffryn Timber Ltd. [1983] I.R.L.R. 91 thus described the principle, at p. 92:

"even if, judged in the light of the circumstances known at the time of dismissal, the employer's decision was not reasonable because of some failure to follow a fair procedure yet the dismissal can be held fair if, on the facts proved before the industrial tribunal, the industrial tribunal comes to the conclusion that the employer could reasonably have decided to dismiss if he had followed a fair procedure."

It is because one of its statements is contained in British Labour Pump Co. Ltd. v. Byrne that it has been called the British Labour Pump principle although it did not originate in that decision. In Sillifant's case the Employment Appeal Tribunal were urged to hold that the principle was unsound and not to give effect to it. After referring to the cases which introduced this principle, namely Charles Letts & Co. Ltd v. Howard [1976] I.R.L.R. 248, a decision relating only to compensation, Lowndes v. Specialist Heavy Engineering Ltd. [1977] I.C.R. 1, British United Shoe Machinery Co. Ltd. v. Clarke [1978] I.C.R. 70 and the British Labour Pump case itself, Browne-Wilkinson J. continued, at p. 97:

"Apart therefore from recent Court of Appeal authority and the Lowndes case, the British Labour Pump principle appears to have become established in practice without it being appreciated that it represented a fundamental departure from both basic principle and the earlier decisions. If we felt able to do so we would hold that it is wrong in principle and undesirable in its practical effect. It introduces just that confusion which Devis v. Atkins was concerned to avoid between the fairness of the dismissal (which depends solely upon the reasonableness of the employer's conduct) and the compensation payable to the employee (which takes into account the conduct of the employee whether known to the employer or not). In our judgment, apart from the authority to which we are about to refer, the correct approach to such a case would be as follows. The only test of the fairness of a dismissal is the reasonableness of the employer's decision to dismiss judged at the time at which the dismissal takes effect. An industrial tribunal is not bound to hold that any procedural failure by the employer renders the dismissal unfair: it is one of the factors to be weighed by the industrial tribunal in deciding whether or not the dismissal

A was reasonable within section 57(3). The weight to be attached to such procedural failure should depend upon the circumstances known to the employer at the time of dismissal, not on the actual consequence of such failure. Thus in the case of a failure to give an opportunity to explain, except in the rare case where a reasonable employer could properly take the view on the facts known to him at B the time of dismissal that no explanation or mitigation could alter his decision to dismiss, an industrial tribunal would be likely to hold that the lack of 'equity' inherent in the failure would render the dismissal unfair. But there may be cases where the offence is so heinous and the facts so manifestly clear that a reasonable employer could, on the facts known to him at the time of dismissal, take the view that whatever explanation the employee advanced it would C make no difference: see the example referred to by Lawton L.J. in Bailey v. B. P. Oil (Kent Refinery) Ltd. [1980] I.C.R. 642. Where, in the circumstances known at the time of dismissal, it was not reasonable for the employer to dismiss without giving an opportunity to explain but facts subsequently discovered or proved before the industrial tribunal show that the dismissal was in fact merited, D compensation would be reduced to nil. Such an approach ensures that an employee who could have been fairly dismissed does not get compensation but would prevent the suggestion of 'double standards' inherent in the British Labour Pump principle. An employee dismissed for suspected dishonesty who is in fact innocent has no redress: if the employer acted fairly in dismissing him on the facts and in the circumstances known to him at the time of dismissal the employee's innocence is irrelevant. Why should an employer be E entitled to a finding that he acted fairly when, on the facts known and in the circumstances existing at the time of dismissal, his actions were unfair but which facts subsequently coming to light show did not cause any injustice? The choice in dealing with section 57(3) is between looking at the reasonableness of the employer or justice to the employee. Devis v. Atkins shows that the correct test is the F reasonableness of the employer: the British Labour Pump principle confuses the two approaches."

I gratefully adopt that analysis. The Employment Appeal Tribunal, however, went on to hold that they were bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in W. & J. Wass Ltd. v. Binns [1982] I.C.R. 486 which G held that the British Labour Pump principle is good law and to that decision of the Court of Appeal I must now turn.

H In that case an employee was dismissed for misconduct which had occurred on the morning of the day on which he was dismissed. There was evidence of previous misbehaviour by the employee but the industrial tribunal held that the case had to be determined on the basis of what had happened on that morning and that the employers had acted reasonably and had fairly dismissed the employee even though they had not warned him about his previous misbehaviour or given him an opportunity to explain his conduct on that morning. The industrial tribunal decided that even if there had been an investigation the employee would still have been dismissed because on the balance of probabilities the employers would not have accepted his explanation and the dismissal was therefore fair. The Employment Appeal Tribunal reversed the decision of the industrial tribunal but the Court of Appeal,

Waller and O'Connor L.JJ. and Sir George Baker, Sir George Baker dissenting, restored the decision of the industrial tribunal. Waller L.J. said, at p. 493:

"[Counsel for the employer] submitted that the test in the British Labour Pump case goes further than section 57(3) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 requires, and submits that it is the statutory test which must be complied with. This in my opinion is strictly correct, and if the employer and the industrial tribunal are satisfied in an exceptional case that no opportunity to explain need be offered and that the employer in the circumstances acted reasonably in accordance with equity and the substantial merits of the case, the test would not apply. But since in the majority of cases fairness would require an opportunity to explain, as indeed many industrial contracts provide, then in such cases the British Labour Pump case provides useful guidelines. It was argued by [counsel for the employee] that the British Labour Pump case was itself not in accordance with the observations of Viscount Dilhorne in W. Devis & Sons Ltd. v. Atkins [1977] A.C. 931, 949-958. That case was dealing with a different point, namely, whether a dismissal can be justified as fair when the fact, or facts, are not known at the time of dismissal but are discovered afterwards. I do not find anything in the speech of Viscount Dilhorne which throws doubt on the reasoning of the decision in the British Labour Pump case."

O'Connor L.J. after holding that the employee's conduct on the morning of dismissal justified summary dismissal went on to consider the industrial tribunal's finding that the explanation proffered by the employee was not acceptable. He said, at p. 496:

"For my part I think that once the industrial tribunal made that finding they would have been entitled to say that the employee had not been prejudiced in any way by not being asked to explain his conduct and that the dismissal was fair. The industrial tribunal in fact applied the British Labour Pump Co. Ltd. v. Byrne test and found in favour of the employers. I can find no ground for disturbing that finding. I do not think that any question of law was raised before the Employment Appeal Tribunal. I am satisfied that the decision of the industrial tribunal was not perverse. I see no reason for disturbing it."

Sir George Baker said, at pp. 498-499:

"the failure to give the employee any opportunity to explain why he should not be dismissed seems to me to be in the circumstances of this case a denial of natural justice which eliminated equity or fair play. There are cases where instant dismissal without an opportunity of explaining would be fair. . . . Then there must be many cases where it is clearly for the tribunal to decide whether, in the words of Stephenson L.J. in W. Weddell & Co. Ltd. v. Tepper [1980] I.C.R. 286, 297, the employers have acted 'without making the appropriate inquiries or giving the employee a fair opportunity to explain himself. . . .' Viscount Dilhorne in his speech in W. Devis & Sons Ltd. v. Atkins [1977] A.C. 931. . . said, at p. 953: 'If, however, the reasons shown appear to have been a sufficient reason, it cannot, in my opinion, be said that the employer acted reasonably

Lord Mackay
of Clashfern

A in treating it as such if he only did so in consequence of ignoring B matters which he ought reasonably to have known and which would have shown that the reason was insufficient.' Like Waller L.J. I do not think that this throws any doubt on the reasoning in the later decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Slynn J.) in British Labour Pump Co. Ltd. v. Byrne [1979] I.C.R. 347 which the industrial tribunal in the present case purported to apply as the right test."

C He went on to conclude on the evidence, differing in this respect from his colleagues, that the evidence did not show that after the employee had given his explanation the employers would probably still have dismissed him and for this reason he held the dismissal was unfair.
The opinions of the Court Appeal thus do not add to the reasoning in the cases examined by Browne-Wilkinson J. in Sillifant.

D The only other Court of Appeal decision remaining for consideration that supports the British Labour Pump principle is that in the present case. The Court of Appeal [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1147 held themselves bound by the decision in W. & J. Wass Ltd. v. Binns and, in my opinion, they were clearly right in that aspect of their decision. Neill L.J., taking up the point which had been described by Browne-Wilkinson J. as the double standards aspect of the British Labour Pump principle, said, at pp. 1153-1154:

E "The question can then be asked: if an employer cannot justify dismissal and if an employee cannot complain of a dismissal on the basis of facts not known to the employer at the time of dismissal, how can it be right for an industrial tribunal to embark on the speculative exercise of examining facts which were not known to the employer at the time of dismissal in order to decide whether a procedural defect made any difference? At first sight, this question appears to require the answer that such an exercise would be contrary to the decision in W. Devis & Sons Ltd. v. Atkins [1977]
A.C. 931 because it would allow an employer to rely on facts not known to him at the time of dismissal, or, where an internal appeal procedure has been put in operation, not known to him at the time when the final decision to uphold the dismissal was taken. On further analysis, however, it seems to me that an answer on these lines overlooks the crucial distinction between the reason for a dismissal and the manner in which the dismissal is effected."

G After reference to the statutory provision he went on, at pp. 1154-1156:

H "It will be seen therefore that a complaint of unfair dismissal will succeed where the employer fails to establish that the reason for dismissal was one of those specified in section 57(2) or where the tribunal reaches the conclusion that even though the employer has fulfilled the requirements of section 57(1) he acted unreasonably in treating the reason shown by him as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee. But, on the other hand, a complaint of unfair dismissal will not succeed merely because of the manner in which the dismissal was carried out. A failure to observe a proper procedure may make a dismissal unfair, but this is not because such failure by itself makes the dismissal unfair, but because the failure, for example, to give an employee an opportunity to explain, may lead the tribunal to the conclusion that the employer, in the circumstances, acted unreasonably in treating the reason for dismissal as a sufficient reason. The tribunal will look at the practical effect of the failure to observe the proper procedure in order to decide whether or not the dismissal was unfair. Where an employee is dismissed for alleged misconduct and he then complains that he was unfairly dismissed, it is to be anticipated that the industrial tribunal will usually need to consider (a) the nature and gravity of the alleged misconduct; (b) the information on which the employer based his decision; (c) whether there was any other information which the employer could or should have obtained or any other step which he should have taken before he dismissed the employee. Similarly, in a case of alleged redundancy, it is to be anticipated that the industrial tribunal will usually need to consider (a) the information on which the employer based his decision to dismiss the employee as redundant and the method of selection which he used and (b) whether there was any other information which the employer could or should have obtained or any other step which he should have taken before he dismissed the employee. In some cases of misconduct, however, the misconduct may be so grave and the information available to the employer so clear that the tribunal will be likely to conclude that no further inquiries by the employer were necessary But in many cases of misconduct, the tribunal will need to consider whether the employer, either in accordance with some disciplinary procedure or otherwise, should have taken steps to obtain further information either from the employee or from elsewhere because such information might throw light on the sufficiency of the employer's reason for dismissal. But the failure to obtain this information does not ipso facto render the dismissal unfair, and it seems to me to be both logical and desirable to require the industrial tribunal to try to evaluate the effect in practice of the failure. Thus, as [counsel for the employees] acknowledged, there may be cases where the evidence of misconduct is not so clear as to justify instant dismissal and which could be capable of explanation, but where on examination, the employee has no explanation to put forward. In such a case, the failure to seek an explanation from the employee, which fairness would in principle require, will not make any difference. In a case where dismissal is on the ground of redundancy, the matter may have to be looked at rather differently because the system adopted for the selection of the individual for redundancy may be at the very centre of the inquiry when the tribunal comes to determine whether the employer has acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating redundancy as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee concerned. The decision of the appeal tribunal in Williams v. Compair Maxam Ltd. [1982] I.C.R. 156 demonstrates the importance of the use of a fair system. Furthermore, it is to be noted that section 59 of the Act of 1978 contains special provisions rendering dismissal on the ground of redundancy unfair But where section 59 does not apply, it seems to me to be proper and indeed necessary for the tribunal to investigate the effect of the failure to consult the employee or to warn him or to hold discussions or as the case may be. In some cases, the facts may show beyond peradventure that no discussions or other steps could have made any difference whatever because the

A state of the company was so grave. In other cases, the matter will be more evenly balanced. But, for my part, I can see no objection in principle to the tribunal seeking to evaluate the effect in practice of any failure by the employer to observe the provisions of a code of practice or of the guidelines prescribed in cases such as Williams v. Compair Maxam Ltd. . . . Prima facie, as the reason for dismissal was redundancy, the reason was a valid reason. The failure to consult did not automatically render the dismissal unfair; it was for the tribunal to determine whether that failure showed that the employers had acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating redundancy as a sufficient reason for the dismissal of the employee. For that purpose, they had to look at all the circumstances including the consequences of the failure."

C In my opinion, Neill L.J.'s answer on first sight was correct. With much of what he says I would respectfully agree but I cannot accept it all. For example in referring to a case of dismissal for misconduct where the evidence of misconduct could be capable of explanation and no explanation has been invited before dismissal the examination of which Neill L.J. speaks is an examination of matters other than the employer's conduct which could not be known to the employer until after the decision to dismiss had been reached and therefore were not available to the employer at the time he reached that decision. Perhaps the point is highlighted most plainly in the very last sentence which I have quoted. The consequences of the failure determine whether or not the employee suffered an injustice. This is not to be confused with the question whether the employer acted reasonably.

E Further, in my opinion, the statutory test shows that at least some aspects of the manner of dismissal fall to be considered in considering whether a dismissal is unfair since the action of the employer in treating the reason as sufficient for dismissal of the employee will include at least part of the manner of the dismissal. Accordingly, it is not correct to draw a distinction between the reason for dismissal and the manner of dismissal as if these were mutually exclusive, with the industrial tribunal limited to considering only the reason for dismissal. Nicholls L.J. agreed with Neill L.J. as did Sir George Waller. Sir George, however, added some observations. He said, at p. 1156:

G "The industrial tribunal, having inquired into what would have happened if the code of practice had been complied with, came to the conclusion that it would have made no difference. In other words, the employers acted reasonably in treating redundancy as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee."

H In my view, with great respect, these two sentences show that Sir George was treating the question whether the employee had suffered injustice as the same question as whether the employer had acted reasonably.

In my opinion, therefore, the additional reasons given by the Court of Appeal in the present case for supporting the British Labour Pump principle involve an impermissible reliance upon matters not known to the employers before the dismissal and a confusion between unreasonable conduct in reaching the conclusion to dismiss, which is a necessary ingredient of an unfair dismissal, and injustice to the employee which is not a necessary ingredient of an unfair dismissal, although its absence will be important in relation to a compensatory award.

It follows that I do not agree with the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case and this appeal should be allowed, the British Labour Pump principle and all decisions supporting it are inconsistent with the relevant statutory provision and should be overruled and, in particular, the decision of the Court of Appeal in W. & J. Wass Ltd. v. Binns [1982] I.C.R. 486 should be overruled.

That leaves for consideration the appropriate form of order to be made by the House. Counsel for the appellant asked that the House should hold that the appellant's dismissal had been unfair and remit the case to the tribunal to consider remedy. Counsel for the employers, while accepting that the British Labour Pump principle and W. & J. Wass Ltd. v. Binns were wrong and that accordingly the industrial tribunal had applied the wrong test in coming to its conclusion, submitted that on the findings of the tribunal supplemented by the evidence the tribunal were bound to hold that the dismissal was fair since a reasonable employer considering the facts known to this employer at the date of the dismissal could reasonably have concluded that observance of the code would make no difference to the conclusion.

The notes of evidence available to your Lordships are necessarily only a brief summary and the tribunal's findings do not deal exhaustively with all the matters that appear to have been raised in the evidence; in particular they do not deal with the evidence that appears to have related to an appeal by the appellant to the employers to rescind the dismissal. In these circumstances I consider that no adequate basis exists for your Lordships to determine whether this dismissal was fair or unfair. The industrial tribunal asked themselves the wrong question when they applied the British Labour Pump principle. It is not apparent what their answer would have been if they had asked themselves the correct question. In my opinion the proper course is to remit this case to a new industrial tribunal for consideration in the light of your Lordships' judgment. The respondents must bear the appellant's costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House.

LORD KEITH OF KINKEL. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of considering in draft the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree with it, and for the reasons he gives would allow the appeal and remit the case to an industrial tribunal differently constituted.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor and I agree with it. I add some short observations of my own because of the importance of the case.

Employers contesting a claim of unfair dismissal will commonly advance as their reason for dismissal one of the reasons specifically recognised as valid by section 57(2)(a), (b) and (c) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978. These, put shortly, are: (a) that the employee could not do his job properly; (b) that he had been guilty of misconduct; (c) that he was redundant. But an employer having prima facie grounds to dismiss for one of these reasons will in the great majority of cases not act reasonably in treating the reason as a sufficient reason for dismissal unless and until he has taken the steps, conveniently

A classified in most of the authorities as “procedural,” which are necessary in the circumstances of the case to justify that course of action. Thus, in the case of incapacity, the employer will normally not act reasonably unless he gives the employee fair warning and an opportunity to mend his ways and show that he can do the job; in the case of misconduct, the employer will normally not act reasonably unless he investigates the complaint of misconduct fully and fairly and hears whatever the employee wishes to say in his defence or in explanation or mitigation; in the case of redundancy, the employer will normally not act reasonably unless he warns and consults any employees affected or their representative, adopts a fair basis on which to select for redundancy and takes such steps as may be reasonable to avoid or minimise redundancy by redeployment within his own organisation. If an employer has failed to take the appropriate procedural steps in any particular case, the one question the industrial tribunal is not permitted to ask in applying the test of reasonableness posed by section 57(3) is the hypothetical question whether it would have made any difference to the outcome if the appropriate procedural steps had been taken. On the true construction of section 57(3) this question is simply irrelevant. It is quite a different matter if the tribunal is able to conclude that the employer himself, at the time of dismissal, acted reasonably in taking the view that, in the exceptional circumstances of the particular case, the procedural steps normally appropriate would have been futile, could not have altered the decision to dismiss and therefore could be dispensed with. In such a case the test of reasonableness under section 57(3) may be satisfied.

E My Lords, I think these conclusions are fully justified by the cogent reasoning of Browne-Wilkinson J. in Sillifant v. Powell Duffryn Timber Ltd. [1983] I.R.L.R. 91 to which my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has already drawn attention.

F If it is held that taking the appropriate steps which the employer failed to take before dismissing the employee would not have affected the outcome, this will often lead to the result that the employee, though unfairly dismissed, will recover no compensation or, in the case of redundancy, no compensation in excess of his redundancy payment. Thus in Earl v. Slater & Wheeler (Airlyne) Ltd. [1973] 1 W.L.R. 51 the employee was held to have been unfairly dismissed, but nevertheless lost his appeal to the National Industrial Relations Court because his misconduct disentitled him to any award of compensation, which was at that time the only effective remedy. But in spite of this the application of the so-called British Labour Pump principle [1979] I.C.R. 347 tends to distort the operation of the employment protection legislation in two important ways. First, as was pointed out by Browne-Wilkinson J. in Sillifant's case, if the industrial tribunal, in considering whether the employer who has omitted to take the appropriate procedural steps acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating his reason as a sufficient reason for dismissal, poses for itself the hypothetical question whether the result would have been any different if the appropriate procedural steps had been taken, it can only answer that question on a balance of probabilities. Accordingly, applying the British Labour Pump principle, if the answer is that it probably would have made no difference, the employee's unfair dismissal claim fails. But if the likely effect of taking the appropriate procedural steps is only considered, as it should be, at the stage of assessing compensation, the position is quite different. In that situation, as Browne-Wilkinson J. put it in Sillifant's case, at p. 96:

"There is no need for an 'all or nothing' decision. If the industrial tribunal thinks there is a doubt whether or not the employee would have been dismissed, this element can be reflected by reducing the normal amount of compensation by a percentage representing the chance that the employee would still have lost his employment."

The second consideration is perhaps of particular importance in redundancy cases. An industrial tribunal may conclude, as in the instant case, that the appropriate procedural steps would not have avoided the employee's dismissal as redundant. But if, as your Lordships now hold, that conclusion does not defeat his claim of unfair dismissal, the industrial tribunal, apart from any question of compensation, will also have to consider whether to make any order under section 69 of the Act of 1978. It is noteworthy that an industrial tribunal may, if it thinks fit, make an order for re-engagement under that section and in so doing exercise a very wide discretion as to the terms of the order. In a case where an industrial tribunal held that dismissal on the ground of redundancy would have been inevitable at the time when it took place, even if the appropriate procedural steps had been taken, I do not, as at present advised, think this would necessarily preclude a discretionary order for re-engagement on suitable terms, if the altered circumstances considered by the tribunal at the date of the hearing were thought to justify it.

For these reasons and for those given by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor I would allow the appeal and remit the case to be heard by another industrial tribunal.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would allow the appeal and remit the case to a new industrial tribunal.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would allow the appeal and remit the case to a new industrial tribunal.

KUMAR v. DUNNING AND ANOTHER

1987 Feb. 24, 25, 26;

*Landlord and Tenant—Assignment of lease or underletting—Effect of assignment—Sureties covenanting to pay tenant's unpaid rent—Landlord assigning reversion without expressly assigning surety covenant—Whether assignee of reversion entitled to benefit of surety covenant—Law of Property Act 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 62(1)*¹

C

The plaintiff assigned the unexpired residue of his underlease of business premises. The assignee covenanted with the head lessee to pay the rent and perform and observe the underlessee's covenants. Two sureties entered into a covenant with the head lessor to pay all losses, costs, damage and expenses occasioned to the head lessor by the non-payment of rent or breach of any obligation by the assignee. The head lessor subsequently sold the head lease without expressly assigning the benefit of the surety covenant. In 1982 the assignee went into liquidation and stopped paying the rent. The new head lessor demanded from the plaintiff the arrears of rent which had accrued since the assignee went into liquidation. The plaintiff paid that sum to the new head lessor and sought to recover it from the defendants, one of the sureties and the executor of the estate of the other surety, by commencing an action. The judge dismissed the plaintiff's claim.

On the plaintiff's appeal:—

F

Held, allowing the appeal, that the question whether, in the absence of express assignment, a benefit under a covenant (including the payment of money), could be enforced by the assignee of the immediate reversion, depended on whether the covenant touched and concerned the land or was merely collateral; that a benefit under a covenant was not collateral if the covenant was beneficial to the owner for the time being of the covenantee's land and to no one else; that, since the covenant by the sureties guaranteeing the performance of the tenant's covenants which touched and concerned the land was beneficial to no one but the owner for the time being of the covenantee's land, and the existence of that covenant and the right to payment thereunder increased the value of the landlord's reversion, that covenant itself touched and concerned the land and was enforceable by the new head lessor against the defendants; and that, accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the new head lessor and to recover from the defendants the sums paid as arrears of rent (post, pp. 1174c–d, 1175g–1176a, c, 1177d–h, 1180b–c, d–e).

APPEAL from Tucker J.

By statement of claim dated 28 September 1984 the plaintiff, Kerten Surendra Kumar, claimed against the first defendant, Kevin Edward Dunning and the second defendant, Pauline Marian Powell (sued as executrix of the estate of Brian Stanley Powell) and each of them, the sum of £6,461.04, being arrears of rent between 29 September 1982 and 25 March 1984 in respect of premises at 198/200, Earls Court Road, London S.W.5, interest thereon and costs. Each defendant denied that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief claimed or any relief. On 23 May 1986 Tucker J. dismissed the plaintiff's action.

By notice of appeal dated 25 July 1986 the plaintiff appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that the judge was wrong in law in holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the moneys claimed from the defendants either by way of indemnity or under the doctrine of subrogation, and that the judge was wrong in law in holding that the defendants' covenant did not touch and concern the land since the covenant inherently affected the value of the land and increased and enhanced the marketability of the lessee's interest in the land.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

Norman Primost for the plaintiff.

Wayne Clark for the first defendant.

W. A. Blackburne Q.C. and Robin Knowles for the second defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

3 W.L.R.

Kumar v. Dunning (C.A.)

A SIR NICOLAS BROWNE-WILKINSON V.-C. This appeal raises the question whether an assignee of the reversion on a lease can enforce the payment of rent by those who have entered into surety covenants guaranteeing performance of the tenant's obligations under the lease. The question has been raised in a number of recent cases at first instance. This is the first time it has come before this court.

B By a head lease dated 30 April 1970 the then freeholder demised to Old Kentucky Restaurants Ltd. ("O.K.") the premises 198/200, Earls Court Road, London S.W.5 for a term of 42 years. By an underlease dated 9 October 1970 O.K. demised part of the premises to the plaintiff for a term of 21 years from 30 April 1970 at an initial rent of £2,500 per annum with provisions for review. O.K. was defined as

C "the lessor which expression where the context admits includes the owner from time to time entitled in reversion immediately expectant on the determination of the term hereby granted."

The plaintiff was defined as "the lessee which expression where the context admits includes his successors in title." Clause 2(10) of the underlease contained a covenant against assigning or parting with possession of the premises in terms which were subsequently amended by agreement. As amended clause 2(10)(b) included a covenant against assigning or underletting the whole of the demised premises without the consent of the lessor and the superior lessor. Clause 2(10)(d) then provided:

E "For the purpose of such clause (10)(b) above the lessor may require the proposed assignee or under tenant to enter into direct covenants with the lessor and the superior lessor to perform and observe all the covenants and conditions herein contained on the lessee's part to be performed and observed."

F On 31 May 1978 the plaintiff assigned the unexpired residue of the underlease to Sundowners Ltd. ("Sundowners"). The licence to make such assignment was dated 7 June 1978 and is the critical document in this case. The licence is made between the then freeholder (defined simply as "the lessor") of the first part, O.K. (defined as "the lessee") of the second part, the plaintiff (defined as "the underlessee") of the third part, Sundowners (defined as "the assignee") of the fourth part and a Mr. Dunning and a Mr. Powell (defined as "the sureties") of the fifth part. Clauses 3 and 4 of the licence provide:

G "3. The assignee hereby covenants with the lessee that henceforth during the remainder of the term created by the underlease the assignee will pay the rent and perform and observe the covenants on the part of the underlessee and the conditions therein contained . . . 4. In consideration of the licence hereinbefore contained the sureties hereby jointly and severally covenant with and guarantee to the lessor and the lessee and with and to each of them as follows that is to say: (i) that the assignee shall at all times during the term created by the underlease duly pay the rent and will perform and observe all the covenants on the part of the underlessee therein contained, (ii) that the sureties will at all times hereafter so long as aforesaid pay and make good to the lessor and the lessee or either of them all losses costs damage and expenses occasioned to the lessor and the lessee or either of them by the non-payment of the said rents or any of them or any part thereof or the breach non-observance or non-performance of any of the covenants or conditions as aforesaid including the covenants hereinbefore contained . . .”

The defendants in this action are Mr. Dunning and the executor of Mr. Powell, the sureties under the licence. It is to be noted that neither Sundowners nor the sureties entered into any direct covenant with the plaintiff to perform the covenants in the underlease.

Sundowners went into liquidation on 24 November 1982 and has paid no rent since that date. At a date which is not known, O.K. assigned the head lease to Hedges and Butler Ltd. (“H. & B.”). The assignment of the head lease is not in evidence. The argument has, therefore, proceeded on the footing that there was no express assignment to H. & B. of the benefit of the surety covenants.

H. & B. demanded from the plaintiff, as the original underlessee, payment of rent accruing due since the winding up of Sundowners totalling £23,401.96. The plaintiff, having paid this sum to H. & B., in this action seeks to recover it from the sureties. The judge dismissed the plaintiff’s claim.

There is a substantial measure of agreement between the parties as to the relevant law. Mr. Blackburne, for the defendants, accepts (1) that the plaintiff, as the original underlessee, was liable to pay the rent to H. & B. as assignees of the reversion, notwithstanding the fact that the rent was largely in respect of a period before the assignment of the reversion to H. & B.; (2) that the plaintiff, having paid the rent, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of H. & B.: In re Downer Enterprises Ltd. [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1460; (3) accordingly, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed if, but only if, H. & B. as assignee of the immediate reversion were entitled to recover the rent from the sureties. Therefore, the only question we have to decide is whether, in the absence of any express assignment to H. & B. of the benefit of the surety covenants contained in the licence, H. & B. as assignee of the immediate reversion on the underlease is entitled to enforce the surety covenants in the licence.

Mr. Blackburne first argues that the surety covenants are purely personal covenants between the sureties on the one hand and O.K. on the other. As such, he submits, they were incapable of assignment either expressly or by operation of law. He relies primarily on the fact that, in the licence, “the lessor” and “the lessee” are defined as meaning simply the freeholder and the headlessee, O.K., respectively. He emphasises that, in contradistinction to the definitions in the underlease itself, in the licence there is no provision extending the definition of “the lessee” to mean the owner for the time being of the immediate reversion on the underlease. Therefore, he submits, the covenant by the sureties with “the lessee” is simply a covenant for the benefit of O.K. and was not intended to be capable of assignment to, or enforcement by, anyone other than O.K.

I have no hesitation in rejecting this argument. The benefit of a surety contract, like the benefit of any other contract, is normally assignable. The burden lies on Mr. Blackburne to show clear indications that in this case it was intended, contrary to the general rule, that only O.K. should have the benefit. I do not think the mere nature of the definitions by itself would be sufficient for that purpose. But, as Mr. Primost for the plaintiff has demonstrated, there are clear

3 W.L.R.

Kumar v. Dunning (C.A.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A indications that the surety covenant was intended to be for the benefit of the reversioners for the time being. The licence contains a recital that the consent of O.K. to the assignment was required "by reason of the covenant to that effect contained in the . . . underlease." Accordingly, the licence was entered into pursuant to clause 2(10) of the underlease, subclause (d) of which entitled "the lessor" (as defined by the underlease) to require an assignee to enter into a direct

B covenant with "the lessor" (as so defined) to perform the covenants in the underlease. Given the definition of "the lessor" as including the owner from time to time of the immediate reversion on the underlease, one would therefore expect clause 3 of the licence to be a covenant with "the lessor" as defined by the underlease, i.e. as including the owners from time to time of the reversion on the underlease. By

C clause 3 of the licence the assignee covenants "during the remainder of the term created by the underlease" to pay the rent and perform the covenants in the underlease. Accordingly, on its proper construction, clause 3 imposed on Sundowners, as assignee, an obligation to perform the tenant's covenants throughout the term of the underlease. In my judgment, it must have been intended that that obligation was to be for the benefit of the person who was for the

D time being entitled to the reversion on the underlease. When one turns to the surety covenant in clause 4 of the licence, one finds the sureties guaranteeing to "the lessee" that the assignee will perform the covenants "at all times during the term created by the underlease" and "at all times hereafter so long as aforesaid." In my judgment, it is clear that the intention was to guarantee performance of the covenants throughout the term, whoever was the reversioner. There is no

E ground for saying that the intention was that the liability under the surety covenant was to last only so long as O.K. was entitled to the immediate reversion.

For these reasons, in my judgment, the surety covenant was capable of assignment, and was not a covenant intended to be for the benefit of O.K. alone.

F The crucial question is whether the benefit of the surety covenant has become vested in H. & B. as assignee of the reversion on the underlease. There is no privity of contract or estate between H. & B. and the sureties. Nor, it must be assumed, has there been any express assignment to H. & B. of the benefit of the surety covenant. How, then, can H. & B. enforce the surety covenant against the sureties?

G Mr. Primost puts his case in four different ways: (1) that, whatever the terms of the assignment of the reversion by O.K. to H. & B., section 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925 operated to assign to H. & B. the benefit of the covenant as being a right "appertaining or reputed to appertain" to the land; (2) that section 189(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925 annexed the benefit of the surety covenant to the land; (3) that the surety covenant touches and concerns the land and accordingly the H benefit of the covenant passed with the reversion to H. & B.; (4) the principle in Griffith v. Pelton [1958] Ch. 205 enables H. & B. to enforce the covenant. I will deal with these submissions in turn.

(1) Section 62 of the Law of Property Act 1925

Section 62 has the side heading "General words implied in conveyances." Subsection (1) reads:

"A conveyance of land shall be deemed to include and shall by virtue of this Act operate to convey, with the land, all buildings, erections, fixtures, commons, hedges, ditches, fences, ways, waters, watercourses, liberties, privileges, easements, rights, and advantages whatsoever, appertaining or reputed to appertain to the land, or any part thereof, or, at the time of conveyance, demised, occupied, or enjoyed with, or reputed or known as part or parcel of or appurtenant to the land or any part thereof."

The main intention of section 62 was to provide a form of statutory shorthand rendering it unnecessary to include such words expressly in every conveyance. It is a matter of debate whether, in the context of the section, the words "rights . . . appertaining to the land" include rights arising under covenant as opposed to strict property rights. However, I will assume, without deciding, that rights under covenant are within the words of the section. Even on that assumption, it still has to be shown that the right "appertains to the land." In my judgment, a right under covenant cannot appertain to the land unless the benefit is in some way annexed to the land. If the benefit of a covenant passes under section 62 even if not annexed to the land, the whole modern law of restrictive covenants would have been established on an erroneous basis. Section 62(1) replaces section 6(1) of the Conveyancing Act 1881. If the general words "rights . . . appertaining to land" operate to transfer the benefit of a negative restrictive covenant, whether or not such benefit was expressly assigned, it would make all the law developed since 1881 unnecessary. It is established that, in the absence of annexation to the land or the existence of a building scheme, the benefit of a restrictive covenant cannot pass except by way of express assignment. The law so established is inconsistent with the view that a covenant, the benefit of which is not annexed to the land, can pass under the general words in section 62.

Therefore, in my judgment, the plaintiff cannot rely on section 62 unless, at the least, he can show that the surety covenant touches and concerns the land so as to be capable of annexation, a point which I consider at (3) below.

(2) Section 189(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925

The subsection reads:

"The benefit of all covenants and powers given by way of indemnity against a rent or any part thereof payable in respect of land, or against the breach of any covenant or condition in relation to land, is and shall be deemed always to have been annexed to the land to which the indemnity is intended to relate, and may be enforced by the estate owner for the time being of the whole or any part of that land, notwithstanding that the benefit may not have been expressly apportioned or assigned to him or to any of his predecessors in title."

The plaintiff submits that the surety covenant in this case is a covenant "by way of indemnity against a rent . . . payable in respect of land" and, therefore, the benefit of such covenant, being annexed to the land, has passed to H. & B. There is a question whether a surety covenant guaranteeing to A performance by B of B's covenant to A is an "indemnity" to A within the meaning of the section. But, in any

3 W.L.R.

Kumar v. Dunning (C.A.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A event, Mr. Blackburne has satisfied me that section 189(2) is not of general application but is directed only to a specific type of case, i.e., a case where land charged with a rent has been divided. In the absence of provision to the contrary, on the division of land subject to a charge for rent each part of the land remains liable to the person to whom the rent is payable for the whole amount of the rent. Before 1925 in such a case
B those liable for the rent used to agree an apportionment of the liability between them similar to those now implied by the Law of Property Act 1925, section 77 and Schedule 2. After 1925, the benefit of such implied covenants for indemnity arising on the severance of land charged with the rent is annexed to the land of the covenantee: see section 77(5).
C Section 189(2) produces the same annexation where, on the severance of the land charged, the indemnities have been given expressly and not merely by way of implication. In my judgment, read in the context of the Act as a whole, the effect of section 189(2) is limited to those indemnities against liability to pay a rent where land subject to a single rent has been divided. The section, therefore, does not touch the present case.

D 3. Does the surety covenant touch and concern the land?

Mr. Primost submits that the surety covenant “touches and concerns” the reversion to the underlease in consequence of which the benefit of such covenant passed to H. & B. automatically on the assignment of the reversion. As a result, he submits, H. & B. is entitled to sue the sureties.

E It must be noted that there is no privity of contract between H. & B. and the sureties. Nor is there privity of estate. Accordingly, the Grantees of Reversions Act 1540 (now sections 141 and 142 of the Law of Property Act 1925) is not directly in point. Those provisions only apply F to covenants between landlord and tenant. Where there is neither privity of contract nor privity of estate, the benefit of a covenant runs with the land of the covenantee at law if, but only if, the covenant touches and concerns the land of the covenantee: Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property, 5th ed. (1984), pp. 764–765. Such a covenant, if it does touch and concern the land, is enforceable by an assignee of the land against the covenantor, whether or not the covenantor has any land:
G Smith v. River Douglas Catchment Board [1949] 2 K.B. 500. Although this case is not concerned directly with covenants between landlord and tenant, authorities on the latter type of case are in point: as between landlord and tenant only covenants which touch and concern the land are enforceable.

H The test whether a covenant touches and concerns land is that formulated by Bayley J. in Congleton Corporation v. Pattison (1808) 10 East 130 and adopted by Farwell J. in Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch.
388, 395:

“the covenant must either affect the land as regards mode of occupation, or it must be such as per se, and not merely from collateral circumstances, affects the value of the land.”

But although the test is certain, its exact meaning when applied to different sets of circumstances is very obscure. In Grant v. Edmondson [1931] 1 Ch. 1, 28 Romer L.J. said:

"In connection with the subject of covenants running with land, it is impossible to reason by analogy. The established rules concerning it are purely arbitrary, and the distinctions, for the most part, quite illogical."

Before seeking to analyse the authorities, I will first state how the matter strikes me as a matter of impression. The surety covenant is given as a support or buttress to covenants given by a tenant to a landlord. The covenants by the tenant relate not only to the payment of rent, but also to repair, insurance and user of the premises. All such covenants by a tenant in favour of the landlord touch and concern the land, i.e., the reversion of the landlord. The performance of some covenants by tenants relates to things done on the land itself (e.g., repair and user covenants). Other tenants' covenants (e.g., payment of rent and insurance) require nothing to be done on the land itself. They are mere covenants for the payment of money. The covenant to pay rent is the major cause of the landlord's reversion having any value during the continuance of the term. Where there is privity of estate, the tenants' covenant to pay rent touches and concerns the land: Parker v. Webb (1822) 3 Salk. 4. As it seems to me, in principle a covenant by a third party guaranteeing the performance by the tenant of his obligations should touch and concern the reversion as much as do the tenants' covenants themselves.

This view accords with what, to my mind, is the commercial common sense and justice of the case. When, as in the present case, the lease has been assigned on the terms that the sureties will guarantee performance by the assignee of the lease, justice and common sense ought to require the sureties, not the original tenant, to be primarily liable in the event of default by the assignee. So long as the reversion is not assigned, that will be the position. Why should the position between the original tenant and the sureties be rendered completely different just because the reversion has been assigned, a transaction wholly outside the control of the original tenant and the sureties?

Yet in all save one of the cases decided at first instance, the court has held that the surety covenant does not touch and concern the land. The exception is Pinemain Ltd. v. Tuck (unreported), 4 March 1986, a decision of Michael Wheeler Q.C. where the question was left open. In Pinemain Ltd. v. Welbeck International Ltd. (1984) 272 E.G. 1166, Edward Nugee Q.C., sitting as a deputy High Court judge, held that the surety covenant did not touch and concern the land. He held that for a positive covenant to run at law (as opposed to a negative covenant running with the land in equity) it was necessary that the covenant should require something to be done which affected the land itself, not merely its value. I find this view difficult to reconcile with those cases which establish that a tenant's covenant to pay rent and to insure touch and concern the land. Moreover, Mr. Nugee's view is, to my mind, inconsistent with the decision in Dyson v. Forster [1909] A.C. 98 which I will mention later.

In In re Distributors and Warehousing Ltd. (1986) 278 E.G. 1363 Walton J. held that a surety covenant did not touch and concern the land. He pointed out that payment by a surety does not constitute payment of rent by the tenant. He held that the subject matter of the surety covenant was not the land, but the tenant's covenants themselves. He held, in the absence of authority being cited to him, that a covenant

3 W.L.R.

Kumar v. Dunning (C.A.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A at "this double remove" could not itself touch and concern the land. In the present case, Tucker J. followed this reasoning. I will refer later to certain authorities not cited to Walton J. which might well have led him to a different conclusion.

B In Coastplace Ltd. v. Hartley [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1289 French J. held that the surety covenant did not touch and concern the land because it affected the value of the land not per se but by a collateral circumstance. He held that as the value of the surety covenant depended on the ability of the surety to meet his obligations, which might vary from time to time, the value of the covenant was due to a collateral matter. I cannot agree that the variations in the surety's ability to meet his liability necessarily lead to the conclusion that the value of the covenant to the land is collateral. Exactly the same can be said of the tenant's own
C covenant to pay rent. Yet such covenants do touch and concern the land and, therefore, cannot be said merely to affect the value collaterally.

Reverting to the test laid down in Congleton Corporation v. Pattison, 10 East 130, it is clear that the surety covenant in the present case does not "affect the land as to the mode of occupation." The question is whether it affects the value of the reversion "per se and not merely from collateral circumstances." The meaning of those latter words has been
D expounded in a number of cases which have not often been cited subsequently. In Vernon v. Smith (1821) 5 B. & Ald. 1 the question was whether a covenant by the tenant to insure the demised premises was enforceable by the assignee of the reversion. Although the case was one of privity of estate, the enforceability of the covenant depended on whether the covenant touched and concerned the land. It was argued that the covenant was merely to pay money to a third party. The E majority of the court decided that the covenant was enforceable on the narrow point that the assignee of the reversion would have an interest in the insurance money. Best J., whilst agreeing on that point, also held that apart from that special factor, the insurance covenant touched and concerned the land. He said, at p. 9:

F "A covenant in a lease which the covenantee cannot, after his assignment, take advantage of, and which is beneficial to the assignee as such, will go with the estate assigned. If this were not the law, the tenant would hold the estate discharged from the performance of one of the conditions on which it was granted to him. The original covenantee could not avail himself of this G covenant: he sustains no loss by the destruction of the buildings, and therefore has no interest to have them insured."

Later he said, at p. 10:

"If a court of equity will not interfere, either for the one or the other, still this covenant is as beneficial to an assignee as it was to the covenantee. It secures to the tenant the means of performing his covenant, and to the landlord, a solvent instead of a ruined tenant. It is a covenant beneficial, to the owner of the estate, and to no one H but the owner of the estate; and therefore may be said to be beneficial to the estate, and so directly within the principle on which covenants are made to run with the land."

Finally he said, at p. 11:

"The covenant here mentioned is not beneficial to the estate granted, in the strictest sense of the words, because it has no effect until that estate is at an end, but it is beneficial to the owner, as owner, and to no other person. By the terms collateral covenants, which do not pass to the assignee, are meant such as are beneficial to the lessor without regard to his continuing the owner of the estate. This principle will reconcile all the cases.”

In Vyvyan v. Arthur (1823) 1 B. & C. 410, 417 Best J. repeated this test in the following words:

“The general principle is, that if the performance of the covenant be beneficial to the reversioner, in respect of the lessor’s demand, and to no other person, his assignee may sue upon it; but if it be beneficial to the lessor, without regard to his continuing owner of the estate, it is a mere collateral covenant, upon which the assignee cannot sue.”

The test laid down by Best J. is, in my judgment, a sound one which in the normal case will provide a satisfactory yardstick for differentiating between those covenants which touch and concern the land in the true sense and those which are merely collateral.

The test has received the approval of the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in Forster v. Elvet Colliery Co. Ltd. [1908] 1 K.B. 629, affirmed sub nom. Dyson v. Forster [1909] A.C. 98. In that case, the owner of minerals, who did not own the surface, granted a lease of the minerals. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant with the lessor and with the owners or occupiers for the time being of the surface, to pay compensation for damage caused to the surface by working the minerals. The defendant was the assignee of the term: the plaintiffs included persons who were for the time being surface owners but who had acquired their land since the date of the lease. The case, therefore, was like the present in that there was privity of neither contract nor estate between the plaintiffs and the defendant. Moreover, the covenant did not require the doing of any work but merely the payment of compensation for damage done to land which was not the land of the landlord. It was held that the surface owners were entitled to enforce the covenant against the defendant. In the Court of Appeal Cozens-Hardy M.R. said, at p. 635:

“It is old law that in cases not between lessor and lessee the benefit of a covenant will pass if and in so far as it necessarily affects the value of the land, in this sense, that the owner of the land would get more for his land by reason of the covenant being attached to and annexed to it. . . . I see no reason why the covenant to pay compensation for damage caused by the subsidence of the surface should not be a covenant to which this principle applies. The analogy of a covenant to insure against fire, which has been held to be a covenant which runs with the land as between lessor and lessee—Vernon v. Smith, 5 B. & Ald. 1—seems to be rather close.”

Farwell L.J. said, at p. 640:

“I am further of opinion that the benefit of these covenants as between the present plaintiffs and the present defendants in all the actions does run with the land. They certainly fulfil the first requisite—namely, they are ‘such as per se and not merely from collateral circumstances affect the value of the land’: Congleton

3 W.L.R.

Kumar v. Dunning (C.A.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A Corporation v. Pattison, 10 East 130, 138. There is nothing in the fact that the covenant sounds in damages to prevent it from so running—see The Prior's Case, Co. Litt. 385a where it was said that ‘the remedie by covenant doth runne with the land to give dammages to the partie grieved’ . . . and all the covenants for title and quiet enjoyment sound in damages and run with the land.”

B In the House of Lords, Lord Macnaghten in his speech, with which the other members of the House concurred, said [1909] A.C. 98, 102:

C “The question is, Does this covenant affect the nature, quality, or value of the land, or is it a covenant simply collateral? It is not, I think, simply collateral, for one reason which is sometimes proposed as a test for the purpose of determining whether a covenant runs with the land or not. It is beneficial to the surface owner and beneficial to no one else: see Vyvyan v. Arthur, 1 B. & C. 410, 417, per Best J. . . . I also think that the covenant affects the value of the land in respect of which it was given. Suppose the land, being properly drained, were to be let for agricultural purposes, a tenant, I should suppose, would be more likely to take it and would probably give more for it if he were assured that compensation would be payable in the event of the drainage system being dislocated by subsidence. Similar considerations would apply if the land were to be let for building purposes.”

E It is clear, therefore, that the House of Lords was accepting the test of what was collateral laid down by Best J. in Vyvyan v. Arthur, 1 B. & C. 410.

F From these authorities I collect two things. First, that the acid test whether or not a benefit is collateral is that laid down by Best J., namely, is the covenant beneficial to the owner for the time being of the covenantee’s land, and to no one else? Secondly, a covenant simply to pay a sum of money, whether by way of insurance premium, compensation or damages, is a covenant capable of touching and concerning the land provided that the existence of the covenant, and the right to payment thereunder, affects the value of the land in whomsoever it is vested for the time being. Therefore, in my judgment, these cases (which were not cited to Walton J.) show that he was in error in holding that a covenant at double remove could not touch and concern the land.

G Applying the test laid down by Best J., a covenant by a surety securing the performance of a tenant’s covenants in a lease satisfies it. The surety covenant increases the value of the reversion in that the landlord can look not only to the tenant but also to the sureties for the payment of a sum equal to the rent and for damages for failure to comply with the other tenant’s covenants. Such surety covenant is of value to no one other than the owner for the time being of the reversion

H since it is in support of the tenant’s covenants and the tenant’s covenants can only be enforced by the reversioner for the time being. Once the lease has been assigned, the assignor cannot enforce the tenant’s covenants in respect of breaches occurring after the date of assignment and a fortiori cannot enforce the surety covenant. No one other than the landlord can enforce the surety covenant. The fact that it is a covenant only to pay a sum of money or damages is not inconsistent with it touching and concerning the land.

Mr. Blackburne cited a number of cases which, he submitted, were inconsistent with this conclusion. He submitted, in reliance on Woodall v. Clifton [1905] 2 Ch. 257, that an option to purchase the freehold contained in a lease did not run with the land. In that case, an assignee of the lease sought to exercise an option to purchase the freehold against the assignee of the reversion. This court held that the action failed because the option to purchase the freehold did not touch and concern the land in question. They identified the land to be touched and concerned as being the term granted by the lease: see p. 279. In my judgment, that decision does not impinge on the present case but depends wholly on the fact that the court held that the land to be touched and concerned had to be the term of years: the right to purchase the freehold could not touch and concern the term of years: it was "something wholly outside the relation of landlord and tenant."

In Thomas v. Hayward (1869) L.R. 4 Ex. 311 a covenant by the lessor of a public house not to use adjoining land for the sale of liquor was held not to touch and concern the land because its value to the tenant was collateral: it related to the business he carried on, not to the land itself. The decision was a hard one and is to be treated as authority for no more than that a covenant the value of which is wholly dependent on the use of the land for a specific business is collateral.

Next Mr. Blackburne relied on Dewar v. Goodman [1909] A.C. 72. In that case, a head lease contained a covenant by the head lessee to repair all buildings erected on the land, which numbered some 211 in total. The head lessee granted an underlease of two of the houses and covenanted with the underlessee to perform the covenants in the head lease so far as they related to premises not comprised in the underlease. The plaintiff was the assignee of the underlease: the defendant was the assignee of the head lease. Because of a breach of the covenant to repair in the head lease, the freeholder forfeited the head lease and ejected the plaintiff. The plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for breach of the lessor's covenant to perform the covenants in the head lease did not touch and concern the land in the underlease because it did not require anything to be done on the land demised: the covenant related to the buildings other than those contained in the underlease. Surprisingly, there is little discussion of the second limb of the test in Congleton Corporation v. Pattison (1808) 10 East 130, i.e., that it is sufficient if the covenant per se affects the value of the land even though this does not involve doing anything on the land of the covenantee itself. Even more surprisingly, although both cases were decided within months of each other and the argument and decision in the House of Lords in Dewar v. Goodman [1909] A.C. 72 was given after the argument in the House of Lords in Dyson v. Forster [1909] A.C. 98, in neither case is the other referred to, although Lord Loreburn L.C. was party to both decisions.

I find the two cases very difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile. The performance of the covenant by the head lessee in Dewar v. Goodman [1909] A.C. 72 was manifestly of value to the underlessee for the time being and to no one else. Yet this point is not dealt with in the judgment. The distinction may lie in this. In Dewar v. Goodman the doing of the covenanted act did not benefit the land of the covenantee as such but only his estate in it. The covenant was to repair adjoining premises: the breach of the covenant did not affect the land comprised in the underlease but merely led to a forfeiture of the estate in the land.

3 W.L.R.

Kumar v. Dunning (C.A.)

Sir Nicolas
Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.

A In Dyson v. Forster [1909] A.C. 98 on the other hand, the covenant benefited the owner of the surface land whatever his estate in it, e.g. it enabled him to let the land at a better price. The distinction, if any, is therefore between a covenant which operates only to protect the estate or interest in the covenantee's land (which does not touch and concern the land) and a covenant which affects the value of the land as such. If this is a valid distinction, then a surety covenant falls squarely on the

B Dyson v. Forster side of the line: it increases the value of the landlord's reversion as such, whatever his estate. If, as I suspect, the two decisions are in fact irreconcilable, I am free to choose between them. I prefer to follow Dyson v. Forster which gives effect to the second limb in the Congleton test, 10 East 130, 138 (which everyone has treated as the true basic test) whereas Dewar v. Goodman appears to ignore the second limb completely.

C Mr. Blackburne also relied on Hua Chiao Commercial Bank Ltd. v. Chiaphua Industries Ltd. [1987] A.C. 99. In that case a lease provided that at the commencement of the term the tenant should pay to the landlord a substantial security deposit on the terms that it would be repayable at the end of the term if there was no breach of the tenant's covenants. The landlord mortgaged the reversion to the defendant bank, which went into possession. The tenant committed no breach of covenant during the term and sought to recover the security deposit from the bank, claiming that the provisions as to the deposit touched and concerned the land.

D The Privy Council dismissed the claim, holding that the covenant did not touch and concern the land. Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, giving the judgment on behalf of the Judicial Committee, plainly rejected any

E general rule that every covenant which is related, however obliquely, to some other obligation which touches and concerns the land itself necessarily touches and concerns the land: see p. 107c. But he did not rule out the possibility that a covenant closely connected and bound up with a covenant which does touch and concern the land can itself touch and concern the land. The ratio of the decision, in my judgment, is to

F be found at p. 187F-H. Lord Oliver points out that the assignee of the reversion was not entitled to receive the deposit from the original lessor on the assignment of the reversion: nor was an assignee of the term entitled to recover it at the end of the term. The liability to repay the deposit at the end of the term remained throughout on the original landlord and was an obligation to repay to the original tenant. So

G viewed, the decision is entirely consistent with the test laid down by Best J. The benefit of the covenant to repay could not touch and concern the land because someone other than the owner for the time being of the term could take the benefit of it.

H Finally, Mr. Blackburne relied on two Australian cases. The first, Consolidated Trust Co. Ltd. v. Naylor (1936) 55 C.L.R. 423, was a decision that under certain Australian statutory provisions an assignment of a mortgage did not operate to transfer the benefit of the covenant by a surety that the borrower would repay the principal debt. I do not myself gain any assistance from that decision. A surety for a mortgage debt is a surety for the payment of the principal debt. The borrower's own covenant to pay the principal has nothing to do with the land and cannot touch and concern the land: there is, therefore, no reason why a covenant by way of surety for such a payment should touch and concern the land. It is quite different from a surety for the performance of a tenant's covenant which does touch and concern the land: such a surety covenant is necessarily and inextricably bound up with the tenant's obligations.

The other case, Sacher Investments Pty. Ltd. v. Forma Stereo Consultants Pty. Ltd. [1976] 1 N.S.W.L.R. 5, was concerned with the assignment of the benefit of a covenant guaranteeing performance of tenant's covenants. But no argument appears to have been advanced that such covenant touched and concerned the land. It therefore does not provide any assistance.

For these reasons, in my judgment, it is consistent with both principle and authority to hold that a covenant by a surety, guaranteeing performance of covenants by a tenant which touch and concern the land, itself touches and concerns the land and is enforceable by an assignee of the reversion. It follows that H. & B. could have enforced the surety covenant against the defendants and that, accordingly, the plaintiff is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of H. & B. and recover from the defendants the sums he has paid to H. & B.

(4) The principle in Griffith v. Pelton [1958] Ch. 205

In the light of my decision on the third issue, it is not necessary to consider this principle. Since I have considerable difficulty in understanding what Griffith v. Pelton did decide, I express no view on it.

In my opinion the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

CROOM-JOHNSON L.J. I agree.

NEILL L.J. I also agree. Though we are differing from the decision of the judge, the matter has been so fully dealt with in the judgment of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. that there is nothing that I can usefully add.

In September 1980, the bulk carrier Derbyshire sank off the coast of Japan with the loss of all hands. The plaintiffs, the administratrices of the estate of the third engineer, issued a writ seeking damages from the defendants, the owners of the Derbyshire, on behalf of the estate under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 and on behalf of the dependants under the Fatal Accidents Act 1976. They alleged that the design and construction of the vessel had been defective so that she had been unseaworthy and that the deceased had lost his life in the course of his employment in consequence of a defect in equipment provided by the defendants for the purposes of their business and that that defect was attributable to their negligence within the meaning of section 1 of the Employer's Liability (Defective Equipment) Act 1969.¹ On a preliminary issue, Sheen J. held that the vessel was "equipment," within the meaning of the Act, that had been provided by the defendants for the purposes of their business. The Court of Appeal by a majority allowed an appeal by the defendants.

On appeal by the plaintiffs:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that "equipment" in the phrase "equipment provided by his employer for the purposes of the employer's business" in section 1(1)(a) of the Employer's Liability (Defective Equipment) Act 1969, in the context of an Act imposing vicarious liability on an employer for a defective article, was wide enough to include a ship of whatever size provided by an employer for the purposes of his business; that the inclusion of vehicles and aircraft in the definition of equipment in section 1(3) was for the purpose of clarity and did not cut down its meaning as used in the phrase in subsection (1); and that, accordingly, the Derbyshire had been equipment for the purposes of section 1(1)(a) and the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed (post, pp. 1182E, H—1183B, 1184H, 1185D—E, 1186G, H—1187A, H, 1188G—1189A, B, 1190A—C).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, Eugenia Margaret Coltman and Alisa Elizabeth Martin, administratrices of the estate of Leo Thomas Mackenzie Coltman deceased, by leave of the Court of Appeal (O'Connor, Lloyd and Glidewell L.JJ.) [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1098 from their decision on 27 January 1987 by which by a majority (Lloyd L.J. dissenting) they allowed an appeal by the defendants, Bibby Tankers Ltd., from the judgment of Sheen J. [1986] 1 W.L.R. 751 given on 14 March 1986. By his judgment, on a preliminary issue, Sheen J. declared in favour of the plaintiffs that the Derbyshire, a cargo carrier that had sunk with the loss of all hands, including the deceased, had been equipment provided by the defendants within the meaning of section 1 of the Employer's Liability (Defective Equipment) Act 1969. Their Lordships took time for consideration. E

3 December. LORD KEITH OF KINKEL. My Lords, I have had the benefit of considering in draft the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton. I agree with it, and for the reasons he gives would allow the appeal and restore the declaration of Sheen J. F

LORD ROSKILL. My Lords, I must confess that I have found the problem of construction to which this appeal gives rise more difficult than have your Lordships. The marked difference of opinion in the courts below between O'Connor and Glidewell L.JJ., on the one hand, and Lloyd L.J. and Sheen J., on the other, shows how difficult the problem is. For most of the argument I was disposed to share the views of the majority in the Court of Appeal because I found it difficult to accept that if Parliament in enacting the Employer's Liability (Defective Equipment) Act 1969 had intended that Act to embrace merchant ships in the word "equipment" in section 1(1)(a) that word would have been defined in section 1(3) in a manner which includes vehicles and aircraft but does not include merchant ships. But I recognise the strength of the submission that if the main engines of merchant ships are included in the definition, for they are clearly machinery, it is difficult to deduce any rational reason for excluding the hulls of such ships. Moreover, the derricks and winches of a merchant ship must surely be "equipment" within the ordinary meaning of that word irrespective of the definition in section 1(3). G

Ultimately, therefore, I have found the reasoning in the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, which I have H

B LORD GRIFFITHS. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, and I agree that for the reasons he gives the appeal must be allowed and the question answered in the same sense as that in which it was answered by Lloyd L.J. and Sheen J.

C LORD OLIVER OF AYLERTON. My Lords, the appellants in this appeal ("the plaintiffs") are the personal representatives of Leo Thomas Mackenzie Coltman deceased who was, at the date of his death, employed by the respondent company ("the defendants") as third engineer aboard the carrier Derbyshire. Derbyshire was a vessel of some 90,000 tons which sank off the coast of Japan on 9 September 1980 with the loss of all hands whilst on a voyage from Canada to Japan with a cargo of iron ore. On 5 February 1982 the plaintiffs commenced proceedings in the Admiralty Court claiming damages under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 and the Fatal Accidents Act 1976 and alleging that the sinking of the vessel and the death of the deceased had been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The particulars of negligence included allegations of defective construction and design of the vessel rendering her unseaworthy. Paragraphs 7 and 8 of the statement of claim contain a plea that the defects, which are said to be attributable wholly or in part to fault on the part of the manufacturers of the vessel, were defects in "equipment" provided by the defendants for the purposes of their business within the meaning of the Employer's Liability (Defective Equipment) Act 1969 and were thus deemed to be attributable to the negligence of the defendants. The defendants by their defence denied that the vessel constituted "equipment" within the meaning of that Act. Accordingly, on 13 February 1986 the Admiralty Registrar ordered by consent that there be determined as a preliminary point the question whether the vessel was equipment provided by the defendants within the meaning of section 1 of the Act. On the trial of the preliminary point on 14 March 1986 Sheen J. [1986] 1 W.L.R. 751 answered the question in the affirmative but on 27 January 1987 the Court of Appeal by a majority (Lloyd L.J. dissenting) [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1098 allowed an appeal by the defendants declaring that the vessel was not equipment provided by the defendants within the meaning of the Act and gave leave to appeal to your Lordships' House.

H My Lords, it is common ground that the Act of 1969 was introduced with a view to rectifying what was felt to be the possible hardship to an employee resulting from the decision of this House in Davie v. New Merton Board Mills Ltd. [1959] A.C. 604. In that case an employee was injured by a defective drift supplied to him by his employers for the purpose of his work. The defect resulted from a fault in manufacture but the article had been purchased by the employers without knowledge of the defect from a reputable supplier and without any negligence on their part. It was held that the employers' duty was only to take reasonable care to provide a reasonably safe tool and that that duty had been discharged by purchasing from a reputable source an article whose latent defect they had no means of discovering. Thus the action against them failed although judgment was recovered against the manufacturer. Clearly this opened the door to the possibility that an employee required to work with, on or in equipment furnished by his employer and injured as a result of some negligent failure in design or manufacture might find himself without remedy in a case where the manufacturer and the employer were, to use the words of Viscount Simonds, at pp. 620-621, "divided in time and space by decades and continents" so that the person actually responsible was no longer traceable or, perhaps, was insolvent or had ceased to carry on business. Parliament accordingly met this by imposing on employers a vicarious liability and providing, in a case where injury was due to a defect caused by the fault of the third party, that the employer should, regardless of his own conduct, be liable to his employee as if he had been responsible for the defect, leaving it to him to pursue against the third party such remedies as he might have whether original or by way of contribution.

The purpose of the Act, as set out in the long title, is:

"to make further provision with respect to the liability of an employer for injury to his employee which is attributable to any defect in equipment provided by the employer for the purposes of the employer's business; and for purposes connected with the matter aforesaid."

The relevant provisions of the Act, for present purposes, are contained in subsections (1) and (3) of section 1 and are as follows:

"(1) Where after the commencement of this Act—(a) an employee suffers personal injury in the course of his employment in consequence of a defect in equipment provided by his employer for the purposes of the employer's business; and (b) the defect is attributable wholly or partly to the fault of a third party (whether identified or not), the injury shall be deemed to be also attributable to negligence on the part of the employer (whether or not he is liable in respect of the injury apart from this subsection), but without prejudice to the law relating to contributory negligence and to any remedy by way of contribution or in contract or otherwise which is available to the employer in respect of the injury. . . (3) In this section—'business' includes the activities carried on by any public body; 'employee' means a person who is employed by another person under a contract of service or apprenticeship and is so employed for the purposes of a business carried on by that other person, and 'employer' shall be construed accordingly; 'equipment' includes any plant and machinery, vehicle, aircraft and clothing; 'fault' means negligence, breach of statutory duty or other act or omission which gives rise to liability in tort in England and Wales or which is wrongful and gives rise to liability in damages in Scotland; and 'personal injury' includes loss of life, any impairment of a person's physical or mental condition and any disease."

My Lords, if subsection (1) stood alone and without such assistance as is provided by subsection (3), I would not, for my part, have encountered any difficulty in concluding that, in the context of this Act, a ship was part of the "equipment" of the business of a shipowner. In the Court of Appeal, O'Connor L.J. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1098, 1100, expressed the view that the word in its natural meaning denoted something ancillary to something else and an echo of this is to be found in the judgment of

3 W.L.R.

Coltman v. Bibby Tankers Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Oliver
of Aylmerton

- A Glidewell L.J. Thus both Lords Justices would, I think, regard machinery attached to a ship as “equipment,” because it would be ancillary to the main object, the vessel, but both regarded the word as inappropriate to describe the vessel itself. I do not doubt that the word is frequently and quite properly used to describe the appurtenances of some larger entity, but I can see no reason either in logic or as a matter of language why its use should be so confined. Indeed, there is nothing
- B in the entry in The Oxford English Dictionary quoted by O'Connor L.J. which necessarily imports that “equipment” is restricted to parts of a larger whole. The meaning is given as “anything used in equipping; furniture; outfit; warlike apparatus; necessities for an expedition or voyage.” Moreover, your Lordships are concerned not with the meaning of “equipment” simpliciter but of the composite phrase, “equipment
- C provided by his employer for the purposes of the employer’s business.” Speaking for myself, I can think of no more essential equipment for the setting up and carrying on of the business of a shipowner than the ship or ships with which the business is carried on. This involves, in my judgment, no misuse of language. As Lloyd L.J. observed in his dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal, at p. 1104, one would talk naturally of a fleet being “equipped” with battleships, cruisers and
- D destroyers or of the “equipment” of an expedition as including supply ships. In my judgment, a shipowner’s fleet of ships is properly described as the equipment of his business. They are, in truth, the tools of his trade and I can see no ground for treating the word “equipment” in subsection (1)(a)—leaving aside for the moment the more difficult questions posed by subsection (3)—as excluding this particular type of
- E chattel as opposed to other articles, of whatever size or construction, employed by a trader in carrying on his trade.

- It has been submitted on behalf of the defendants that the word derives a more restricted flavour from its juxtaposition with the word “provided” and that that word imports the notion of something provided to the employee for use in the course of his work and is therefore more appropriate to the type of small tool provided to the appellant in Davie v. New Merton Board Mills Ltd. [1959] A.C. 604. There is, however,
- F no context from which this can properly be deduced—indeed the extended definition in subsection (3) leads to a precisely contrary conclusion—and I can see no reason for reading the word “provided” in anything other than its normal signification of “furnished.”

- Then it is said that “equipment” is to be distinguished from the factory or workplace in which working tools or machinery are provided
- G or to which they are affixed and that a ship—or, certainly, an ocean-going vessel of the size of Derbyshire—is akin to a factory in the sense that it provides the accommodation within which the employee does his work. Whilst, therefore, it is accepted that the various mechanical contrivances which are installed in or affixed to a vessel are properly described as equipment, the ship itself, taken as a whole, is, it is argued,
- H not “equipment” because it constitutes the employee’s “workplace.” It is, of course, true that the provisions of the Occupiers’ Liability Act 1957 apply to a ship as they do to real property, but they equally apply, in appropriate circumstances, to a vehicle or an aeroplane, so that nothing can, I think, turn on this. It is also true that it is inherent in the nature of a vessel that those whose task it is to navigate it are accommodated within it for the purposes of their employment. But here, as it seems to me, any analogy with real estate ends. No one, I venture to think, would regard the power-boat provided for the purpose of a water-skiing school or a pleasure launch on the river Thames as being in the slightest degree akin to real estate or as being anything other than a chattel employed in a business. Such a vessel would, in my judgment, be comprehended in the term "equipment of the business" even in the most everyday use of language and I can see no justification for excluding from it some category of vessel merely by reason of its size and of its necessarily providing accommodation for the crew who are required to be on board in order to operate it for the proper carrying on of the business of carrying cargo from one part of the world to another.

It is, however, argued that subsection (1) does not stand alone. It has to be read in the context of an Act which also contains subsection (3) and it is this which, in my judgment, constitutes the strongest argument for the defendants. Here, it is said, is a specific definition of "equipment" which goes out of its way to include plant and machinery, vehicles and aircraft and clothing. Is it conceivable, it is asked, that the draftsman of the statute, who evidently regarded himself as indicating, in subsection (3), particular articles which might possibly not be thought of as ordinarily embraced in the phrase "equipment provided . . . for the purposes of . . . business," should have specifically included vehicles and aircraft but should have omitted any reference to vessels if such omission were not intentional? Thus, it is argued, if vessels were omitted deliberately from the expanded or clarifying definition in subsection (3) this demonstrates that the word is used in subsection (1)(a) in a more restricted sense. My Lords, I have found myself unable to accept this approach to the problem of construction. To begin with, it is quite clear, as was pointed out by Lloyd L.J. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1098, 1104, that the word "includes" in subsection (3) cannot be construed as "means and includes" so as to confine that which is embraced in the word "equipment" to the exemplars there specified. Granted that there may be circumstances in which an inclusive definition of this sort can have a restrictive effect, that cannot, in my judgment, possibly apply in the case of this statute. Here, where the draftsman intends a restricted meaning, he makes it quite clear. One has only to contrast the definitions of "business," "equipment" and "personal injury," all of which are by reference to what is included, with those of "employee" and "fault," where the Act makes it clear that there is to be a single exclusive meaning for the purposes of the Act. Subsection (3) cannot, therefore, be used to cut down the meaning of the word "equipment" as it is used in subsection (1). It must have been inserted in the statute either for the purpose of enlarging the word by including in it articles which would not otherwise fall within it in its ordinary signification or it must have been inserted for clarification and the avoidance of doubt. For my part, I agree with Lloyd L.J., at p. 1105, that the definition is a clarifying and not an enlarging one. Why the draftsman felt it necessary to clarify in this way is a matter for speculation. Quite clearly, for instance, some "plant and machinery" would be properly described as "equipment" even in the most ordinary use of the term and the purpose of the express inclusion of plant and machinery can, I think, only have been to make it clear that every type of plant and machinery is to be regarded as equipment within the meaning of the Act. The key word in the definition is the word "any" and it underlines, in my judgment, what I would in any event have supposed to be the case, having regard to the purpose of the Act, that is to say, that it should be widely construed so

- A as to embrace every article of whatever kind furnished by the employer for the purposes of his business. Thus it is not just particular plant and machinery or vehicles (for instance, a combined harvester) or particular types of aircraft (for instance, a crop-spraying aeroplane) which are to be regarded as “equipment” but plant and machinery, vehicles, aircraft and clothing of all types and sizes subject only to the limitation that they are provided for the purposes of the employer’s business.
- B It is certainly curious that, having resolved to refer specifically to means of transport, the draftsman should have omitted to refer in terms to water transport. Indeed, it is difficult to see why, after the express inclusion of “plant and machinery,” it was thought necessary to refer to any further examples. The word “plant” is itself one of the widest import and is apt to embrace anything from a wharfinger’s cart-horse
- C (see Yarmouth v. France (1887) 19 Q.B.D. 647) to a lawyer’s text book (see Munby v. Furlong [1977] Ch. 359). “Plant and machinery” is even wider and had at the date of the passing of the Act a well recognised meaning to those familiar with taxing statutes. In the ordinary way, therefore, had it not been for the express reference to vehicles and aircraft, I would, in any event, have been disposed to regard a ship as something properly embraced in the phrase “plant and machinery”—see,
- D for instance, the Capital Allowances Act 1968, section 31, where new ships are specifically referred to and are treated as a special type of plant and machinery for the purposes of initial allowances. However, the express reference to vehicles and aircraft, whilst it indicates that the word “equipment” is to be construed in its widest sense—a conclusion reinforced by the inclusion also of “clothing”—does seem to indicate at
- E least a doubt in the draftsman’s mind whether every type of vehicle or aircraft had been embraced in what had gone before and highlights the omission of any express reference to water-borne means of transport, for if the draftsman considered that some or all of the possible land-borne or airborne means of locomotion might not properly be described as “plant and machinery” it seems curious that he did not entertain at least equal doubt about water-borne craft. It has been suggested that a ship
- F may properly be described as a water-borne vehicle and reference has been made to the Hovercraft Act 1968 in which a hovercraft is defined as a “vehicle . . . designed to be supported . . . by air expelled from the vehicle . . .”: section 4(1). It would, it is submitted, be absurd that a hovercraft should be a vehicle for the purpose of the definition and that a water-borne craft of commensurate size and purpose should not be. I
- G find myself, however, unpersuaded by the transposition into this Act of a definition from a quite different statute. The juxtaposition of “vehicle” and “aircraft” demonstrates, I think, that “vehicle” is used in this Act as referring specifically to a land-borne means of transport. It must, in the light of this, be at least doubtful whether, in the context of this Act, the expression “plant and machinery” is properly to be construed as including ships, and I am, for my part, content to approach the problem on the
- H footing that it is not. The omission is certainly curious but I find myself entirely unpersuaded that there can be deduced from it an intention to cut down the very wide meaning of “equipment” in subsection (1) which is indicated both by the legislative purpose of the statute and by the width of the clarifying definition. Various explanations have been suggested for what it is submitted was a deliberate omission. It is said, for instance, that having regard to the provisions of section 458 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) a ship may have been deliberately omitted because of a perceived possible conflict between liability of the shipowner under that section (which imposes only an obligation of reasonable care to ensure seaworthiness) and the vicarious liability imposed by this Act. It is also submitted that there could be difficulty in reconciling that vicarious liability with the limitation of a shipowner's liability for injury or loss of life under section 503 of the Act of 1894 in the absence of actual privity or fault. Again, it is said that to apply the provisions of the Act to a ship would give rise to problems of conflict of laws in cases where injury was caused on ships under foreign flags or where it occurred on the high seas or in a foreign port—a difficulty, however, which would equally arise in the case of an aircraft. These suggested difficulties are to my mind more illusory than real and, in so far as they exist at all, constitute a quite insufficient reason for imposing on the wide words of the statute an unexpressed limitation which would produce some quite extraordinary anomalies. Whatever may be embraced in the expression “plant and machinery” it quite clearly includes any machinery installed in or affixed to a ship in the absence of some compelling context to the contrary; and there is no context whatever in this Act for reading the expression as excluding maritime machinery from “any” plant and machinery. Unless, therefore, one is to read the Act as if it contained some unexpressed limitation excluding from its operation plant or machinery which comes to be installed in a ship, the exclusion from the definition of “equipment” of a ship itself produces the absurd position that the employer is liable for injury caused by defective machinery on or in the ship but not for injury caused by anything which can properly be described as constituting the ship itself, i.e. the hull or a part of the hull. This at once raises almost insoluble problems of demarcation between those constituent parts of the ship which may properly be described as “plant” or “machinery” and those parts which are properly to be described as the hull or parts of the hull. There simply is no context in the Act which enables one to read “equipment” as including the ship's winches, derricks, generators, pumps, engine-room plant, steering gear and so on, but as excluding the structure of the ship itself. The alternative approach of treating all ships and all their gear, machinery and accoutrements as sub silentio excluded from the operation of the Act raises, to my mind, equal difficulty. It seems to me almost unarguable that “equipment” does not include at least some vessels. The example of a dredger, for instance, was suggested by Lloyd L.J. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1098, 1105 in his judgment and it is not difficult to think of other examples of water-borne craft which would clearly be properly styled “business equipment.” “Business” includes, by definition, the operations of a public body. The customs cutter, the fire-tender or the Trinity House launch, would, I should have thought, be quite clearly “equipment” of the operations for which they were provided. If, then, some ships are equipment, where is the line to be drawn? It cannot, in my judgment, be drawn simply by reference to size as the majority of the Court of Appeal appear to have concluded. There is no logic in such a criterion nor any functional difference between vessels of different types which enables a line to be sensibly drawn. The purpose of the Act was manifestly to saddle the employer with liability for defective plant of every sort with which the employee is compelled to work in the course of his employment and I can see no ground for excluding particular types of chattel merely on the ground of their size or the element upon which they are designed to operate.

Coltman v. Bibby Tankers Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Oliver
of Aylmerton

A Indeed, the express inclusion of all vehicles and all aircraft militates strongly against any such distinction. Like Lloyd L.J., I am impressed both by the width of the words used by the legislature and by the legislative purpose behind the statute and I am driven to the same conclusion that he reached.

B I would allow the appeal and answer the question raised on the preliminary issue in the same sense as it was answered by Sheen J.

C LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY. My Lords, I am entirely in agreement with my noble and learned friend, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, that, for the reasons he gives, a ship may form part of the "equipment" of the business of a shipowner, on the natural and ordinary meaning of that word. Accordingly, if the word "equipment" were not defined in the Act of 1969, I would have no difficulty in deciding the present case in favour of the plaintiffs. The real difficulty in the case, as it seems to me, arises from the fact that the word "equipment" is defined in section 1(3) of the Act, and that the definition expressly includes any vehicle and aircraft, but makes no mention of ships or vessels. This fact provided the basis for the powerful submission advanced on behalf of the defendants that Parliament could not, in these circumstances, have inadvisedly excluded ships or vessels from the definition and must therefore have intended, for some reason, to exclude them.

E I have struggled to discover any rational basis for such a deliberate exclusion. The only possible basis which has occurred to me is as follows. It is, I understand, accepted that, in respect of operations on land, the Act only provides protection for the employee in respect of defects in equipment provided by the employer on the premises, but provides no protection in respect of defects in the premises themselves. It might therefore have been thought that, in respect of operations at sea, a similar distinction should be drawn between defects in equipment provided by the employer on the relevant ship, and defects in the structure of the ship itself. In both cases, whether the defect is in the structure of a building or in the structure of a ship, the employee would, on this hypothesis, be restricted to his rights against his employer as occupier, even where the defect in the building or the ship was attributable to the fault of a third party. In both cases, no doubt, nice distinctions might have to be drawn between equipment on the one hand, and the structure of the building or the ship on the other hand; but since it is plain that in any event such distinctions would have to be drawn in the case of premises on land, it is not necessarily surprising that Parliament should have intended similar distinctions to be drawn in respect of a ship at sea, although it is likely that more difficult questions could arise in the case of ships than in the case of premises on land. If this were to be right, it would explain why ships or vessels were excluded from the definition of "equipment" in the Act, and it would follow that the appeal in the present case would have to be dismissed.

H I must confess to having felt some attraction for this approach, as a matter of logic; but I have come to the conclusion that its practical consequences are such that I do not think that it can have been the intention of the legislature so to provide. As my noble and learned friend, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, points out in his speech, ships or vessels may vary enormously in character and in size, from the Trinity House launch or even a speedboat to a supertanker or a bulk carrier. It is very difficult indeed to imagine that small craft should be excluded from "equipment" provided by the employer for the purposes of his business; but no sensible distinction can be drawn between small and large vessels for present purposes—certainly the approach which I have set out provides no basis for any such distinction. Moreover it seems to me that, in the case of ships, the distinction between the equipment on the ship and the structure of the ship is not only very difficult to draw in practice, but is artificial in the extreme. In any event, the duty of care imposed under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 may apply not only in respect of vessels, but also in respect of vehicles and aircraft: see section 1(3)(a). I have therefore come to the conclusion, in agreement with my noble and learned friend, and with Lloyd L.J. in the Court of Appeal, that the definition of equipment in section 1(3) of the Act of 1969 must have been included in the Act for the purpose of clarification only, and that the mere fact that ships and vessels were not expressly included in the definition cannot have been intended to have the effect of cutting down the ordinary meaning of the word "equipment" by excluding ships or vessels from that word.

For these reasons I too would allow the appeal.

D

In May 1981 car dealers sold a car to a finance company for £20,000 and then let the car to a hirer under a hire-purchase agreement providing for payment by a deposit and 36 monthly payments totalling £25,627. In July 1982 the hirer discovered that the car had been stolen before it had come into the possession of the dealers. The police took possession of the car. The hirer claimed to terminate the hire-purchase agreement on the ground that the finance company were in breach of an implied condition as to good title. The finance company brought an action for damages for £13,176 for breach of the agreement, to which the hirer counterclaimed £7,450 paid by him under the agreement. The finance company denied that the car had been stolen and joined the dealers as second defendants. The dealers later ceased trading and took no part in the trial of the action, by which time they were in the process of liquidation. The judge dismissed the finance company's claim against the hirer, gave judgment for the hirer on his counterclaim against the finance company and gave judgment for the finance company for £23,996 including interest against the dealers.

E

F

G

The hirer sought an order whereby the finance company would pay his costs of the claim and counterclaim and the dealers pay the costs of the finance company but the judge made the order, as sought by the finance company, that the dealers pay the costs of both the finance company and the hirer. The hirer sought leave to appeal on the question of costs alone and sought a declaration that the prohibition in section 18(1)(f) of the Supreme Court Act 1981¹ against an appeal on costs without the leave of the trial judge did not apply where the judge had not exercised his discretion judicially. The Court of Appeal refused the application.

H

On the hirer's appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the Court of Appeal had been within its jurisdiction in laying down a practice that an appeal as to costs alone should only be set down for hearing if it was satisfied that there was an arguable case that the judge had acted outside the bounds of judicial discretion, so as to constitute an exceptional case falling outside the prohibition contained in section 18(1)(f) of the Act of 1981; that the judge

Bankamerica Finance Ltd. v. Nock (H.L.(E.))[1987]

had had discretion to make either of the orders as to costs sought and by having regard to the balance of hardship had made a judicial exercise of his discretion, and accordingly the hirer had not made out a prima facie case that he had a right to appeal without the leave of the judge (post, pp. 1192G-H, 1195D-E, 1198B-D, G, H—1199C).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellant, Gerard Nock, from the order of the Court of Appeal (Sir John Donaldson M.R., Stephen Brown and Woolf L.JJ.) dated 18 February 1986 dismissing his ex parte application for a declaration that he was not precluded by virtue of section 18(1)(f) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 from proceeding with an appeal against an order for costs made by Cantley J. on 18 July 1985 in an action by the respondent, Bankamerica Finance Ltd., against the appellant whereby he had ordered that the costs of the action be paid by the second defendants, Lotmate Ltd. (trading as Principal Garages), a company in liquidation, which took no part in the action or the appeals.

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Brandon of Oakbrook.

David Ashton for the appellant.

Adrian Brunner for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

3 December. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook. I agree with it and for the reasons he gives I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, this appeal is unusual in that it relates solely to the costs of an action. The action concerned was brought in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court. It arose out of a hire-purchase transaction, the subject matter of which was a second-hand Porsche motor car. That motor car later turned out to be stolen property: hence the litigation about it.

3 W.L.R.

Bankamerica Finance Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Brandon
of Oakbrook

A The person who sought to acquire the car on hire-purchase terms was Gerard Nock ("the hirer"). The company purporting to own the car was Lotmate Ltd. trading as Principal Garages ("the dealers"). The company affording hire-purchase facilities to the hirer was Bankamerica Finance Ltd. ("the finance company").

B On 10 May 1981 a contract of sale was made between the dealers and the finance company, under which the latter bought the car from the former for a cash price of £20,000. On 12 May 1981 a hire-purchase agreement was made between the finance company and the hirer under which the latter hire-purchased the car from the former for a total price of £25,627.76, payable by an initial deposit followed by 36 monthly instalments over a period of three years. Pursuant to that agreement the hirer took possession of the car.

C In July 1982 the hirer discovered that the car had, before it came into the possession of the dealers, been stolen in Italy from its true owner, a German. During the same month the Metropolitan Police took possession of the car from the hirer and did not return it to him.

D By a letter to the finance company dated 30 July 1982 solicitors acting for the hirer claimed on his behalf to terminate the hire-purchase agreement on the ground that the finance company were in breach of the condition as to good title implied in it. At that time the hirer had paid £7,450.83 to the finance company under the agreement.

E On 14 December 1982 the finance company began an action against the hirer in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court by specially indorsed writ claiming damages of £13,176.93 for breach of the hire-purchase agreement. On 31 January the hirer served a defence and counterclaim. By his defence he resisted the claim on the ground that, since the car had been stolen earlier in Italy, the finance company had never had a good title to it and accordingly had never passed one to him. By his counterclaim the hirer claimed £6,874.92, later amended to £7,450.83, as moneys paid on a consideration which had wholly failed. On 8 February 1983 the finance company served a reply and defence to counterclaim, in which it expressly denied that the car had been stolen.

F On 21 July 1983 the finance company amended its writ and statement of claim so as to join the dealers as second defendants to the action. By the amended statement of claim the finance company claimed against the dealers, in the event of it being found that the car was stolen, damages for misrepresentation and/or breach of the contract of the sale of the car.

G The action was tried by Cantley J. on 18 July 1985. Before then, in or about January 1985, the dealers had ceased trading, and by then they were in the process of liquidation. These facts, however, were not known to the hirer before the trial. Neither the dealers, nor their liquidator if there was one, attended or took any part in the trial.

H Cantley J. found that the car had been stolen earlier in Italy, as alleged by the hirer but denied by the finance company. On that basis the judge (1) dismissed the finance company's claim against the hirer; (2) gave judgment for the hirer for £8,344.93 including interest on his counterclaim against the finance company; and (3) gave judgment for the finance company for £23,996.34 including interest on its claim against the dealers.

With regard to costs the judge heard submissions from counsel for the two parties before him. Counsel for the hirer, Mr. Ashton, submitted that the finance company should pay the hirer's costs of both claim and counterclaim in any case. He further indicated, at one time at any rate, that he would be content with a Bullock order, that is to say an order (a) that the finance company should pay to the hirer his costs of both claim and counterclaim and (b) that the dealers should pay the finance company's costs of claim to which should be added the costs payable by the finance company to the hirer. Counsel for the finance company, Mr. Brunner, submitted that the appropriate order would be what is known as a Sanderson order: that is to say no order as to costs as between the finance company and the hirer, but an order that the dealers should pay all the costs of both the finance company and the hirer. The expression Bullock order is derived from Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co. [1907] 1 K.B. 264; the expression Sanderson order is derived from Sanderson v. Blyth Theatre Co. [1903] 2 K.B. 533.

My Lords, if the dealers had been financially sound, it would not in the end have mattered whether the order made had been a Bullock order or a Sanderson order. But, because the dealers were insolvent it mattered a great deal to both the hirer and the finance company. So far as the hirer was concerned, if a Bullock order was made, he would be assured of recovering his costs of the action in full from the finance company; but, if a Sanderson order was made, the likelihood was that he would be unable to recover his costs from the dealers. So far as the finance company was concerned, if a Bullock order was made, it would be obliged to pay the hirer all his costs of the action, and the likelihood was that it would be unable to recover such costs from the dealers; but, if a Sanderson order was made, the finance company would escape any liability for the costs of the hirer.

The judge, expressing the view that he had a discretion to make either the one order or the other, and purporting at least to exercise such discretion, decided to make a Sanderson order. He further refused the hirer leave to appeal against that order.

The hirer wished to appeal to the Court of Appeal on the question of costs. Such an appeal is prima facie precluded by the combined effect of sections 51 and 18(1)(f) of the Supreme Court Act 1981. Section 51 provides that the costs of and incidental to proceedings of the Supreme Court shall be in the discretion of the court and that the court shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent the costs are to be paid. Section 18(1) provides:

"No appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal— . . . (f) without the leave of the court or tribunal in question, from any order of the High Court or any other court or tribunal . . . relating only to costs which are by law left to the discretion of the court or tribunal; . . ."

These provisions are re-enactments of similar provisions in earlier Acts.

It has, however, been held that, despite these provisions, an appeal against an order of the High Court relating to costs alone will lie without the leave of that court in certain exceptional cases. Those cases are cases in which it can be shown that the judge who made the order either did not exercise his discretion at all, or did not exercise it judicially. Principles relating to these matters were stated by the Court of Appeal in Scherer v. Counting Instruments Ltd. (Note) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 615, an authority to which I shall refer later.

That being the state of the law, the hirer's solicitors on or about 19 August 1985 attempted to enter a notice of appeal against the order of Cantley J. as to costs only. The registrar, pursuant to the ruling of the

3 W.L.R.

Bankamerica Finance Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Brandon
of Oakbrook

A Court of Appeal in Marshall v. Levine (Practice Note) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 814, refused to enter the appeal and caused the matter to be referred to that court in order to enable the hirer to satisfy it, if he could, on an ex parte application, that he had an arguable case for a hearing inter partes having regard to the principles stated in the Scherer case. The matter came before the Court of Appeal (Sir John Donaldson M.R., Stephen Brown and Woolf L.JJ.) on 18 February 1986 in the form of an

B application by the hirer for a declaration that he was not precluded by section 18(1)(f) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 from proceeding with his notice of appeal. That application was refused. Sir John Donaldson M.R. said to counsel for the hirer:

C “We cannot help you, Mr. Ashton. We ourselves would never have made this decision on costs and it was probably an unjust one, but it was within the judge’s discretion and you do not come within the Scherer principles. Therefore we shall not set the appeal down.”

By an order dated 17 June 1986 the Court of Appeal allowed an application by the hirer for leave to appeal to your Lordships’ House.

D On the appeal two submissions were made for the hirer. The first submission was that the ruling in Marshall v. Levine [1985] 1 W.L.R. 814 was wrong and that the hirer should accordingly have been allowed to enter his appeal without first having to satisfy the Court of Appeal, on an ex parte application, that he had an arguable case. The second submission was that the Court of Appeal erred in law, on hearing such application, in holding that the hirer did not have an arguable case.

E The first submission relates to a matter of procedure only. The ruling in Marshall v. Levine was clearly designed to provide a filter for appeals of the kind here concerned, so as to eliminate unarguable cases at an early stage and by doing so save both time and costs. In my opinion the Court of Appeal, as master of its own procedures, was entitled to make that ruling, which can work no injustice to an appellant who has a genuinely arguable case, and I see no good reason why your Lordships’ House should hold it to be invalid.

F The second submission relates to a matter of substance, which merits consideration by your Lordships’ House. I have already referred to the provisions of sections 51 and 18(1)(f) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, which are directly relevant to the issue raised. Also directly relevant are certain provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 62 relating to costs. That order is divided into a number of parts. Of these two parts are material: Part I headed “Preliminary” and Part II headed “Entitlement to Costs.” Rule

G 2(4), which is in Part I, is headed “Application” and provides:

H “The powers and discretion of the court under section 51 of the Act (which provides that the costs of and incidental to proceedings of the Supreme Court shall be in the discretion of the court and that the court shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent the costs are to be paid) . . . shall be exercised subject to and in accordance with this Order.”

The reference in this sub-rule to “the Act” is a reference to the Supreme Court Act 1981. Rule 3, which is in Part II, is headed “General Principles” and provides:

“(1) This rule shall have effect subject only to the following provisions of this Order. (2) No party to any proceedings shall be entitled to recover any of the costs of those proceedings . . . except under an order of the court. (3) If the court in the exercise of its discretion sees fit to make any order as to the costs of any proceedings, the court shall order the costs to follow the event, except when it appears to the court that in the circumstances of the case some other order should be made as to the whole or any part of the costs. . . .”

Similar rules were in force when Scherer v. Counting Instruments Ltd (Note) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 615 was decided by the Court of Appeal (Buckley, Bridge and Cumming-Bruce L.J.J.) in 1977. The judgment of the court was given by Buckley L.J. He referred to a number of authorities, including one in your Lordships’ House and five in the Court of Appeal, and derived from them ten principles. Excluding principle (8), which is not relevant in the context of the present case, these principles were as follows, at p. 621:

“(1) The normal rule is that costs follow the event. That party who turns out to have unjustifiably either brought another party before the court, or given another party cause to have recourse to the court to obtain his rights is required to recompense that other party in costs; but (2) the judge has under section 50 of the Judicature Act 1925 an unlimited discretion to make what order as to costs he considers that the justice of the case requires. (3) Consequently a successful party has a reasonable expectation of obtaining an order for his costs to be paid by the opposing party but has no right to such an order, for it depends upon the exercise of the court’s discretion. (4) This discretion is not one to be exercised arbitrarily; it must be exercised judicially, that is to say, in accordance with established principles and in relation to the facts of the case. (5) The discretion cannot be well exercised unless there are relevant grounds for its exercise, for its exercise without grounds cannot be a proper exercise of the judge’s function. (6) The grounds must be connected with the case. This may extend to any matter relating to the litigation and the parties’ conduct in it, and also to the circumstances leading to the litigation, but no further. (7) If no such ground exists for departing from the normal rule, or if, although such grounds exist, the judge is known to have acted not on any such ground but on some extraneous ground, there has effectively been no exercise of the discretion. . . . (9) If a judge, having relevant grounds upon which to do so, has upon those grounds, or some of them, made an order as to costs in the exercise of his discretion, his decision is final unless he gives leave to a dissatisfied party to appeal. (10) If, however, he has made his order having no relevant grounds available or having in fact acted on extraneous grounds, this court can entertain an appeal without leave and can make what order it thinks fit.”

Subject to two modifications, I consider that these principles stated by Buckley L.J. in the Scherer case correctly represent the relevant law today. The first modification is the substitution in principle (2) of section 51 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 for section 50 of the Judicature Act 1925. The second modification is the substitution for the phrase “in accordance with established principles” in principle (4), the more complete phrase “in accordance with the provisions of Part II of R.S.C., Ord. 62 and any other established principles.”

3 W.L.R.

Bankamerica Finance Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Brandon
of Oakbrook

A My Lords, Mr. Ashton for the hirer put forward three contentions. The first contention was that, as between the hirer and the finance company, the former was the successful party and the latter the unsuccessful party. In that situation R.S.C., Ord. 62, r. 3(3) required the judge to make an order as to costs which followed the event unless there were circumstances in the case which justified him in making some other order. An order following the event would have been an order

B either alone, or as part of a Bullock order, that the finance company should pay the hirer's costs of both claim and counterclaim. The second contention was that there were no circumstances in the case which justified the judge in making an order as to costs other than an order following the event, from which it followed that the judge had either failed to exercise his discretion at all or had not exercised it judicially.

C The third contention was that, in these circumstances, the case came within principles (7) and (10) in the Scherer case [1986] 1 W.L.R. 615, so that the Court of Appeal had power to entertain the hirer's appeal without leave having been given by the judge, and having done so to substitute a different order from that made by him.

D In order to decide whether these contentions are correct, it is necessary to examine the nature of the discussion with regard to costs which took place between counsel for the hirer and the finance company and the judge after he had given judgment on the merits. That discussion, which is recorded in the transcript before your Lordships, went through four stages. In the first stage Mr. Ashton submitted that, since the hirer had succeeded against the finance company on claim and counterclaim, the finance company should be ordered to pay the hirer's

E costs of both; to which the judge reacted by suggesting to Mr. Brunner that he could not resist such an order. In the second stage Mr. Brunner submitted that the dealers, by asserting in the first place, and then maintaining right up until the trial, that the car had not been stolen, were responsible for the whole of the litigation. That being so, the appropriate order to make as to costs was a Sanderson order. In the F third stage Mr. Ashton said that, while he would be content if the judge made a Bullock order, he strongly opposed the making of a Sanderson order. He did so on the ground that, since the dealers were insolvent, the result of a Sanderson order would be that the hirer, although successful against the finance company, would be left to bear his own costs. In answer to that the judge pointed out that, if a Bullock order was made, the finance company would find themselves paying the hirer's

G costs and bearing their own, without being able to recover either from the dealers. In the fourth stage Mr. Ashton resiled from his previous willingness to accept a Bullock order on the ground that such an order should not be made when a plaintiff's causes of action against two defendants were not alternative but separate and distinct, which he submitted was the situation in the instant case. In support of this

H proposition Mr. Ashton referred the judge to a passage in The Supreme Court Practice (1985), p. 874, para. 62/2/46, dealing with Bullock and Sanderson orders. In the fourth stage the judge, having read the passage to which he had been referred, expressed the conclusion that he had power to make either a Bullock or a Sanderson order, and that whether he made the one or the other was entirely in his discretion. He then went on, despite further protestation by Mr. Ashton, to make a Sanderson order.

My Lords, three questions arise out of this discussion. The first question is whether the judge was right in holding that the nature of the case was such that he had power to make a Bullock or a Sanderson order. The second question is whether he was right in holding that, on the basis that he had such powers, the choice between making the one order or the other was in his discretion. The third question is whether, in choosing to make a Sanderson order, he exercised his discretion judicially.

With regard to the first question I am of opinion that the finance company's claims against the hirer and the dealer were in substance alternative claims. The finance company was bound to succeed on one or other of the two claims, and could not succeed on both. That being so, the judge clearly had power, without infringing Ord. 62, r. 3(3) and in accordance with long established practice, to make either a Bullock or a Sanderson order.

With regard to the second question, there is authority in the Court of Appeal, with which I see no good reason to disagree, that, where a judge has power to make a Bullock or a Sanderson order, the choice between them is a matter for his discretion: see Mayer v. Harte [1960] 1 W.L.R. 770.

With regard to the third question, if the dealers had not been insolvent, it would, as I pointed out earlier, have made no difference in the end which of the two forms of order was made. The real question is therefore whether, having regard to the fact that the dealers were insolvent, the judge could not, if he exercised his discretion judicially, have made a Sanderson order, but was bound to make a Bullock order. As to this it is true that, if a Sanderson order was made, the hirer would probably have to bear his own costs. He would, however, recover the sum of £8,344.83 awarded to him against the finance company, whereas the finance company would probably be unable to recover from the dealer either the sum of £23,996.34 awarded to it or its own costs. There would then be hardship to both parties, but more to the finance company than to the hirer. By contrast, if a Bullock order was made, the hirer would recover from the finance company both the sum of £8,344.93 awarded to him and his costs. The finance company on the other hand would probably recover nothing: neither the sum of £23,996.34 awarded to it, nor its own costs, nor the hirer's costs which it would have to have paid. All the hardship would then be to the finance company and none at all to the hirer.

The judge must have been aware of these matters. Having regard to them it seems to me impossible to say that the judge could not, in the judicial exercise of his discretion, have made a Sanderson order but was bound to make a Bullock order. On the contrary the balance of hardship seems to me, not to require the judge to make a Sanderson order rather than a Bullock order, but at least to provide a legitimate ground for him, in the judicial exercise of his discretion, to do so.

In this connection it is pertinent to observe that in Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assurance Society (1881) 17 Ch.D. 600, 607-608 Jessel M.R. expressed the view that, in a case of the present kind, the established practice was always to make a Sanderson order rather than a Bullock order. I recognise at once that this extreme approach must be regarded today as going too far. But the fact that it was adopted formerly is a strong indication that, while a Sanderson order cannot be mandatory, a Bullock order cannot be mandatory either.

It follows that I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, I have had the advantage of considering in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook. I agree with it and for the reasons he has given would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

CHIEF ADJUDICATION OFFICER v. BRUNT

1987 July 15, 16; 29

Kerr and Ralph Gibson L.JJ. and Sir George Waller

Social Security—Unemployment benefit—Disqualification from benefit—Claimant out of work after full-time work—Claimant obtaining part-time work in community programme scheme—Whether claimant employed to full extent normal in his case—Whether precluded from entitlement to unemployment benefit—Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1983 (S.I. 1983 No. 1598), reg. 7(1)(e)

The claimant, after a period of full-time employments, was out of work from 4 January 1982 and from January 1982 he received unemployment benefit for the full period of his entitlement under section 18 of the Social Security Act 1975. On 25 October 1983 he started part-time work under a community programme scheme for two and a half days a week. After 13 weeks part-time work he re-qualified for unemployment benefit under section 18(2) of the Act but his application for benefit in respect of the days on which he was not working was rejected by the insurance officer on the ground that the claimant was working regularly the same number of days in a week for the same employer and that he was employed to the full extent normal in his case within regulation 7(1)(e) of the Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1983.¹ The claimant's appeal to the local tribunal was dismissed. His appeal, on leave given by a commissioner, was allowed by the Tribunal of Commissioners who decided that the claimant was not precluded from receiving unemployment benefit.

On appeal by the Chief Adjudication Officer:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that whether a claimant was “employed to the full extent normal in his case” within the meaning of regulation 7(1)(e) was to be answered as an issue of fact by reference to the particular circumstances of the claimant and to what was normal in his case; that while the accepted tests of what was “ordinary” and “normal” could be of assistance it was necessary to look at the claimant's pattern of work at the relevant time and decide objectively, having regard to his working history and what might happen to him in the near future, what his normal work pattern was for the week in question; that although a claimant, with evidence of lengthy full-time employment and a short period of unemployment before being employed on a fixed but temporary part-time basis, might, where it could be shown that the part-time employment has not yet become the normal pattern of work, be entitled to benefit for days in that week when he did not work, on the facts, the present claimant's part-time employment, after 16 months of unemployment, had become regular and normal employment within the meaning of regulation 7(1)(e) so that he was employed to the full extent normal in his case and was precluded from receiving unemployment benefit (post, pp. 1207A–C, C–E, 1213B–C, 1215G–1216C, 1219D–E, 1220D–F, 1223A).

D APPEAL from the Tribunal of Social Security Commissioners.

- The claimant, Vincent Anthony Brunt, having started work in October 1983 under a community programme scheme for two and a half days a week, after a period of unemployment, applied for unemployment benefit for the days of the week he was unemployed. His claim was rejected by the insurance officer on the ground that the claimant came within regulation 7(1)(e) of the Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1983, since he was working for the same employer for the same number of days in the week and he was “employed to the full extent normal in his case.”

- The claimant’s appeal to the St. Helen’s Social Security Appeal Tribunal was dismissed on 16 February 1984. Supported by his union, General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, he was granted leave to appeal to the commissioners by one of the commissioners and his appeal was heard by a Tribunal of Social Security Commissioners on the Chief Commissioner’s order. By their decision dated 4 February 1987, the commissioners decided that pursuant to regulation 7 of the Regulations of 1983 the claimant was not precluded from title to unemployment benefit during 20 January 1984 and 23 April 1984.

- The Chief Adjudication Officer appealed on the grounds that (1) the commissioners erred in law in holding that because the claimant’s employment on the community programme was for a fixed temporary period it could not be regarded as being employment to the full extent normal in his case and (2) the commissioners (a) failed properly to apply the decision of the Court of Appeal in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer (Note), post, p. 1224, and in particular failed to apply the passage in the judgment of Slade L.J. (post, p. 1230B–F) and (b) failed properly to apply the ratio of the decision of the Chief Commissioner in CU/255/1984, R(U)3/86, as approved by the Court of Appeal in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer.

By a respondent’s notice the claimant gave notice that it would be contended that the decision of the Tribunal of Commissioners should be affirmed on the additional ground that on its true construction regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983 applied only to a person who ordinarily worked full-time.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Ralph Gibson L.J.

David Latham Q.C. and Richard Drabble for the Chief Adjudication Officer.

Frederic Reynold Q.C. and Mark Rowland for the claimant.

Cur. adv. vult.

29 July. The following judgments were handed down.

RALPH GIBSON L.J. This is an appeal by the Chief Adjudication Officer under section 14 of the Social Security Act 1980 with the leave of the Tribunal of Commissioners against the decision of that tribunal given on 4 February 1987. Such an appeal is on a question of law only. The decision was to the effect that Vincent Anthony Brunt ("the claimant") was not precluded from receiving unemployment benefit over the period 20 January to 23 April 1984. The appeal turns upon the construction of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1983 and the application of those provisions to the part-time employment which the claimant had obtained under a community programme scheme.

The facts and the proceedings

The claimant is now aged 26 years. He left school in 1976 and was employed in a car components company for 19 months. He then served in the Army for five months. Next he worked for a carpet firm for one year and after that as a miner for two years. He was then out of work from 4 January 1982 until 25 October 1983 when he started work under a community programme scheme for two and a half days a week, on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday in each week.

The claimant had received unemployment benefit from January 1982 for the full period of his entitlement, namely the one year or 312 working days as provided by section 18 of the Social Security Act 1974. He re-qualified to receive unemployment benefit after being in employment in his part-time work over 13 weeks since he was in each week working for the necessary number of hours, namely 16 hours per week: section 18(2) of the Act of 1975. He was earning at first £41 per week and later £44 per week. The rate of unemployment benefit had been £30.80 per week.

When he had re-qualified the claimant applied for unemployment benefit in respect of the days on which he was not working. The insurance officer on 10 February 1984 rejected his application on the ground that regulation 7(1)(e) and (2) applied, that is to say that the claimant was regularly working the same number of days in the week for one employer and he was "employed to the full extent normal in his case."

The claimant appealed to the local tribunal and on 16 April 1984 the tribunal upheld the decision of the insurance officer. With the advice and assistance of his union, the General, Municipal, Boilermakers & Allied Trades Union, the claimant sought to appeal to the commissioner; leave was refused by the local tribunal but granted by the commissioner on 16 August 1984.

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A The decision of the Tribunal of Commissioners was not given until 4 February 1987. There was thus a delay of three years between the rejection of the claimant's claim to benefit and the ruling of the commissioners that he was entitled to benefit on the days in question.
 Such delay in dealing with a claim to benefit is, as it seems to me, unacceptable; and, I am sure, is so regarded by the Chief Adjudication Officer and by the commissioners. The explanation for much of that B delay is to be found in the fact that the working of the "full extent normal" rule in regulation 7(1)(e) has caused much difficulty and uncertainty in its application to claimants who, after periods of full-time work and of total unemployment, get a part-time job which provides them with work on only two or three days in the week. The decision by the commissioner upon the claimants' case was postponed on three C occasions, namely in May 1985, in July 1985 and in January 1986, in order to enable the parties, at the invitation of Mr. Commissioner Goodman, to make further submissions by reference to new decisions upon the rule by other commissioners and by reference to the decision of this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224.

D The Manpower Services Commission "Community Programme"

E The number of men and women who were able to get part-time work, after periods of total unemployment, was increased by the introduction of "community programmes" and similar schemes under powers given by the Employment and Training Act 1973. By that Act the Manpower Services Commission was established. One of its functions is to make arrangements for assisting persons to obtain and retain employment. The funds of the commission are provided by the Secretary of State out of money provided by Parliament. The community programme under which the claimant obtained employment on three days a week in October 1983 is described as follows in the handbook published in December 1982 for the guidance of sponsors under the scheme:

F "1. The community programme, which is the successor to the community enterprise programme, is administered by the Manpower Services Commission ('M.S.C.') on behalf of the Secretary of State for Employment to help long-term unemployed adults improve their prospects of obtaining permanent jobs by providing them with temporary employment, either full-time or part-time, on projects G of benefit to the community . . . 3. . . . i. Individual employees may not be employed under the programme for more than 52 weeks. . . .

"M.S.C. Financial Assistance

"46. . . . (b) Other workers—the costs of wages for workers up to a maximum of £60 per week for each full or part-time worker on a project, plus employers' National Insurance contributions."

H By supplement 2:

"15. At the time of recruitment men and women selected for employment must have been unemployed for at least the preceding two months and in the case of those aged 18–24 years, have been unemployed for over six months during the last nine months, and in the case of those aged 25 years or over have been unemployed for at least 12 months during the last 15 months."

The sort of information provided to persons recruited to a community programme job appears from the leaflet where, in addition to describing the programme and its purpose, it explains:

“Being on the community programme should improve your chances of finding permanent work. So if you are offered a permanent job then of course you are free to move to it straightaway. That way, we can help someone else. Ask your employer about time off to go to interviews.”

The decision of the commissioners

Because of the importance and difficulty of the issues raised the appeal of the claimant was referred by direction of the Chief Commissioner to a tribunal of three commissioners. The unanimous decision of the tribunal was delivered on 4 February 1987. The claimant's appeal was allowed. The ruling was that the claimant was not precluded from title to unemployment benefit from 30 January 1984 to 23 April 1984. Mr. Commissioner J. G. Monroe and Mr. Commissioner M. J. Goodman joined in stating their reasons in paragraphs 2 to 15. Mr. Commissioner D. Reith Q.C. stated his reasons in paragraphs 16 to 21. In summary, the reasons of the majority, after statement of the facts as set out above, were as follows: (i) the contract of employment of the claimant on the community programme, as was apparent from the handbook and leaflet, was for a maximum of 52 weeks; the terms of the scheme made it clear that the work was entirely a temporary expedient; and the claimant's personal contract was on the evidence for six months only; (ii) after reference to the decision of a Tribunal of Commissioners in 1985 in the case CU/255/1984, and to the judgment of Slade L.J. in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224, they held:

“15 . . . a person employed for a fixed temporary period with no intention that employment should continue thereafter is not, by reason only of such employment, to be regarded as employed to the full extent normal in his case.”

The two commissioners expressed their view of the rule contained in regulation 7(1)(e). They said that the “full extent normal” rule had originated in decisions of the umpire under the Unemployment Insurance Acts because it was considered that a man who worked say for 11 hours per day on four days per week was not really unemployed at all. With the coming of the National Insurance Act 1946 an attempt was made to codify the rule. Commissioners had on occasion been forced to conclusions (sometimes in relation to persons employed for only a day or even an hour or two a week) that could not conceivably have been reached by the interpretation of the word “unemployed.” Further they said that the prevailing doubts about the extent of the rule and the parallel “normal idle day” rule have harmful effects. It was their belief that many people who genuinely desire full-time employment and are genuinely available for it hesitate to take up part-time employment in the meanwhile because of the risk that one of these rules may, rightly or wrongly, be applied to them. They suggested that urgent consideration should be given to the extension of the exception in regulation 7(2) of the Regulations of 1983 and the corresponding regulation relating to the normal idle day rule (regulation 19(6)) so as to make express provision for excluding such persons from the operation of the rules.

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A In his reasons, Mr. Commissioner Reith Q.C. reviewed some of the principles laid down by commissioners in connection with the "full extent normal" rule since the National Insurance Act 1946. He then stated the main features relating to employment under the community programme. Such employment, he said, is clearly of a temporary nature. It should normally be held (paragraph 21) that "claimants involved in such employment do not fall to be regarded as struck by the full extent normal rule." The decision of the Court of Appeal in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer did not render it incumbent upon him to take a different view. He therefore agreed that the appeal be allowed.

B The Chief Adjudication Officer applied on 16 March 1987 for leave to appeal which was granted on 20 March 1987. The grounds of appeal are, in summary, that (i) the commissioners were wrong in law in holding that because the claimant's part-time employment on the community programme was for a fixed temporary period it could not therefore be regarded as "employment to the full extent normal in his case" and (ii) that the commissioners had failed properly to apply the decision of the Court of Appeal in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer.

D The new regulations

E So far as concerns men and women who have obtained part-time employment under schemes sponsored and financed by government the question raised in this case has been settled with effect from 4 March 1987 by new regulations which, as we were told, preclude claims to unemployment benefit by claimants in such part-time employment in respect of days in the week on which they have no work. The issues raised in this appeal, however, with reference to the instruction of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983 will remain relevant to claimants who have part-time work and who are not within the new regulations.

F The statutory provisions

G The construction of the legislative rule now contained in regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983, with which this case is concerned, has, it is clear, given rise over the years to difficult questions for the insurance officers, now known as adjudicators, who are required to apply the rule to the differing facts of very large numbers of claims. The rule must be set in the context of the unemployment benefit scheme as a whole. The law governing that scheme is complicated. It has been said in a well known textbook, Ogus & Barendt, The Law of Social Security, 2nd ed. (1982), p. 77:

H "The difficulties result partly from the need to adapt the system to changing industrial practices (particularly the shift from six-day to five-day working) and partly from the relationship between social security and labour law. The problems have been exacerbated by a reluctance in the D.H.S.S. to reformulate traditional concepts, some of which are outmoded, and a tendency instead to prefer patchwork solutions, occasionally implemented by poorly drafted regulations."

That part of the law which has been subjected to scrutiny in this case seems to me to give some support to that critical comment.

Provided that the claimant is qualified by reference to age and contribution conditions he is entitled to unemployment benefit "in respect of any day of unemployment which forms part of a period of interruption of employment:" section 14(1)(a) of the Act of 1975. The amount payable by way of benefit for any day of unemployment is one sixth of the appropriate weekly rate: section 14(8). The weekly rate at the time of the hearing of this appeal is £30.80.

Next—and this is an essential principle—the unemployment, if it is to give rise to the right to benefit, must be involuntary. Omitting words concerned with sickness and invalidity benefit it is provided by section 17(1):

"For the purposes of any provisions of this Act relating to unemployment benefit . . . (a) subject to the provisions of this Act, a day shall not be treated in relation to any person—(i) as a day of unemployment unless on that day he is capable of work and he is, or is deemed in accordance with regulations to be, available to be employed in employed earner's employment . . ."

Section 17 contains other provisions for determination of days for which benefit is payable and for application of the expression "day of interruption of employment" but it has been common ground that the details of those provisions are not relevant to the question of construction which is before the court. It is sufficient to note that by section 17(2):

"Regulations may—(a) make provision (subject to subsection (1) above) as to the days which are or are not to be treated for the purposes of unemployment benefit . . . as days of unemployment . . ."

The regulation which is the subject of this appeal is contained in the Regulations of 1983 which were made in the exercise of various powers including the power contained in section 17(2).

Once unemployment benefit has become payable its duration is limited by section 18 to benefit for 312 days but a claimant can recover the right to benefit by section 18(2) when he has again been in employment for 13 weeks since the last day for which he was entitled to that benefit if in each of those weeks he has worked in such employment for 16 hours or more.

The relevant parts of regulation 7 of the Regulations of 1983 are as follows:

"Days not to be treated as days of unemployment . . .

"7(1) For the purposes of unemployment . . . benefit—. . . (e) subject to paragraph (2), a day shall not be treated as a day of unemployment if on that day a person does no work and is a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week (exclusive of Sunday or the day substituted for it by regulation 4) but who is, in the week in which the said day occurs, employed to the full extent normal in his case, and in the application of this sub-paragraph to any person no account shall be taken, in determining either the number of days in a week on which he ordinarily works or the full extent of employment in a week which is normal in his case, of any period of short-time working due to adverse industrial conditions; . . . (2) Paragraph (1)(e) shall not apply to a person unless—(a) there is a recognised or customary working week in connection with his employment; or (b) he regularly works for the same number of days in a week for the same employer or group of employers."

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A It is thus apparent that a claimant may be in employment in a week, and work on a day or days in that week, but still be entitled to unemployment benefit for the day or days on which he does not work.
Such a situation may arise because the employer under the contract of employment puts the claimant on short-time. The question whether such B a claimant is, in the week in question, "employed to the full extent normal in his case" will usually be capable of answer by reference to the normal number of days worked in that employment. A claimant, however, whose normal employment has been full-time may lose such employment and be able to find only part-time employment on certain days in the week. Questions then arise—assuming the claimant to be at all times "available to be employed in employed earner's employment"
C on the days on which he has no work—as to when, if ever, the claimant is to be held to be "employed to the full extent normal in his case" so as to be not entitled to unemployment benefit in respect of the days on which he has no work.

The accepted construction of regulation 7(1)(e)

Before the commissioners in this case it was common ground that the general approach to the proper construction of the regulation which had D been followed in a number of decisions of the commissioners and in the decision of this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224, was correct, namely that the words of the regulation are to be applied according to their ordinary meaning in the statutory context and that the question whether a claimant, in the week in which the day or days of no work occurred, was "employed to the full extent normal in his case," so that he could not for those days claim unemployment E benefit, was to be answered as an issue of fact by reference to the relevant circumstances as determined by Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer and the previous decisions of the commissioners. That approach means that a person who, having previously worked full-time, is in part-time work only because unable to get full-time work, may properly be held to be "employed to the full extent normal in his case" if, despite F his wish and intention to obtain full-time work, he was during the week in question in fact employed to an extent which is shown to have become normal in his case. Within this accepted construction there have arisen difficult and important questions as to the correct definition of the facts relevant to the issue of normality and as to the application of those definitions to the facts of individual cases. The commissioners in this G case decided the claimant's appeal in his favour in accordance with the accepted construction of regulation 7(1)(e) as they understood it and as they judged it to be applicable. Before this court Mr. Latham, for the Chief Adjudication Officer, has submitted that the commissioners misapplied the accepted construction, and in particular failed properly to direct themselves in accordance with the decision of this court in *Riley v.
Chief Adjudication Officer*. Mr. Reynold, on behalf of the claimant, has H conceded that the approach and reasoning of the commissioners is not obviously consistent with Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer. While arguing that the decision of the commissioners should be upheld on the facts even if the accepted construction is correct, Mr. Reynold put forward a new ground for upholding the decision in favour of the claimant which was set out in a respondent's notice under R.S.C., Ord.
59, r. 6(1)(b) for which, without objection from the Chief Adjudication Officer, leave was given.

The "true but forgotten" construction of regulation 7(1)(e)

The main ground upon which Mr. Reynold's argument has proceeded is entirely new. It was not taken before the Tribunal of Commissioners and, I think, has never before been argued before any of the commissioners, or on applications for judicial review before the right of appeal was introduced by section 14 of the Social Security Act 1980, or in this court since that enactment. It is said that regulation 7(1)(e), when considered in its legislative history, and in the light of the existing law at the time when, in its original form, it was first enacted in 1948, and having regard to the mischief at which the provision was directed, must be construed subject to a gloss or qualification upon the literal meaning of the words. That qualification is that regulation 7(1)(e) can apply only to a person who at the relevant time ordinarily works full-time, on a "full normal week" and does not apply to a person who is working part-time only because he is unable to get full-time employment. This was, of course, a surprising contention. If it were to be accepted, this court would have to set aside a construction of the regulation which has been followed and acted upon for a long time in a large number of decisions by commissioners, and by adjudication officers in reliance upon those decisions; and that is a course which we should not take save in exceptional circumstances and for compelling reasons: see Presho v. Department of Health and Social Security [1984] A.C. 310, 319, per Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, approving the principle stated by Lord Denning M.R. in Reg. v. National Insurance Commissioner, Ex parte Stratton [1979] Q.B. 361, 369. Further the accepted construction has been thus applied to a provision in regulations which, so far as concerns the immediately relevant words, has been left undisturbed in its original form despite amendment of and re-enactment of the provision itself. In addition this court would have to depart from the decision of this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224 on the suggested ground that it was made per incuriam.

On first hearing the contention it seemed to me to be hopeless. Mr. Reynold, nevertheless, in a most persuasive submission, supported by material made available by the research of Mr. Rowland, has shown that the contention is supported by arguments of much force. I have, however, in the end reached the conclusion that, for reasons which are given below, this contention cannot prevail. I will first set out Mr. Reynold's submission, as I understood it, in summary form.

(i) It can be seen from the legislative history of the "full extent normal" rule in regulation 7(1)(e) that the rule itself was developed for the purposes of preventing persons, in particular shift workers, who, by means of contractual or other arrangements with their employers, were enabled to work longer hours on particular days and to compress the full calendar working week into fewer working days, from "topping up" with unemployment benefit in respect of the days in the week on which they did no work.

(ii) The rule first appeared in regulation 6 of the National Insurance (Unemployment and Sickness Benefit) Regulations 1948 (S.I. 1948 No. 1277) made in exercise of powers conferred by sections 10 to 13, 24 and 25 of the National Insurance Act 1946. It was then (omitting irrelevant words) in the following form:

"(1) For the purposes of unemployment . . . benefit—(e) a day shall not be treated as a day of unemployment if on that day a

A person does no work, and—(i) is on holiday; or (ii) is a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week (exclusive of Sunday or the day substituted therefor by paragraph (1) of regulation 4) but who has, in the week in which the said day occurs, been employed to the full extent normal in his case; . . .”

(iii) Prior to enactment of the Act of 1946 certain principles had been laid down by the umpires, who had the task of deciding claims on appeal from the Court of Referees under the statutes which were consolidated in the Unemployment Insurance Act 1935 which came into operation on 18 March 1935. The essential conditions of the statutory scheme for unemployment benefit, including those of contribution conditions and of availability for work, were the same as they now are, and it was possible for any three days of unemployment, whether consecutive or not, within a period of six consecutive days to be treated as a continuous period of unemployment: section 35 of the Act of 1935. The principles so laid down included (decision UD1308/36):

“the principle that when a claimant has done a full normal week’s work he is not entitled to benefit for any day of the week upon which, by the terms and conditions of his contract of employment, he does not normally work.”

It was said by the umpire in that case that he knew

“of no instance in which a claimant, who has been employed under a contract of service for only a definite portion of the week, has been for that reason deprived of benefit for the remainder of the week.”

In decision UD4149/38 the umpire referred to certain “well established principles:”

“The first principle is that a claimant who has worked his full normal working week is not entitled to benefit for any day which is a normal non-working day in that week . . . The second principle is that if a claimant owing to circumstances beyond his control has not worked his full normal working week he is entitled to benefit for all the days of that week upon which he is not at work.”

(iv) No such principle as the “full normal week’s work” was necessary in order to deny unemployment benefit to a claimant who was working part-time from choice and not involuntarily because he would be denied unemployment benefit for days not worked on the ground that he was not on those days “available” for additional work.

(v) Nothing in the main principles or purposes of the then scheme of unemployment benefit required a claimant to be denied unemployment benefit in respect of days not worked, provided he was “available” for full-time work, merely because part-time work had become capable of being regarded as “normal” for him.

(vi) Regulation 6(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1948 was, it should be inferred, made for no reason other than to exclude those who had in the week in question worked a “full normal week’s work.” The other provisions in regulation 6 had prior legislative origins: only paragraph 1(e) was new as a legislative provision. Moreover it was clear, said Mr. Reynold, that paragraph 1(e) of regulation 6 was made pursuant to section 11(3) of the National Insurance Act 1946 (power to make regulations as to the days which are or are not to be treated . . . as days of unemployment) and not section 13(4) (power to make regulations for imposing in the case of any class of persons additional conditions with respect to the receipt of unemployment benefit etc.). The accepted construction of the regulation in its previous and current forms is, it is said, the imposition of conditions in the case of a class, i.e., part-time workers; and the fact that the regulation was first made under section 11(3) and not section 13(4) of the Act of 1946 demonstrates that such a construction cannot have been originally intended.

(vii) Commissioners who have wide knowledge of this branch of the law have acknowledged that the "full extent normal rule" had its origins in the pre-war decisions of the umpire: see per Mr. Commissioner Mitchell CU/444/1984. Reference was made also to the reasons of Mr. Commissioner Monroe and Mr. Commissioner Goodman given in this case.

(viii) Application of the literal meaning of the words in regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983 in accordance with the accepted construction, has given rise to difficulties, injustice and absurdities such that, in accordance with authority, this court should reject the literal meaning and apply the qualification contended for by Mr. Reynold. The injustice and absurdity are exemplified, it is said, by the decision CU/444/1984 where Mr. Commissioner Mitchell on 19 June 1986 rejected a claimant's appeal by applying the "full extent normal rule" so as to produce a result which he described as ludicrous. The claimant was 63 years old. He had been in full-time employment throughout the great majority of his adult life. After some periods of unemployment between 1979 and 1982, in May 1982 he again got full-time work but in September 1982 was again made redundant. His application for unemployment benefit was rejected because he had a job, in which he was self-employed, as a collector of football pool coupons. The work occupied about one hour a week on Friday evening. He earned by it about £3 per week. The commissioner first held that the claimant could not escape from regulation 7(1)(e) by reason of regulation 7(2): he held that on the evidence there was in connection with the claimant's business as a collector a "recognised or customary working week." Applying the tests laid down by Slade L.J. in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224 the commissioner held that looking backward and forward from the date of the insurance officer's decision the pattern of the claimant's working week, i.e., the work as collector, was "normal" in his case. The de minimis rule could not be applied because of regulation 7(1)(g) which provides:

"a day shall not be treated as a day of unemployment if on that day a person is engaged in any employment unless—(i) the earnings derived from that employment, in respect of that day, do not exceed £2. . . ."

The commissioner added:

"3 . . . I can see no way in which I can properly circumvent the words of the legislation and thereby obviate a preposterous result. Whether anything will ever be done about it by the legislature, I do not know. In this corner of the law—as with that relating to seasonal workers—there appears to be an extraordinary antipathy to remedying injustices which save departmental money."

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A (ix) Further, said Mr. Reynold, the refinements developed in the course of applying the accepted construction have produced other forms of absurdity. Since in deciding whether, in the week in question, the claimant has been employed to the full extent normal in his case, the accepted construction requires the adjudication officer to have regard to the future (per Slade L.J. in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224), it was open to him to conclude that, although the claimant had B then only part-time work, nevertheless if he had been offered and had taken that part-time work on a basis that in quite a short time he would be offered and accept full-time employment with the same employer, the current short time work might thereby be shown to be temporary only and not normal for him. That means, said Mr. Reynold, that two claimants with precisely similar past histories of employment and C unemployment might at the same time obtain part-time employment with the same employer. The first is told that he will, after a period, get full-time employment. The second is not. If the accepted construction is applied the first will get, in addition to his part-time wages, unemployment benefit for the days not worked until (if it happens within the period to which his right to benefit endures) he obtains full-time work. The D second, who has not such hope of full-time employment, will get his part-time wages and no unemployment benefit. Such a result, it is said, cannot have been intended by Parliament.

(x) The injustice and absurdity, it was said, produced by application of the accepted construction justify rejection of the literal meaning and adoption of the qualification proposed. Reference was made to River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 546 and to Swan v.
E Pure Ice Co. Ltd. [1935] 2 K.B. 265.

(xi) The attention of the Court of Appeal in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224 was not drawn to the argument summarised above and was thereby led into error. Within the principles stated by Evershed M.R. in Morelle Ltd. v. Wakeling [1955] 2 Q.B. 379, 406-407, this court should regard Riley's case as decided per incuriam.

F In reply to this contention Mr. Latham did not attack or seek to deal with each step of Mr. Reynold's argument. In essence he said that, however attractive be the suggestion as to what in 1948 the policy should or might have been, the policy which was adopted was expressed in regulation 6(1)(e) of those regulations and there is no sufficient indication that the intention of the legislature was anything other than that to be derived from construction of the words used.

G Next Mr. Latham sought to reverse Mr. Reynold's argument in paragraph (vi) above. If Mr. Reynold is right the qualification to be put on regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983 is to the effect that a particular class of persons should have applied to them an additional condition in respect of receipt of unemployment benefit, namely those ordinarily working full-time: i.e., the class of persons identified by the H umpires' decisions. If that were the purpose, the minister should have been using his powers under section 13(4) of the Act of 1946 but it is asserted by Mr. Reynold that in making regulation 6(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1948 he did not use that power. Therefore regulation 6(1)(e) must have been intended to apply not to a class of persons only but generally to all persons caught by its terms. The subsequent application of the regulation in its consecutive forms has been general, i.e., both to part-time workers who are willing to take full-time work and to those doing "a full normal week's work" within Mr. Reynold's proposed qualification. A Further Mr. Latham relied upon the fact that, with knowledge of the application of the accepted construction by insurance officers and commissioners, Parliament has approved successive re-enactments of regulation 6(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1948 in 1965, 1975 and 1983. Further, in 1959 there was added by paragraph 3 of the National Insurance (Unemployment and Sickness Benefit) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1959 (S.I. 1959 No. 1278) to regulation 7(1)(e) the final part: B

"and in the application of this sub-paragraph to any person no account shall be taken, in determining either the number of days in a week on which he ordinarily works or the full extent of employment in a week which is normal in his case, of any period of short-time working due to adverse industrial conditions;" C

That addition must be based upon the premise that the accepted construction was correct.

Finally, it was pointed out that the National Insurance Act 1946 was not a consolidating Act but an Act:

"to establish an extended system of national insurance providing pecuniary payments by way of unemployment benefit, sickness benefit . . . to repeal or amend the existing enactments relating to . . . national . . . insurance. . . ." D

The new Act swept up and used many of the concepts and rules previously contained in the statutory schemes but there were changes and new wording was used: for example, compare section 55(2)(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act 1935 with section 13(4) of the Act of 1946. E

Mr. Latham acknowledged that the accepted construction had produced difficulties and cases of which the result could rightly be regarded as absurd. Correctly applied in accordance with the guidance given by this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224, such cases should be rare and any injustices caused by them not great. For example, in the case of the pools collector who lost unemployment benefit because of earning £3 per week, it was suggested that the decision on the facts was perhaps not the only decision fairly open to the commissioner. Applying the ratio in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, it was not clear why the work of collecting, which the claimant had been doing in addition to full-time work since 1971, should, after he lost full-time work in September 1983, be regarded by March 1984 as being itself employment to the full extent normal for the claimant. F G

For my part, I have no doubt that Mr. Latham's submissions are in general right and that Mr. Reynold's main contention cannot succeed. There is much force in Mr. Reynold's arguments if we were free to devise and apply a policy but that, of course, is not our task. If we could identify the mischief at which regulation 6(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1948 was directed, or the purpose intended by Parliament to be achieved by that regulation, with sufficient certainty, then we should in construing the regulation try to give to it a meaning which deals with that mischief and which does not go beyond the purpose of Parliament. For my part, I am unable to know what the mischief was, or what the purpose of Parliament was, in enacting regulation 6(1)(e) in 1948 save as is revealed H

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A by the words used. The umpires had devised the principles referred to in deciding the cases which had come before them. I am unable to conclude that the intention of Parliament was to enact only the principle contended for by Mr. Reynold, namely, that the only persons to be excluded by the "full extent normal rule" are those who have worked a "full normal week's work." If that had been the intention I have no
 B doubt that different and more apt words would have been used. Further, since the "full normal week's work" would have to be capable of being established for the rule to operate, I would have expected some definition of the meaning of the phrase since it must apply to some concept of general normality in a trade or a district. The words actually used, moreover, not only do not refer to a concept of a full normal week's work but refer expressly to employment of the claimant in the C week in which the day (of no work) occurs which is "to the full extent normal in his case," showing thereby, as it seems to me, that the regulation requires attention to be paid to the particular circumstances of the claimant and to what is normal in his particular case.

Finally, of course, this court is bound, in my judgment, to abide by this court's decision in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224.
 D The ratio of that decision must be examined for the purposes of considering the Chief Adjudication Officer's ground of appeal and Mr.
 Reynold's answer to it. It is not possible to regard the decision as reached per incuriam within the principles stated by Evershed M.R. in Morelle Ltd. v. Wakeling [1955] 2 Q.B. 379, 406, 407, cited above.

The decisions before Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer

E Before examining the ground of decision in Riley's case it is necessary to refer to some decisions which preceded and were considered in Riley's case. A number of general tests or guides, designed to assist in the ascertainment of what is "ordinary" and "normal" for the application of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983 had emerged from decisions of commissioners between 1949 and 1985. They were drawn to F the attention of the court in Riley's case. These tests, to give them the names by which Slade L.J. referred to them in his judgment in Riley's case, can be briefly described as follows:

(i) The "one year before test" was stated in decision CU/518/49:

G "A claimant who has in fact worked only on some days of the week for a period of a year or more is 'a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in the week,' unless there are some exceptional industrial circumstances relevant to his case."

(ii) The "50 per cent. test" was explained in decision R(U)/14/59:

H "during the year ending with the day in question (or such other period as may provide a more suitable test in a particular case) a claimant has worked on less than 50 per cent. of the days of the week in question (excluding any day of incapacity for work or holiday on days on which he was unemployed because his employment had been terminated) that day should be held to be one on which in the normal course the claimant would not work. If the claimant has worked on as much as 50 per cent. of such days, it should (in my view) be held that it has not been proved that in the normal course he would not have worked on the day in question."

(iii) The "stop gap test" was stated in decision CU/518/49:

"On the other hand, if a claimant took up, when unemployed, employment which did not involve working every day of the week as a stop gap, while looking for full-time employment, he could not properly be held to be 'a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week.'"

A

Further, in decision CU/255/1984 a Tribunal of Commissioners had considered the entitlement to unemployment benefit of a man aged 53 who, after being in full-time employment for 25 years was unemployed "almost continuously" for two years and four months from November 1980 to April 1983. He then got part-time employment as a painter's labourer for 20 hours on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays under a community task force scheme. On taking that employment he was told that it was likely to lead to full-time employment with the task force and in the event he got such employment in August 1983. The commissioners held that the claimant was not prevented by regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983 from claiming unemployment benefit on Thursday, Friday and Saturday in each week. The majority applied the "stop gap" test saying:

"Subject to the principles enunciated above, what constitutes stop gap work will always depend upon the circumstances of each individual case. However, regard must be had to contemporary economic and social conditions. In times like the present where there is a high degree of unemployment, one may more readily accept that part-time work is undertaken as a stop gap exercise. In the present case we are satisfied that the claimant only took up the work he did as such a stop gap."

The Chief Commissioner's reasons on the other hand were different and were regarded as correct by this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224. He said:

"In establishing whether there is a regime or pattern at the time of the day in question the past working pattern is not necessarily conclusive or the only method by which the existence or non-existence of a pattern or regime is to be determined."

F

He considered that the stop gap test must be applied with caution and in particular did not agree that because there was at present a high degree of unemployment, then it might be more readily accepted that part-time work was stop gap. He thought it would be flying in the face of economic reality to rely on the previous working history itself as pointing to a likelihood of a return to a pattern of work established by the claimant's previous employment. Nevertheless, he inferred that the claimant had taken up his new part-time employment in April 1983 on the basis that he would in quite a short time be offered and accept full-time employment with the same employers, which in the event happened. By that route he concurred in the conclusion that the claimant was to be treated as ordinarily working full-time for the community task force at the relevant days.

G

H

The decision in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer

The facts in Riley's case were these. The claimant was aged 29 and was disabled. He had worked full-time as a clerk for $7\frac{1}{2}$ years until his employment was terminated on 1 October 1982. On 15 November 1982

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A he claimed unemployment benefit. On 1 March 1983 after five months of unemployment he took up employment with the Coventry Sports Association for the Disabled as a salaries and financial controller at a gross wage of £36 per week. He was required to work 16 hours per week, 8 hours on Thursday and 8 on Friday. The job was provided under a job creation scheme intended to help people who had been out of work for some time. Mr. Riley's claim for unemployment benefit on B the days not worked was rejected on the ground that regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983 applied to him. His appeal to the local tribunal was dismissed; and his further appeal to the commissioner was dismissed by Mrs. Commissioner Heggs on the ground that he had a clear pattern of employment from 1 March 1983 when he started the part-time employment. His past history of full-time employment was not C to be regarded as his usual pattern of employment and it was not "material in deciding whether he does not ordinarily work on every day in a week."

The Court of Appeal held that the commissioner had gone wrong in law. Slade L.J., in a judgment with which Ackner and Glidewell L.JJ. agreed, said, at p. 1231A-B that he was in entire agreement with the following statement of principle by the majority in decision CU/255/84:

D "It is clear in our view that the words 'in his case' draw attention to the particular claimant and what is normal for him and do not confine the inquiry simply to what is normal for the particular employment he holds during the week in which the day in question occurs. This is the view which seems to have been universally accepted in commissioners' decisions since the statutory provision E was originally enacted in 1948, and any reinterpretation of the provision some 37 years later (particularly as the relevant words have on various occasions been re-enacted by Parliament in the context of commissioners' decisions) would clearly be wholly unacceptable."

F Slade L.J. therefore held that the commissioner was in error in entirely disregarding the claimant's past history, of both work and unemployment, before 1 March 1983 when the part-time employment had begun. The commissioner's decision was therefore set aside and the claimant's appeal from the local tribunal was remitted to be heard by another commissioner.

G In reaching that conclusion Slade L.J. considered and expressed his view upon the way in which questions arising under regulation 7(1)(e) and (2) should be approached:

(i) Whether the claimant is "a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week" and "who is in the week in which the said day occurs employed to the full extent normal in his case" are questions of fact falling to be decided in the light of the particular circumstances of the case.

H (ii) The "one year before test," the "50 per cent. test" and the stop gap test" were general tests or guides to assist in the ascertainment of what is "ordinary" and "normal" but they have not been entirely consistently applied.

(iii) He accepted as broadly correct the submission that regulation 7(1)(e) necessitates the ascertainment of the claimant's ordinary regime or pattern of work as at the relevant week and that his working history is only relevant in so far as it sheds light on what is normal for him in that relevant week by facilitating the prediction of what may happen in his case in the near future; and the “stop gap test” is of assistance only in so far as it may help to identify the ordinary working pattern as at the relevant week.

(iv) There is no difference between the concepts of “ordinariness” and “normality” embodied in regulation 7(1)(e). The essential question posed by the regulation is: was the claimant’s pattern of work in the relevant week the normal pattern for him at that time? and that question is to be answered objectively according to the facts as they are and not as the claimant would wish them to be.

(v) To answer that essential question requires that the officer or tribunal concerned should try to look into the future in order to decide how permanent or transitory the present pattern of work is likely to be.

(vi) If there is clear evidence as to what is likely in the future, that may well be conclusive. For example, a new part-time occupation may be taken up by a worker with the intention of making it henceforward his normal occupation. But the commissioner must also pay attention to the claimant’s past history of both work and unemployment. Evidence of past regular full-time work may carry little weight if it is succeeded by a long period of unemployment. On the other hand, evidence of full-time employment over several years finishing only a short time before the part-time unemployment started may be strong evidence that the part-time employment has not yet become the normal pattern of work for the particular claimant and is properly to be regarded as “stop gap” employment in his particular case. The stop gap test must be applied with circumspection. Slade L.J. agreed with the opinion of the Chief Commissioner in CU/255/1984 as set out above.

(vii) The “one year before test” is only a guideline which cannot supplant the language of regulation 7(1)(e) but see decision CU/255/1984, para. 26:

“the prima facie approach of adopting a ‘one year before basis’ . . . affords a practical—but certainly not inviolable—approach which ought not to be disturbed. . . .”

(viii) Finally, provided attention is properly directed to all the circumstances including the claimant’s pattern of work over the one year (or such other period as may be thought more appropriate) preceding the week in question; and to any evidence upon which it is possible to assess his working prospects for the immediately foreseeable future; “in an appropriate case normality is capable of being established from a pattern of work over a much shorter period than a year.”

If I have understood it correctly the precise ground of decision of the court in Riley’s case was that the commissioner had misdirected herself in failing to have regard to the past history of both work and unemployment of the claimant. The court, however, also gave guidance as to the way in which the essential questions of fact arising under regulation 7(1)(e) should be addressed and as to the use of the various tests and guides which have been developed. I do not find it necessary to consider to what extent it might be open to this court to depart from the guidance so given because I respectfully agree with all that was said.

The problems which have arisen in the application of regulation 7(1)(e) to the different facts of the history and future prospects of large numbers of claimants, and the tests and guides which have been developed in the effort to deal with the problems and to ensure, as far

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A as possible, that essentially similar cases are decided in the same way by different adjudication officers, resemble in their nature the problems which arose and the tests which were devised with reference to the question under the Workmen's Compensation Acts and under section 50 of the Social Security Act 1975 whether a claimant suffered the accident "in the course of his employment." In Nancollas v. Insurance Officer [1985] 1 All E.R. 833, 835, Sir John Donaldson M.R. said:

B "In the course of his employment"
 "These apparently clear and simple words gave rise to endless litigation in the context of the Workmen's Compensation Acts and have proved no less prolific in their present context. None of these authorities purports to construe the words other than in their natural meaning. None provides a simple formula which, on application to the facts, provides a ready answer to the question, 'Did he suffer the accident in the course of his employment?' and, in the nature of things, none could do so, because the incidents of employment are so varied. All that they can and do attempt is to draw attention to factors which are material and should be taken into account and balanced one against the other in answering the question. The authorities have, therefore, to be studied for guidance as to the approach to be adopted, rather than as providing any answer in particular cases."

D It seems to me that this court in Slade L.J.'s judgment in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224 was "drawing attention to factors which are material and should be taken into account and balanced one against the other" in deciding cases under regulation 7(1)(e).

The present grounds of appeal

F In the first ground of appeal it is contended that the commissioners held that, because the claimant's part-time employment was for a fixed temporary period, it could not be regarded as being employment to the full extent normal in his case, and that in so holding they erred in law. As I understand them, the commissioners did not express their reasons in those terms: the majority said:

G "15 . . . a person employed for a fixed temporary period with no intention that the employment should continue thereafter is not, by reason only of such employment, to be regarded as employed to the full extent normal in his case."

As stated, that ruling admits the possibility that a person who is employed for a fixed temporary period may, having regard to the other evidence, be held to be employed to the full extent normal in his case, and, as so stated, is not in my view contrary to the ruling made and guidance given in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer.

H However, having directed themselves that a person employed for a fixed temporary period is not by reason only of that employment to be regarded as employed to the full extent normal in his case, the commissioners did not go on expressly to consider in accordance with the guidance given in Riley's case whether, having regard to his past history of employment and of unemployment, and to any clear indication of his working prospects for the immediately foreseeable future, the claimant's employment in the week in question was "to the full extent normal in his case.” They appear to have treated as decisive the finding that the claimant’s part-time work was for a fixed temporary period irrespective of the period of one year and four months of unemployment which had preceded the start of part-time employment. Further, their reference to the ground of decision in Riley’s case is not easy to follow: They said:

“12 . . . The Court of Appeal reversed this decision” (of the commissioner that the part-time working immediately became the norm) “. . . on the ground that it was necessary to look forward as well as backward in determining what was normal . . .”

I think that this may have been a transposition of words in dictating because, as explained above, the ground of decision of the Court of Appeal was that the commissioner had wrongly failed to draw attention to the past record of work (which included five months of unemployment) as throwing light upon the essential question of deciding whether the claimant’s pattern of work was the normal pattern for him at that time.

The approach of Mr. Commissioner Reith was, I think, in substance the same. He was of the view that those who obtained employment on the basis set out in the community programme (a 52 weeks maximum coupled with the hope of leaving for other employment before that period expired) “21 . . . were not precluded from receiving unemployment benefit during the days of unemployment because of the provisions of regulation 7(1)(e).” He felt able to lay down a general principle for guidance with reference to such employment:

“Such employment is in my opinion clearly of a temporary nature, and it should normally be held that claimants involved in such employment do not fall to be regarded as struck by the full extent normal rule.”

The commissioner had, of course, referred to the facts but after stating that principle he made no reference to the past record of work and of unemployment or to his view of any prospects which the claimant had of obtaining full-time employment in the future. He also seems to me to have regarded his view as to the temporary nature of the part-time work as decisive.

In my judgment the main grounds of appeal put forward by Mr. Latham have been made out. It seems to me that the commissioners did misdirect themselves in treating as decisive of the essential question of fact before them their view that the part-time employment of the claimant was temporary in the sense described by them; and that, in so doing, they failed to follow or to apply the decision and guidance given by this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224. I have great sympathy with the commissioners and with what I think their purpose was: namely to provide a clear and readily intelligible and applicable test for the large number of claimants who have part-time work under the community scheme. It was not, however, as I think, open to the commissioners to lay down any such principle as to any necessary or prima facie effect of the temporary nature of employment under the community programme upon the applicability of regulation 7(1)(e). The temporary nature of the employment is a factor in all the circumstances to be considered in answering the essential questions, as explained in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer: but as there stated:

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A "the words 'in his case' [in the regulation] draw attention to the particular claimant and what is normal for him and do not confine the inquiry simply to what is normal for the particular employment he holds . . ."

B The commissioners, having stated the terms and purpose of employment under the community programme, did not consider the matters listed in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, namely the past and the future in order to determine objectively whether the claimant's pattern of work in the relevant week was the normal pattern of work for him at that time.

C Since the Chief Adjudication Officer has, in my judgment, demonstrated that the commissioners misdirected themselves in law, their conclusion upon the essential questions of fact may be set aside. It is open to this court to decide those questions if it is clear to us that only one answer is consistent with the facts found by the commissioners in the light of the law as it appears to this court to be. It has not been suggested that any further relevant facts could be revealed if the appeal was remitted and counsel for both sides invited the court to decide the issue, each contending that it should be answered in favour of his client.

D For my part I think only one answer is consistent with the facts found when considered in the light of the decision in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer. There had been full employment before 4 January 1982 but unbroken unemployment for one year and ten months followed by part-time employment from October 1983 until the date of the claim. The only evidence of employment in the future was continuing part-time employment. The fact that the existing pattern of part-time employment had a likely ending six months after it started does not in my judgment provide any basis for saying that such employment was not in the relevant week the normal pattern of work for him: there was no other pattern of work sufficiently close in time in the past or in the immediately foreseeable future to be set against it.

F For these reasons I would allow this appeal, set aside the decision of the commissioners and re-instate the unanimous decision of the local tribunal which had upheld the decision of the adjudication officer.

G KERR L.J. It is only with great hesitation and reluctance that I have come to accept the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed, at any rate at the level of this court, because of the decision of this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224. My regret is that the combined effect of that decision and of the present one appears to leave the application of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1983 to different situations in a deplorably uncertain state, whereas the decisions of the commissioners which have now been reversed in both these appeals sought to lay down tests which would at any rate have provided some uniformity in the application of the rule in cases like the present.

H

However, their decisions are not satisfactory, though the fault clearly lies with the wording of the regulation. The commissioner's decision which was reversed in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer could clearly not be allowed to stand, despite the simplicity of its application. Mrs. Commissioner Heggs had in effect held that the necessary criterion for the application of the "full extent normal" rule was simply the claimant's actual time-table of days of work during the week or weeks to which his (or her) claim related. So, if the scheme of his employment at the time in question involved working on no more than X days per week, then X days per week constituted the full extent of the claimant's normal employment for the purposes of regulation 7(1)(e). The result was that his application for unemployment benefit for the remaining working days of the week must necessarily fail. That could clearly not be right, since it simply substituted the ascertainment of actuality for the prescribed test based on "normality."

The reasoning underlying the decision of the Tribunal of Commissioners in the present case admittedly had the double advantage of ease of application to cases of this kind and of involving the application of a test of normality to some extent. But it is to be noted that by their route of reasoning they reached precisely the opposite conclusion to that of Mrs. Commissioner Heggs. They simply say, in effect, that a person cannot properly be treated as employed to the full extent which is normal in his case if he accepts temporary part-time employment of this nature for a fixed and relatively short period, in anticipation of learning a trade and/or the hope of obtaining full employment thereafter, with permission to leave at any earlier time if an opportunity for obtaining more or full employment should present itself in the interim. I can see no objection to this reasoning in principle. A period of part-time employment of this nature has a makeshift, stop gap or faute de mieux character which is the antithesis of what should properly be regarded as constituting the full normal extent of the claimant's employment.

I should therefore have greatly preferred to dismiss this appeal from their decision. But I cannot avoid the conclusion that this would involve a departure from the reasoning of the decision of this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224. This requires consideration of the claimant's immediately preceding employment or unemployment record, as well as his future if it is reasonably clear, as mandatory ingredients of the test of "normality" in comparison with the period of part-time employment to which the application relates. This ingredient is entirely absent from the test applied by the Tribunal of Commissioners in the present case.

We do not know whether the problems of uncertainty in the application of the various tests referred to in the judgment of this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer were explored in argument in that case to the same extent as before us on this appeal. The decision in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer admittedly involves a full assessment of the "normality" of the period of employment in question in comparison with the history of the applicant's employment or unemployment in general, past and foreseeable. In that sense its merit is no doubt that it gives the fullest effect to the ordinary meaning of the phrase "to the full extent normal in his case"—if such a phrase, in a provision which appears at times to contain a treble negative, can in any event be considered to have any ordinary meaning. But, with all due respect, the judgment gives rise to problems of application which may not have been fully appreciated. In comparison with the tests applied by the commissioners who were overruled in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer and are being overruled again in the present case, the decision in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer precludes any possibility of ease or uniformity of application. One does not know to what extent that aspect was considered.

3 W.L.R.

Chief Adjudication Officer v. Brunt (C.A.)

Kerr L.J.

A In that connection it must be borne in mind that decisions about the eligibility or otherwise for unemployment benefit of people who are only able to obtain part-time employment must be made in tens of thousands of cases throughout the country every week. These decisions are made by insurance officers ("adjudicators") in circumstances which presumably allow little time for investigation or reflection. It was accepted on behalf of the representatives of the department who were present in court in support of this appeal that the decisions "on the ground" made in individual cases up and down the country may well vary greatly in their approach, according to local conditions and locally accepted rules of application. These decisions may well bear little or no affinity to the doctrines laid down in the course of appeals to commissioners, which are themselves not easily assimilated, let alone to occasional pronouncements made at the level of this court.

C The foregoing considerations form part of the reasons which cause me to follow the decision of this court in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, and consequently to join in allowing this appeal, only with great reluctance. But apart from the uncertainty in its application to individual cases which inevitably results from the Riley approach, the unattractive feature which it shares with the simpler decisions of the commissioners in that case as well as the present, is that none of the tests so far discussed appears to have any connection with any consideration of the intended social or other policy which must presumably underlie regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983. The scheme of the legislation is to award or deny unemployment benefit by reference to individual days of unemployment in each week, exclusive of Sundays and any day substituted for it: see section 17(1) of the Social Security Act 1975 and regulation 7(1)(e). The pre-requisite for entitlement to unemployment benefit on any day of unemployment is that the applicant must be capable of work on that day and available, or deemed to be available, to be employed in employed earner's employment on that day: see section 17(1). It follows that all persons are disqualified who only work on certain days because they work part-time by choice, and who are accordingly unavailable for employment on the remaining working days. That leaves those, like the applicants in all the cases which have arisen for consideration, who are at any rate available or deemed to be available for employment on the remaining days. Some of these, depending on the test applied, are then eligible for unemployment benefit for those remaining days, whereas the others are not.

F None of the interpretations of the test "to the full extent normal in his case" which have so far been discussed appear to draw any discernible line of social or other sensible policy distinction between those who are eligible and those who are not. How can that have been in accordance with the intention of the legislation? Presumably the legislation has some underlying policy purpose. But where is it reflected in the various interpretations of regulation 7(1)(e) which have been published and discussed?

H When Mr. Reynold developed what Ralph Gibson L.J. has aptly termed the "true but forgotten" construction of regulation 7(1)(e) as explained in his judgment I was convinced that Mr. Reynold was right in part in claiming to be able to point to its original policy source. But I also felt that the language which was ultimately adopted in regulation 6(1) of the National Insurance (Unemployment and Sickness Benefit) Regulations 1948 may have been intended to take care of a further aspect of policy, viz. the effort or lack of effort by an applicant for unemployment benefit to find employment on his days of unemployment. Of course, as this court said in Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer, post, p. 1224, the test laid down by the regulation must be applied objectively, according to the facts as they are not as the applicant would wish them to be. But leaving aside all subjective considerations, and allowing for the requirement of availability for employment on the non-working days as a statutory pre-requisite for entitlement to unemployment benefit on those days, why should manifest and verifiable efforts made by an applicant to obtain employment on the "normal idle days" not form part of the test whether the actual extent of his employment during the week in question is employment "to the full extent normal" in his case? If a person shows by his actions that he does not regard his part-time employment as normal, because he actively seeks to obtain full-time employment or further employment on the days when he is unemployed, that would surely be an indication that the limited extent of his actual employment is not employment "to the full extent normal in his case." Conversely, if he makes no such efforts, then it is fair to infer that his actual part-time employment has in his case become the full extent of his normal employment.

I fail to see why an inquiry on these lines should not form part of the "full extent normal" test for the purposes of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulations of 1983. An objection which might at first sight be raised to this suggestion is that it is as novel as the "true but forgotten" construction of the regulation. But in fact this does not appear to be the case. It seems that a test on these lines may in fact be applied "on the ground" at the level of insurance officers and local tribunals. In the present case the chairman of the local tribunal, Mr. Dennis H. Greene, signed the "Grounds of decision (including reported decisions of the commissioner considered by tribunal)" on 16 April 1984 in the following terms:

"The claimant states that he inquired about vacancies at Rainhill Hospital last week—i.e., after he had received the papers regarding his appeal—although he has been working in the community programme scheme since last October he does not appear to have taken any steps which would justify a claim that he was actively and caring to obtain full-time employment. The dicta in commissioner's decision CU518/49 & R(U)1/73 followed. Accordingly the claimant is one to whom regulation 7(1)(e) . . . applies."

We were not referred to these commissioners' decisions and they are not in the material before us; nor was there any discussion in argument about these "grounds of decision" at the level of the local tribunal, which only struck me in the course of considering this judgment. I am therefore unable to deal any further with this aspect, except that it somewhat diminishes my reluctance to allow this appeal and thus to deprive the claimant of benefit for the days in question. But there is obviously great need for a re-consideration of the whole position at the level of the House of Lords and/or in relation to the wording of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Regulation of 1983. As mentioned by Ralph Gibson L.J., we have been told that since March 1987 this will no longer apply to community schemes of this nature, since there will be no entitlement to any unemployment benefit in such cases, presumably because they are already publicly funded. But similar problems will

[COURT OF APPEAL]

RILEY v. CHIEF ADJUDICATION OFFICER

1985 July 11; 25

Ackner, Slade and Glidewell L.JJ.

Social Security—Unemployment benefit—Disqualification from benefit—Claimant out of work after full-time work—Claimant obtaining part-time work under job creation scheme—Whether claimant person not ordinarily working every day—Whether claimant employed to full extent normal in his case—Test to be applied—Whether claimant precluded from entitlement to unemployment benefit—Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1975 (S.I. 1975 No. 564), reg. 7(1)(e)¹

APPEAL from Social Security Commissioner.

The claimant, David James Riley, became unemployed and on 15 November 1982 claimed unemployment benefit which he continued to receive until the end of February 1983. On 1 March 1983 he took employment which required him to work only on Thursdays and Fridays each week. On 15 March 1983 he claimed unemployment benefit in respect of the days of the week on which he did not work, and on 10 May 1983 the insurance officer decided that benefit was not payable to him for 9, 12, 14, 15 and 16 March, on the ground that he regularly worked for the same number of days in a week for the same employer and had been employed to the full extent normal in his case in the weeks in which those days fell, and ordered a forward disallowance of benefit for Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Saturdays under regulation 12(4) of the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations 1979. The claimant appealed to the Coventry and District Local Tribunal, which dismissed the appeal. On the claimant's appeal from that decision, a social security commissioner, Mrs. R. F. M. Heggs, on 8 May 1984 dismissed the appeal and disallowed any further claim in respect of such days falling before 9 May 1984, and granted the claimant leave to appeal.

By a notice of appeal the claimant, pursuant to that leave, appealed, for an order that he be paid unemployment benefit in respect of the relevant days, on the grounds (1) that the commissioner had erred in holding that the claimant had in the material weeks been a "person who does not ordinarily work on every day in the week" and "employed to the full extent normal in his case," within the meaning of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1975; (2) that she had erred in law in following decision CU/207/83, which was not correct; and (3) that she should have followed decisions CU/518/49, R(U) 36/51, R(U) 2/52 and R(U) 30/53, which correctly decided the issues in the instant case.

The following case is referred to in the judgment of Slade L.J.:

Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer (C.A.)

- A Mark Rowland for the claimant.
Richard Drabble for the Chief Adjudication Officer.

Cur. adv. vult.

25 July. The following judgments were handed down.

- B SLADE L.J. With the leave of the commissioner, the claimant, Mr. David James Riley, appeals from a decision of Mrs. R. F. M. Heggs, a social security commissioner, given on 8 May 1984. By this decision she dismissed his appeal from a decision of the Coventry and District Local Tribunal and held that unemployment benefit was not payable to him for 9, 12, 14, 15 and 16 March 1983 on the grounds that those days were not to be treated as "days of unemployment" by virtue of regulation 7(1)(e) of the Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1975 (S.I. 1975 No. 564). Pursuant to regulation 12(4) of the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Regulations 1979 (S.I. 1979 No. 628), she further decided that her decision was to be treated as a disallowance of any further claim in respect of a Saturday, Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday falling before 9 May 1984 if the grounds for holding that unemployment benefit was not payable continued to exist.

- D The claimant, who at the date of the commissioner's decision was aged 29, is disabled. He worked full time as a clerk for $7\frac{1}{2}$ years until his employment was terminated on 1 October 1982. On 15 November 1982 he claimed unemployment benefit. On 1 March 1983 he took up employment with the Coventry Sports Association for the Disabled as a salaries and financial controller, at a gross wage of £36 per week. His contract of employment required him to work "16 hours per week—Thursday eight hours and Friday eight hours." The commissioner found that "it was expected that his employment would last for one year," although no precise period was stipulated in the contract of employment. The employment, we have been told, was provided by the association as part of a job creation scheme intended to help those who have been out of work for some time.

- E By virtue of section 14(1)(a) of the Social Security Act 1975, a person who satisfies certain specified conditions is entitled to unemployment benefit in respect of any "day of unemployment" which forms part of "a period of interruption of employment." Section 17(2)(a) provides for the making of regulations making provision as to the days which are or are not to be treated as "days of unemployment" for the purposes of unemployment benefit.

- F Such regulations are to be found in regulation 7 of the Regulations of 1975, which it is common ground are the relevant regulations. Regulation 7(1) provides:

- G "For the purposes of unemployment, sickness and invalidity benefit . . . (e) subject to paragraph (2), a day shall not be treated as a day of unemployment if on that day a person does no work and is a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week (exclusive of Sunday, or the day substituted for it by regulation 4) but who is, in the week in which the said day occurs, employed to the full extent normal in his case, and in the application of this sub-paragraph to any person no account shall be taken, in determining either the number of days in a week on which he ordinarily works or the full extent of employment in a week which is normal in his case, of any period of short-time working due to adverse industrial conditions; . . ."

H

Regulation 7(2) provides:

"Paragraph (1)(e) shall not apply to a person unless—(a) there is a recognised or customary working week in connection with his employment; or (b) he regularly works for the same number of days in a week for the same employer or group of employers."

By virtue of Schedule 20 to the Social Security Act 1975, "week," in the context of regulations 7(1)(e) and 7(2), means a period of seven days beginning with midnight between Saturday and Sunday. Regulations 7(1)(e) and 7(2) have since been consolidated in regulations 7(1)(e) and 7(2) of the Social Security (Unemployment, Sickness and Invalidity Benefit) Regulations 1983 (S.I. 1983 No. 1598).

On 15 March 1983 the claimant submitted a claim for unemployment benefit. On 10 May 1983 the local insurance officer decided that unemployment benefit was not payable to him for the 9, 12, 14, 15 and 16 March on the grounds that he regularly worked for the same number of days in a week for the same employer or group of employers and was employed to the full extent normal in his case in the weeks in which these days fell. He therefore considered that regulation 7(1)(e) precluded these days from being treated as days of unemployment. He also gave a decision of "forward disallowance" under regulation 12(4) of the Regulations of 1979 in respect of the inclusive period from 17 March 1983 to 9 May 1984.

At the time when he gave his decisions of 10 May 1983, the insurance officer was unaware that another insurance officer had already concluded that the claimant was entitled to unemployment benefit up to 29 March 1983 and that such benefit had in fact already been paid to him up to that date.

The claimant appealed against the decisions of 10 May 1983 to the local tribunal, which dismissed his appeal. He then appealed to the commissioner. No application was made to her for an oral hearing, but she had the benefit of written submissions made respectively on behalf of the claimant and by an insurance officer, who in the event supported the appeal.

As at 10 March 1983 the claimant was regularly working "for the same number of days in a week for the same employer." Accordingly, notwithstanding regulation 7(2), regulation 7(1)(e) would prevent each of the five relevant days in March 1983 from being treated as a "day of unemployment" in the case of the claimant if, though only if, the conditions specified in that regulation were satisfied.

On each of the five relevant days, the claimant did no work. Thus, effectively the crucial question for the commissioner and for this court was and is: on each of the five relevant days, did the claimant fall within the descriptions (a) "a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week (exclusive of Sunday or the day substituted for it by regulation 4)" and (b) a person "who is, in the week in which the said day occurs, employed to the full extent normal in his case?"

Both these questions must be questions of fact, falling to be decided in the light of the particular circumstances of this case. Nevertheless, they give rise to certain questions of principle. Substantially the dispute has centred on the test which should have been applied by the commissioner in judging ordinariness and normality for this purpose and, in particular, how far back in time this test required her to go in looking at the circumstances of the claimant.

The "one year before" test, the "50 per cent." test and the "stop gap" test

We have been rightly referred to a number of decisions of social security commissioners which are relevant to this question. As Lord Brandon of Oakbrook observed in Presho v. Department of Health and Social Security [1984] A.C. 310, 319:

"where there has been a consistent line of decisions in this field of national insurance by specialised tribunals over a large number of years, a court should be slow to depart from them."

A number of general tests or guides designed to assist in the ascertainment of what is "ordinary" and "normal" have emerged from these decisions, though it appears that they have not been entirely consistently applied. One such test (which I will call "the one year before test") was thus stated in paragraph 11 of decision CU/518/49:

3 W.L.R.

Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A "A claimant who has in fact worked only on some days of the week for a period of a year or more is 'a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week,' unless there are some exceptional industrial circumstances relevant to his case."

Another test (which is a more developed variant of the one year before test and which I will call "the 50 per cent. test") was thus explained by the commissioner in decision R(U) 14/59, when he said that where

B "during the year ending with the day in question (or such other period as may provide a more suitable test in a particular case) a claimant has worked on less than 50 per cent. of the days of the week in question (excluding any day of incapacity for work or holiday and days on which he was unemployed because his employment had been terminated) that day should be held to be one on which in the normal course the claimant would not work. If the claimant has worked on as much as 50 per cent. of such days, it should (in my view) be held that it has not been proved that in the normal course he would not have worked on the day in question."

The 50 per cent. test was referred to in paragraph 10 of decision R(U) 14/60, where it was pointed out that there might be other exceptional days which should in addition be excluded.

D A third test (which I will call "the stop gap test") is to be found stated thus in paragraph 16 of decision CU/518/49 (K.L.):

"On the other hand, if a claimant took up, when unemployed, employment which did not involve working every day of the week as a stop gap, while looking for full-time employment, he could not properly be held to be 'a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week.'"

The commissioner's decision

E The principal contentions made in the written submissions to the commissioner on behalf of the claimant were, in effect, that he had only worked part-time for a few days before it was decided that he was "employed to the full extent normal in his case," and, in the light of previous decisions of the commissioner, a period of one year or more immediately preceding March 1983 should have been taken into account in determining the question of normality.

F The insurance officer, in his written submissions to the commissioner, relied principally on the 50 per cent. test. He pointed out that the evidence showed that of the period of a year ending with March 1983, the claimant had been in full-time employment with Courtaulds Ltd. for over 29 weeks. He therefore submitted that, in relation to the five relevant days, the conditions of the 50 per cent. test, propounded in determining whether the claimant's employment might be termed "stop gap," were not satisfied and that accordingly regulation 7(1)(e) did not prevent them from being treated as "days of unemployment."

G The commissioner did not accept these submissions made by or on behalf of the claimant or the insurance officer. She referred to certain decisions which show that a pattern of normality can be established from the pattern of work over a much shorter period than a year: see paragraph 10 of decision R(U) 14/60; decision R(U) 18/62; and paragraph 15 of decision R(U) 2/83. She expressed her own conclusion thus, in paragraph 11 and the first sentence of paragraph 12 of her own decision:

H "In the present case the claimant had a clear pattern of employment from 1 March 1983. Accordingly, although he had a past history of full-time employment, I do not agree with the submissions that that is to be regarded as his usual pattern of employment or that it is material in deciding whether he does not ordinarily work on every day in a week. I agree with the commissioner who considered the matter in a similar case, CU/207/83, at paragraph 9. In the context of the regulation 'ordinarily' operates on the work being done in a week and is conjunctive . . . on that day a person does not work and is a person who does not ordinarily work on every day in a week [my emphasis] It does not refer to part employment and when, as in this case, it is plain from the terms of the contract of employment that the claimant does not work on every day in a week, regulation 7(1)(e) applies, although it is customary, but not required by law, to allow some time to elapse before applying it. Likewise 'the full extent normal in his case' relates to the work being done and not past employment. In the present case the claimant's pattern of work is perfectly clear and is not disputed and accordingly I give the decision set out in paragraph 1 of this decision."

The commissioner thus considered that in the short period between 1 March and 9 March 1983, a "perfectly clear" pattern of work had developed, in which the claimant did not "ordinarily work on every day in a week" (exclusive, etc., etc.) and was, in each of the relevant weeks, "employed to the full extent normal in his case."

The arguments on this appeal

Mr. Rowland, in his argument on behalf of the claimant before this court, did not wholly espouse either of the alternative lines of argument that had been placed before the commissioner in support of the claimant's case. He accepted that the one year before test is not in every instance the appropriate one and that cases may arise where a clear pattern of part-time employment has emerged in a much shorter period than a year. In his submission, however, the present case is a "stop gap" case. Such cases, he submitted, fall into a category all of their own. Ordinarily, in his submission, a person who takes up, when unemployed, employment which does not involve working every day of the week, as a stop gap, while looking for full-time employment is, during the first year when the situation continues, not properly to be regarded as fulfilling the conditions of regulation 7(1)(e). He accepted, however, that if this situation continued for more than one year, a claimant could usually be regarded as fulfilling them, notwithstanding the initially "stop gap" nature of his employment, which could not be regarded as continuing indefinitely. He relied particularly on the sentence from paragraph 16 of decision CU 518 49 which I have already quoted. The stop gap test, he submitted, has been acted on by the social security commissioners ever since, subject only to the customary one year cut off. He accepted that a person's past record of employment may be relevant to a consideration of whether or not his present employment is or is not stop gap. In the present case, however, he submitted that the commissioner had failed to ask herself at all the critically important preliminary question, namely whether the employment which the claimant took up on 1 March 1983 was of a stop gap nature.

Mr. Drabble, in resisting this appeal on behalf of the adjudication officer, submitted that the commissioner correctly applied the statutory language of regulation 7(1)(e). He pointed out that the question for the adjudicating authority in any case such as the present is whether, on the particular facts, this statutory language applies or not, the key words in the regulation being "ordinarily" and "normal," which he submitted are relatively simple words. The stop gap test, he suggested, is a gloss on this language which should be approached with caution; tests which have been spelt out of the regulation in decisions of the commissioners should not be regarded as taking on the character of rules of law. The use of the words "ordinarily" and "normal," in his submission, show that the test is purely an objective one. Regulation 7(1)(e) requires attention to be directed to the state of facts, rather than the state of mind of the individual concerned, which is irrelevant, save in so far as it provides a basis for predicting what will happen in practice. Since the rule has to be applied objectively, it would be wrong in principle to regard the stop gap test as preventing the application of regulation 7(1)(e) to a case where a claimant as a matter of fact has a fixed pattern of part-time working, merely because he desires more extensive work. It is relevant to look at the claimant's past working

Slade L.J.

A history only in so far as it may shed light on what is the full extent of work normal in his case in the relevant week, i.e. only in so far as it may show what is likely to be his pattern of work in the future. In the case of the claimant, Mr. Drabble submitted, the commissioner was entitled to say that as at 9 March 1983, his past history of full employment was not material on the grounds that it threw no light on what was likely to be his working pattern for the future. In his submission, she reached a conclusion which was maintainable in law on the facts.

Decision CU/255/84

C This appeal has been very ably argued on both sides. The respective arguments advanced have to some extent reflected the differing views of the Chief Social Security Commissioner on the one hand and two other commissioners on the other hand, who in the important recent decision CU/255/84 of a Tribunal of Commissioners reached the same conclusion in the result, but by a different route. That case concerned the entitlement to unemployment benefit of a man aged 53 for a period from 28 April 1983 to 15 July 1983, during which he was working 20 hours a week on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays for the Community Task Force as a part-time painter's labourer. He had taken up this employment in April 1983 after a spell of almost continuous unemployment since November 1980. Before November 1980 he had been continuously in full-time employment for 25 years. On taking up his new employment in April 1983, he was told that the part-time employment was likely to lead to full-time employment with the Community Task Force, which in the event happened in August 1983. The three commissioners unanimously held that regulation 7(1)(e) did not prevent Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays from being days of unemployment, but for rather different reasons. The majority considered that the stop gap test applied. In paragraph 10 they pointed to a number of qualifications to that principle but concluded:

E "subject to the principles enunciated above, what constitutes stop gap work will always depend upon the circumstances of each individual case. However, regard must be had to contemporary economic and social conditions. In times like the present where there is a high degree of unemployment, one may more readily accept that part-time work is undertaken as a stop gap exercise. In the present case we are satisfied that the claimant only took up the work he did as such a stop gap."

F The Chief Social Security Commissioner, on the other hand (see paragraphs 19 to 21 of his decision) stressed that the point of time to which regulation 7(1)(e) directs attention is the particular day which is under consideration for disqualification. He said at paragraph 22:

G "In establishing whether there is a regime or pattern at the time of the day in question the past working pattern is not necessarily conclusive or the only method by which the existence or non-existence of a pattern or regime is to be determined."

H He considered that the stop gap test must be applied with caution and in particular did not agree that because there was at present a high degree of unemployment, then it might be more readily accepted that part-time work was stop gap: see paragraph 25. On the facts of the case he did not regard the 25-year working history of the claimant, which ended about 2½ years before he started work with the Community Task Force, as relevant to the determination of whether he had a normal working week as at the relevant days in April to July 1983 and whether in the relevant weeks his employment fell short of what was normally worked by him. He thought it would be flying in the face of economic reality to rely on the previous working history itself as pointing to a likelihood of a return to a pattern of work established by the claimant's previous employment. Nevertheless, he inferred that the claimant had taken up his new part-time employment in April 1983 on the basis that he would in quite a short time be offered and accept full-time employment with the same employers, which in the event happened. By this route he concurred in the conclusion that the claimant was to be treated as ordinarily working full-time for the Community Task Force at the relevant days.

Conclusions

Mr. Drabble has submitted that the approach of the Chief Social Security Commissioner in decision CU/255/84 was the correct one in principle. He indicated that the points of principle which the adjudication officer is particularly anxious to establish on this appeal are that regulation 7(1)(e) necessitates the ascertainment of the claimant's ordinary regime or pattern of work as at the relevant week and that his working history is only relevant in so far as it sheds light on what is normal for him in that relevant week, by facilitating the prediction of what may happen in his case in the near future. The stop gap test, he suggested, is of assistance only in so far as it may help to identify the ordinary working pattern as at the relevant week.

I for my part would accept the broad correctness of that submission. I can see no difference between the concepts of ordinality and normality embodied in regulation 7(1)(e). When it is reduced to its essentials, the question posed by that regulation is, in my opinion: was the claimant's pattern of work in the relevant week the normal pattern for him at that time? This question has to be answered objectively according to the facts as they are, not as the claimant would wish them to be: cf. paragraph 3 of decision of R(U) 36/51. Particularly for this reason, I accept that the stop gap test must be applied only with circumspection. With respect to the majority in decision CU/255/84, I agree with the Chief Social Security Commissioner's opinion in that case that the mere fact that the claimant had a past employment record of 25 years continuous full-time employment up to November 1980, and that there was a high degree of unemployment from April to July 1983 did not support the argument that, as at the relevant weeks in April to July 1983, the claimant did not fall within the descriptions specified in regulation 7(1)(e); those points by themselves did not evidence any increased probability that the claimant would in the readily foreseeable future be reverting to full-time, as opposed to part-time, employment. But for the fact that the claimant in that case had taken up his new part-time employment in April 1983 on the basis that it was likely to lead to full-time employment with the same employers in the near future, I find it hard to see on the particular facts how he could properly have avoided the application of regulation 7(1)(e).

Answering the essential question posed by regulation 7(1)(e), in my judgment, requires that the officer or tribunal concerned should try to look into the future in order to decide how permanent or transitory the present pattern of work is likely to be. If, as in decision CU/255/84, there is some fairly clear evidence about what is likely in the future, this may well be conclusive. But often such evidence will not be available. Whether or not it is available, I do not see how the commissioner can properly fail to pay attention also to the claimant's past history of both work and unemployment. The effect of such evidence will, of course, differ from case to case. Evidence of past regular full-time work will, I think, never be wholly irrelevant. But if, as in decision CU/255/84, full-time work is succeeded by a long period of unemployment, it may carry little weight. If, on the other hand, there is evidence of full-time employment over several years finishing only a short time before the part-time employment started, this may be strong evidence that the part-time employment has not yet become the normal pattern of work for the particular employee and is properly to be regarded as "stop-gap" employment in his particular case.

Though on the contentious points of principle that arose in decision CU/255/84, I find myself more in agreement with the Chief Social Security Commissioner, I am in entire agreement with the following statement of principle by the majority in paragraph 9:

3 W.L.R.

Riley v. Chief Adjudication Officer (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

- A "It is clear in our view that the words 'in his case' draw attention to the particular claimant and what is normal for him and do not confine the inquiry simply to what is normal for the particular employment he holds during the week in which the day in question occurs. This is the view which seems to have been universally accepted in commissioners' decisions since the statutory provision was originally enacted in 1948, and any reinterpretation of the provision some 37 years later (particularly as the
- B relevant words have on various occasions been re-enacted by Parliament in the context of commissioners' decisions) would clearly be wholly unacceptable."

This is the crucial point which the commissioner seems to me to have failed to take into account in the present case and which in my opinion, with all respect to her, led her into error. So far as one can judge from paragraphs 10, 11 and 12 of her decision, she appears to have considered that simply because the

C contract under which the claimant took up employment on 1 March 1983 specifically provided for him to work eight hours on Thursdays and eight hours on Fridays, it inevitably followed from this "clear pattern of employment" that at the relevant times he was a person who did not "ordinarily work in every day in a week" and was employed "to the full extent normal in his case." In her view, apparently, that was that. She would appear to have entirely disregarded his past history of both work and unemployment, before 1 March 1983.

- D In my judgment, however, this approach to the evidence was too narrow. I would accept that the "one year before" test is only a guideline, which cannot supplant the language of regulation 7(1)(e) and that, while there have been many cases in which longer periods have been considered, there have been cases where the necessary findings of fact have been made on the basis of the immediately current circumstances. However, I agree with the view expressed by the Chief Social Security Commissioner in paragraph 26 of decision CU/255/84:

- E "the prima facie approach of adopting a 'one year before basis' specified in the commissioner's decision CU 518/49 at paragraph 11 affords a practical—but certainly not inviolable—approach which ought not to be disturbed; a very large number of cases must have been decided on that basis in the 35 years since 1949 and the legislation has been under the scrutiny of Parliament on a considerable number of occasions since, without apparent disapproval. I would regard it as thoroughly undesirable at this stage to
- F disturb so long-standing a rule of practice."

- In the present case, in the absence of any finding by her that the claimant on 1 March 1983 had adopted his new part-time occupation with the intention of making it henceforth his normal occupation, the commissioner should, in my opinion, have directed her mind to the question whether or not the reasonable inference from all the evidence was that the employment on 1 March 1983 was in truth of a stop gap nature: see and compare paragraphs 4 and 5 of decision
- G R(U) 30/53. For this purpose the nature and terms of his employment were, of course, relevant. However, for this purpose she should, in my opinion, also have considered, and taken into account, inter alia, what had been the claimant's pattern of work over the one year (or such other period as she thought more appropriate) which immediately preceded 1 March 1983. I think she also should have attempted to assess his working prospects for the immediately foreseeable future. As I have already indicated, I accept that in an appropriate case normality is capable of being established from a pattern of work over a much
- H shorter period than a year. However, the crucial point at which I find myself differing from the commissioner arises from her apparent opinion that the terms of the claimant's new contract of employment of 1 March 1983 by themselves sufficed to establish a new pattern of normality. In this opinion I think she erred in law.

Although his notice of appeal asks that it be determined that unemployment benefit is payable to the claimant in respect of the relevant days, this court has not got the benefit of the requisite findings of fact to support any such decision.

[1987]

In the circumstances the matter will, I think, have to go back to a commissioner.

In the result, I would allow this appeal. I would set aside the commissioner's decision and remit the appeal from the local tribunal to be heard by another commissioner. I should add for the record that we were informed by Mr. Drabble that there is no question of the claimant being subjected to any claim for repayment of the unemployment benefit which was actually paid to him up to and including 29 March 1983. For practical purposes, therefore, the issue between the parties relates to the disallowance of further claims for benefit in respect of the period from that date to 9 May 1984.

B Minor—Ward of court—Police investigation—Children placed in care of local authority—Police investigating whether children victims of criminal offences—Parents charged with offences—Children made wards of court—Whether leave of court required for wards to be called as witnesses at trial

C Four minors thought to have been sexually abused by their parents were placed by their father in the care of the local authority. The police, with the consent of the local authority, interviewed the minors and took statements from them with the result that the parents were charged with a number of offences of indecent assault and remanded in custody. The local authority then instituted proceedings making the minors wards of court. In January 1987, the parents were committed for trial and in those committal proceedings the minors' statements were tendered in evidence so that, under the provisions of section 1 of the Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965 and section 102(10) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, they were bound to attend and give evidence at the trial of their parents before the Crown Court.

D On an application in the wardship proceedings to determine whether the prosecuting authority required the consent of the court before calling the minors as witnesses at the trial of their parents:—

E Held, that it would be a constitutional impropriety for the wardship court to intervene once a statement had been obtained from a ward of court since it was for the prosecuting authority to decide whether to initiate a prosecution; that, once a prosecution had been instituted, it was contrary to public policy for the wardship court to intervene in the statutory process governing the conduct of a criminal trial and in matters within the jurisdiction of the Crown Court; and that, therefore, the court would refuse to exercise the wardship jurisdiction by granting or refusing leave for the minors to be called as witnesses at the trial or by giving a direction in the matter in another form (post, pp. 1242E—1243A).

SUMMONS

Four minors, two girls and two boys aged between 6 and 11 years, were placed in the care of the local authority by their father on 29 September 1986. The local authority consented to the minors being interviewed by the police and as a result, the local authority issued an originating summons on 10 December 1986 making the minors wards of court. Their parents were charged with indecent assault and remanded in custody. On 15 January 1987 the parents were committed for trial for a number of offences relating to their own and other children. D

During a hearing in chambers in the wardship proceedings, the issue was raised whether the leave of the court was required before the minors, being wards of court, could be called as witnesses at the forthcoming trial of their parents. Judgment was given in open court. E

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Robin Barda for the local authority.

Evan Stone Q.C. and Pamela Radcliffe for the mother. F

Anita Ryan Q.C. and Karen McLaughlin for the father.

Margaret Puxon Q.C. and Janine Sheff for the Crown Prosecution Service.

Allan Levy for the guardian ad litem.

Cur. adv. vult. G

24 August. WATERHOUSE J. read the following judgment. In these wardship proceedings, following preliminary hearings before Eastham and Heilbron JJ., I have to decide whether leave is required by the prosecution from this court for four minors to be called as witnesses at the forthcoming trial on indictment of the first and second defendants, their father and mother. It is an indictment containing many counts alleging indecent assault and similar offences against children. If such leave is required, it will be necessary for me to decide whether or not it should be granted. The four minors with whom I am concerned (two boys and two girls) are the subject individually of 22 of these counts and they were made wards of court on 10 December 1986. The children named in the other counts, who are aged between six and eight years, are also potential witnesses at the trial but are not wards of court. H

Waterhouse J.

A At the invitation of Heilbron J., the Official Solicitor has agreed to act on behalf of the minors in the wardship proceedings before me. I am grateful to him for doing so and have had the benefit of submissions on the issue before me by counsel on his behalf.

B The relevant history for the purposes of the decision that I have to make can be outlined quite briefly. The minors are now aged respectively nearly 12 years, nearly 10 years, nearly 8 years, and 6 years. They lived with their parents, who were married in March 1975, more or less continuously until 5 September 1986. If the prosecution case is correct, they were subjected to depraved conduct of an appalling kind by both their parents over a long period until the father left the matrimonial home on the latter date, taking the two boys with him and being joined by the elder daughter who had run away to a friend.

C The mother's petition for divorce was filed on 11 September 1986 and there were early interlocutory proceedings in relation to the children. As a result of the elder girl's admission to hospital on 18 September 1986, the social services department of the plaintiff local authority became aware of evidence of sexual abuse in relation to her, which had been suspected by the police four months earlier. The younger girl was also admitted to hospital following place of safety orders in respect of D both girls on or about 20 September 1986. Nine days later, all four children were placed in the care of the local authority voluntarily by the father pursuant to an undertaking given to Judge John Edwards, who had been due to hear the father's application for custody of the children on 29 September 1986.

E The children have remained in the care of the local authority ever since and have been placed with various foster parents, the two girls having gone to foster parents as early as 25 September 1986 pursuant to the place of safety orders on their discharge from hospital. Medical examinations revealed evidence of sexual abuse in respect of all four children and, with the consent of the local authority, each of them was interviewed by the police on two occasions. The first interview with each in October 1986 was quite lengthy. The second, for the purpose of F taking witness statements, was shorter with one exception. The second interviews were preceded by a case conference on 10 November 1986 at which the police, social workers and the foster parents were present. After the statements had been taken from the older three minors on 16 November 1986, both parents were charged with offences involving those three children and another child who is not a ward of court. In G consequence, the parents were remanded in custody on 18 November 1986 and have remained in custody ever since, access by them to the children has been suspended on the same date.

H To complete the evidential picture, the youngest child was interviewed for a second time on 21 November 1986 and he was the subject of two charges in respect of which the parents were committed for trial by a magistrate on 15 January 1987. The committal charges numbered 22 and involved four children in addition to the minors. A total of 31 statements, including those from the eight children involved, were tendered in evidence under section 102 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980. The magistrates' court gave a direction, under section 39 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, prohibiting publication of any particulars that might lead to identification of the children involved.

The parents were committed for trial pursuant to the provisions of section 6(2) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 so that no evidence was called before the examining justice. In any event, none of the children could have been called as a witness for the prosecution at that stage except in the circumstances specified in section 103(2) of the Act of 1980. Once their written statements had been tendered in evidence in the committal proceedings, however, they had to be treated as witnesses who had been examined by the court for the purposes of section 1 of the Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965: see section 102(10) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980. Witness orders were therefore made in the prescribed form (see rule 8 of the Magistrates' Courts Rules 1981) in respect of each of the children and they were not made conditional upon receiving notice to attend. There was no basis on the material before the examining justice on which the witness orders in respect of the children could have been made conditional, having regard to the limited discretion conferred by section 1(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965. Moreover, even if the order were to be made conditional now, pursuant to section 1(2)(b), on the ground that the evidence of the relevant child "is unlikely to be required" either of the defendants would still have the right, by virtue of the provisions of section 1(3), to require the attendance of the child at the trial.

It will be apparent from what I have already said that the present issue before me arises because the four minors with whom I am concerned were made wards of court on 10 December 1986 after the prosecution had been set in train and the parents had been charged but before the committal proceedings took place. The wardship proceedings were begun by the plaintiff council on the direction of Judge Hill-Smith given in the divorce proceedings under section 42(1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 on 4 December 1986. At that stage the minors were in voluntary care only, the place of safety orders in respect of the two girls had expired, and it was obviously necessary that proper steps should be taken to secure their future.

On 19 December 1986 the wardship proceedings came before Ewbank J. who confirmed the wardship, made a care order in favour of the local authority under section 7(2) of the Family Law Reform Act 1969 and ordered that there should be no access by either parent. A number of the directions given by the judge are not material to the issue that I have to decide but I should mention that he gave leave for the minors to be examined and treated by a consultant psychiatrist and directed that the proceedings should be listed for hearing after the criminal trial but, in any event, before the end of July 1987.

It was in these circumstances that the proceedings came before Eastham J. on 20 July 1987 when the issue that I have to decide was first raised. The only other relevant development in the period since the committal proceedings had been single interviews of each of the minors by the police in February 1987 in relation to the activities of the maternal grandfather, as a result of which a voluntary bill of indictment may be sought. Before Eastham J. and subsequently before Heilbron J. and myself, various questions relating to disclosure of documents in the wardship proceedings for the purposes of the criminal trial have been canvassed and decided, but it is unnecessary to refer to the details in this judgment. It is necessary to say, however, that on 13 August 1987, Heilbron J. made orders in wide terms restraining publication of information relating to the wardship proceedings.

A Mrs. Puxon, for the Crown Prosecution Service, which has helpfully intervened at the request of the court, now submits that no leave is required from this court for the minors to be called at the criminal trial.
The foundation of counsel's submission is that by law the decisions whether or not to prosecute and whether or not to call a specific prosecution witness at a trial are to be made by the prosecuting authority and that it would be constitutionally wrong for this court to intervene.
B In the instant case, the minors had been interviewed and the parents arrested on the basis of the minors' statements before the wardship proceedings began, so that no question of obtaining leave to interview them arose, save in relation to the matters canvassed with them in February 1987 when they were already the subject of witness orders.
C Once the decision to prosecute had been taken it was necessary for the minors' statements to be tendered as part of the prosecution case and thereafter their compellability as witnesses was governed by the statutory provisions that I have outlined and the committing justice was bound to issue witness orders. As for the question of the competence of the minors to give evidence, that is a matter to be assessed by the trial judge on the basis of well established rules: see section 38 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 and, for example, Rex v.
D Moscovitch (1924) 18 Cr.App.R. 37.

Mrs. Puxon accepts on behalf of the Crown Prosecution Service that, in general, it is the practice of the police to obtain the consent of a parent who has the custody of a child before interviewing the child as a potential witness. Similarly, the police work in close co-operation with social services departments in whose care children have been placed, and obtain the consent of the department (as in this case) before E interviewing a child in care. It is accepted also that, in the case of a ward of court, leave should be obtained from the wardship court before an interview by the police takes place. In the instant case, the question of obtaining leave for the interviews in February 1987 was not considered and there is some doubt as to when the Crown Prosecution Service became aware of the wardship proceedings, but the need for leave was F less clear because the committal proceedings had already taken place by then.

Once a prosecution has been instituted however, the statutory procedure must (it is said) take its normal course. The Crown Prosecution Service will, of course, consider any representation that may be made by a parent or a local authority about the potential adverse impact upon a child of having to give evidence. This may be one of the matters to be G considered in deciding whether or not to proceed with particular charges, but the discretion is vested in the prosecuting authority rather than the parent or the local authority. In the present case, it is said further, an extraordinary and anomalous situation would arise, if the wardship court were to intervene, because the minors might be "protected" from the operation of the statutory rules governing the compellability of witnesses, H whereas the other children involved in the case would have no similar protection.

The submissions on behalf of the Crown Prosecution Service are supported by the local authority. Mr. Barda, on their behalf, suggests that it would be inappropriate for this court to make a direction that might bring it into conflict with the Crown Prosecution Service and the Crown Court in the exercise of their statutory powers. Before the wardship proceedings began, the local authority agreed that the minors should be interviewed, in the knowledge that a prosecution based on their evidence might ensue. More recently they have obtained a report from a child psychiatrist dealing with the potential impact of giving evidence upon the minors, and the local authority wishes to have leave to inform the Crown Prosecution Service of the contents of that report as it may affect, at least in part, the future conduct of the prosecution. But the local authority would not support the idea that the wards might be treated more favourably, as a result of a ruling from this court, than the other children involved in this case.

In support of the local authority's position on this issue, reliance is placed by way of analogy on the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Mohamed Arif [1968] Ch. 643. In that case the wardship jurisdiction had been invoked by two appellants claiming to be the fathers of immigrants who had been refused admission to the United Kingdom. In wardship proceedings, naming the Home Secretary as a defendant, the appellants sought, inter alia, declarations of legitimacy and paternity. Cross J. dismissed both originating summonses and his decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. Having set out the contentions of the appellants, Lord Denning M.R. said, at p. 662:

"To these contentions I think there is the short answer. The court will not exercise its jurisdiction so as to interfere with the statutory machinery set up by Parliament. The wardship process is not to be used so as to put a clog on the decisions of the immigration officers or as a means of reviewing them. These applications are misconceived. The courts should refuse to entertain them."

In the same case Russell L.J. said, at pp. 662–663:

"When an infant becomes a ward of court, control over the person of the infant is vested in the judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court. It is for the judge to say by order from time to time where the ward is to reside and with whom, and disobedience to such an order is contempt of court by anyone who knowingly breaches or is party to a breach of that order. Moreover, even without any judge's order forbidding it, it is a contempt to remove a ward outside the jurisdiction of the High Court. It is, however, quite obvious that there are circumstances in which control over the person of a ward is not committed or referred to the judge but is by the law of England committed or referred to another agency or person. As a simple illustration, it could not be contended that the judge would have any jurisdiction to order that a criminal ward be transferred from place of detention A. to place of detention B., however much the medical evidence before the judge suggested that the ward would be in better health at place of detention B. The reason is that the jurisdiction of the judge over the person of the ward is necessarily restricted by the fact that the law has given that aspect of control over the ward's person exclusively to another agency. Similarly, the judge would have no right to complain of or countermand a lawful posting overseas of a ward who was in the armed forces. The law refers the military control of the ward to the military authorities. Similarly, any lawful deportation order affecting a ward must be outside the normal position which I have mentioned already, that a ward must not leave the jurisdiction without permission of the judge; indeed, it would override any existing express order of the judge in the wardship proceedings that the

A infant was not to depart from the jurisdiction. Now these are examples of the proposition that the control of the High Court over the person of a ward is not by any means absolute."

B It is submitted, therefore, by the local authority that the wardship court has no power to interfere with the prosecution of the parents in this case in accordance with due process of law, and the calling of the minors as witnesses if the prosecution so decides.

C The parents have not adopted an agreed position before me and it is likely that there will be a considerable conflict between them at the trial, in which they will be represented by different counsel from those who have appeared for them at the hearing before me. On behalf of the mother, Mr. Stone submits that the giving of evidence by the minors in the criminal proceedings is an important step in their lives and that leave ought to have been obtained, once they became wards, for a prosecution founded largely on their evidence to have been instituted. Moreover, the mother does not wish any of the minors to be called as a witness. Mr. Stone accepts, however, that now that the parents have been committed for trial and the witness orders properly made, they cannot be quashed by this court. Even if judicial review were to be otherwise available, it is excluded by section 29(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 in matters relating to trial on indictment. As for the powers of the Crown Court judge, his discretion in relation to a compellable witness is limited, as has already been indicated. Furthermore, section 41 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 enables him to dispense with the attendance before the court of a child witness only if it is not essential to the just hearing of the case. Section 43 of that Act, which refers to serious danger to life or health involved in the attendance of a child witness, applies only when there is a deposition of the child.

D In these circumstances, Mr. Stone accepts that the leave of the court is not required for the minors to be called as witnesses at the trial, but he urges that the views of the psychiatrist should be made known to the trial judge as well as the Crown Prosecution Service on the basis that it will be relevant to decisions about the future conduct of the trial.

F The father's position is said to be that he wishes all the minors to be called at the trial, unless they are likely to be damaged by doing so. In his view, their evidence will be necessary to enable him to exculpate himself. Nevertheless, Miss Ryan on his behalf has submitted strongly to me that I should affirm the jurisdiction of this court to intervene and then exercise my discretion in respect of each of the minors in the light of the psychiatrist's report. She suggests that the wardship jurisdiction is, in effect, limitless in matters touching upon the welfare of a ward, and that the court should act in the instant case to protect the minors, if necessary, from potential harm. I confess that I find this submission difficult to reconcile with the father's alleged practical needs, but I accept that Miss Ryan puts it forward on the basis of the best interests of the minors and what is said to be the public interest.

H In support of her submission, Miss Ryan has referred to a number of cases such as A. v. Liverpool City Council [1982] A.C. 363; In re Mohamed Arif [1968] Ch. 643; In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Jurisdiction) [1975] Fam. 47 and M. v. Lambeth Borough Council (No. 3) [1986] 2 F.L.R. 136. I am unable, however, to derive from the speeches and judgments in those cases any support for the proposition that it would be appropriate for this court to intervene in the present case. It is clear from them that it is both unwise and undesirable to attempt to define limits of the wardship jurisdiction, but it is equally clear that great care must be exercised when invoking that jurisdiction in situations in which third parties are involved and in which a statutory code or framework for dealing with the matters has been established.

A case that is closer in point is In re J. (A Minor) (Wardship) [1984] F.L.R. 535. In that case the ward, aged 13 years, was to be the main prosecution witness at the trial of his mother on charges of inflicting grievous bodily harm on him and of attempting to pervert the course of justice. The mother applied for leave to use a psychiatrist's report about the ward as evidence on her behalf in the criminal proceedings and to have the ward further examined by the psychiatrist with a view to giving evidence at the trial. It was common ground that leave was required by the mother in respect of both these matters, and Wood J. refused both applications. After a detailed review of the law and the facts, Wood J. gave as the reasons for his refusal his conclusion that the public interest in a fair trial did not require the evidence to be made available, that the right of the mother to a fair trial would not be adversely affected, and that it would be against the best interests of the ward for either application to be granted.

It follows from what I have said that the decision of Wood J. does not bear directly on the issue before me. It does illustrate how decisions of the wardship court may have impact upon the course of a criminal trial, but this is well recognised: see the helpful judgment of Booth J. in S. (Minors) (Wardship: Police Investigation) [1987] 3 W.L.R. 847. Miss Ryan, however, relies upon a passage in the judgment of Wood J. in In re J. (A Minor) (Wardship) [1984] F.L.R. 535, in which he formulated the principles to be gleaned from In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Jurisdiction) [1975] Fam. 47 and In re R. (M.J.) (A Minor) (Publication of Transcript) [1975] Fam. 89. He said, at pp. 539-540:

"These two cases, as I have said, are clearly distinguishable from the present one. What, then, are the principles to be gleaned from those two authorities? I think they can be formulated as follows. (i) That a judge, when exercising the jurisdiction over wards pursuant to section 41 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, is representing Her Majesty as parens patriae, and, in so doing, he has limitless power—it is not created by statute nor limited by statute—to protect the ward from any interference with his or her welfare, direct or indirect: see In re X [1975] Fam. 47, per Latey J. at p. 52B-c and per Lord Denning M.R. in the Court of Appeal at p. 57F-G. (ii) That it is unfruitful to seek to define any limits to such jurisdiction: see In re X (above), per Roskill L.J. at p. 60c. (iii) That the exercise of that power is one of discretion, and in each case the decision whether and in what way to do so must depend upon the facts of that case. (iv) That the interest of the ward is the first and most important consideration: see In re R. [1975] Fam. 89, per Rees J. at p. 96H. (v) That where the issue before the court was 'the custody or upbringing of a minor,' then the interest of the minor might well be the first and paramount consideration as required by section 1 of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971: see In re X (above), per Sir John Pennycuik at p. 62. (vi) That it is important to bear in mind the desirability of confidentiality in those cases normally heard in private—such as wardship or adoption

Waterhouse J.

A applications—so that witnesses should not feel inhibited in their evidence with the fear of subsequent disclosure. (vii) That it is in the public interest that all relevant material should, if possible, be before a court so that the law should be upheld and justice should not only be done but should be seen to be done, despite the fact that in some special cases the court acts in private: see Scott v. Scott [1913] A.C. 417. (viii) That in exercising their discretionary power, the judges must keep a proper balance between the protection of their wards and the rights of ‘outside parties’ (those not in a family or personal relationship with the ward), whether such rights arise at common law or by statute or otherwise: see In re X (above), per Sir John Pennycuik at p. 61D.”

C With respect to counsel, however, I do not think that this passage is of assistance in deciding the first issue before me. Wood J. was considering the exercise of a discretion in a case in which it was conceded that the discretion existed. If it does exist in the case before me, it is at least doubtful whether the best interests of the wards are the first and paramount consideration, because the custody or upbringing of the children may not be in question: see Sir John Pennycuik in In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Jurisdiction) [1975] Fam. 47, 62; but here I am not, at this stage, concerned with a mere balancing exercise. I have to decide whether it is appropriate for the wardship jurisdiction to be invoked in relation to a matter that is already governed by statutory rules and which will pursue its course unless this court purports to intervene.

E Finally, Mr. Levy for the Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem also argues that this court has jurisdiction to decide whether or not the minors should be permitted to give evidence, subject to the separate question of their competence to be decided by the Crown Court, on the basis that it involves an important step in their lives: see Cross J. in In re S. (Infants) [1967] 1 W.L.R. 396, 407D. On this footing, it is submitted that the question whether the court should exercise its jurisdiction is a matter of policy and that the decision should be in favour of doing so, notwithstanding the existence of witness orders. Moreover, the wards should not suffer because of a failure to obtain leave of the court before the committal proceedings began. The Official Solicitor recognises that possible conflict may arise between the Crown Court and the wardship court if this submission is accepted, and counsel is not able to point to any means by which an existing and valid witness order may be quashed. It is recognised also that acceptance of the jurisdiction could lead to disparity of treatment between wards and non-wards who are the subject of witness orders in the same case. Nevertheless, it is argued that the wardship jurisdiction and the duty of the court to protect its wards are factors of overriding importance. Alternatively, if it is not accepted that the court has jurisdiction to direct that the minors should not be called as witnesses, Mr. Levy submits that the court should exercise its jurisdiction to the extent of providing the Crown Court and the Crown Prosecution Service with such material as may be necessary for the protection of the minors in relation to decisions about the further conduct of the prosecution.

H In support of his general proposition, Mr. Levy has referred to the fact that as early as 1852, Sir James Parker V.-C., expressed the opinion that it would be a contempt of court for an infant who had enlisted without permission in the 60th Rifles to be posted abroad without leave of the court: see Harrison v. Goodall (1852) Kay 310, and also Rochford v. Hackman (1854) Kay 308. The case is not a satisfactory authority, however, because the point was not argued; in the event, the ward was posted to Ireland without the leave of the court and the arrangements were approved retrospectively by the Vice Chancellor. It does not, in my view, diminish the persuasive force, at the very least, of what Russell L.J. said in In re Mohamed Arif (An Infant) [1968] Ch. 643.

I am grateful to counsel for the very full arguments that have been addressed to me on this issue but, in the end, I have no doubt that I should decline to exercise the wardship jurisdiction by either giving leave for the minors to be called as witnesses or by giving a direction in the matter in another form. In my judgment, it is neither necessary nor appropriate in child abuse cases for the Crown Prosecution Service to seek the leave of the wardship court to call a ward as a witness either before or after committal proceedings.

It is necessary, first of all, to set my conclusion in its proper context. In many cases, the wardship court is likely to be involved at an early stage because leave will have to be sought for the police to interview a ward. In such circumstances it is inevitable that the court will have to perform a balancing exercise, weighing the potential damage to the child against the public interest, as a responsible parent would do. In reaching a decision, the best interests of a child may not be the first and paramount consideration, for reasons that I have sufficiently explained. It is clear also that the court will have in mind that, if leave to interview the child is granted, a prosecution based on the child's evidence, at least in part, may ensue. Once a statement has been obtained, however, the responsibility for deciding whether or not a prosecution shall be initiated rests with the prosecuting authority and, in my view, it would be a constitutional impropriety for this court to intervene at that stage. To do so would be to invoke powers not possessed by any responsible parent or custodian of a child. More seriously, it would involve the court ultimately in assessment of matters of policy and discretion that are vested by law in the prosecuting authority as a branch of the executive.

The argument against intervention by the wardship court is even more overwhelming, in my judgment, once the prosecution has been set in train. By that time the defendants will have been arrested and charged, and may (as in this case) have been detained in custody. The procedure to be followed is strictly prescribed by statute, as I have outlined earlier in this judgment, and the limits of the discretion in relation to the calling of witnesses whose statements have been tendered are closely defined. On the other hand, a defendant has a virtually unfettered right to call as a witness anyone who can give relevant and admissible evidence on his behalf. If the wardship court were to attempt to intervene in this process, it could lead to conflict between it and the Crown Court, to the prejudice of the administration of justice generally, and could result in disparate treatment of child witnesses, despite the express statutory provisions dealing with them.

For all these reasons, therefore, I rule that it is unnecessary for this court to give leave for the minors to be called as witnesses in the pending trial of their parents, and that it would be inappropriate to do so. I prefer not to base my decision on consideration of the theoretical limits of the wardship jurisdiction because it is unwise and undesirable to attempt to define them. It is more correct, in my judgment, to refuse

Waterhouse J.

A to invoke the wardship jurisdiction for the purpose of granting leave or giving a direction because it would be contrary to public policy to do so. In my view, this conclusion conforms with the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in In re Mohamed Arif (An Infant) [1968] Ch. 643.

B I must stress that my decision is limited to the particular issue before me. As I have indicated earlier, there are occasions when the wardship court is necessarily and properly involved in decisions that will or may affect the conduct of a criminal trial. Moreover, the prosecution in the instant case is being conducted by the Crown Prosecution Service as the duly constituted prosecuting authority. There may be other cases in which, for example, a private prosecution is instituted in which other considerations may be relevant: see, for example, In re H. (A Minor) (Wardship: Applications) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1164.

C Before parting with this matter, I should say that the potential damage to child witnesses in cases of this kind is likely to be alleviated in the future if current legislative proposals are enacted. It is worthy of consideration, however, whether or not the provisions of section 43 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 should be amended and broadened now that committals for trial are more usually based on D tendered statements rather than depositions.

E In the course of the hearing there has been discussion as to whether or not the psychiatrist's report, to which I have referred, should be made available to the trial judge and the Crown Prosecution Service. My decision is that leave should be given to the local authority to disclose it to the officers of the Crown Prosecution Service responsible for the conduct of the prosecution of the parents and to prosecuting counsel instructed in the matter. Additionally, there must be leave for F counsel for the prosecution to supply any part of the information contained in that report to the trial judge, if it becomes necessary and appropriate to do so. I do not think that it would be appropriate to give leave for disclosure generally to the Crown Court because its contents relate to matters that are essentially for the prosecution alone to consider. The local authority will thus be acting as a responsible parent would be entitled to act in similar circumstances without making direct submissions himself to the court.

G I should add finally that, in my judgment, leave should have been sought for the police to interview the minors in February 1987, but I do not think that it would be right to criticise the local authority or the Crown Prosecution Service for the oversight in the particular circumstances of this case. Normally, only one application for leave will be necessary because the possibility that further interviews may be necessary can be canvassed on the first application and dealt with in the order of the court. Where interviews have taken place before the wardship began,
H however, it is right that the court should deal with the matter, if further interviews prove to be necessary when the minors have become wards of court.

There is only one residual point, which relates to information concerning the wardship proceedings. It is appropriate for me to give leave for information about the present wardship proceedings to be given at the trial of the parents to the extent that the trial judge thinks that it is necessary, because the trial will be in public and there might otherwise be some evidential difficulty.

Waterhouse J.

[1987]

Directions accordingly.
